UAE definition: According to UAE's Federal Law 51 of 2006 on Combating Human Trafficking Crimes, human trafficking is: recruiting, transporting, transferring, harbouring, or receiving persons by means of threat or use of force, or other forms of coercion, abduction, fraud, deception, abuse of power or of position, taking advantage of the vulnerability of the person, or, the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person for the purpose of exploitation.

Exploitation includes all forms of sexual exploitation, engaging others in prostitution, servitude, forced labour, enslavement, quasi-slavery practices, or detachment of organs.

- Staff report

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 57

Copyright 2009 Gulf News - Al Nisr Publishing LLC.

All Rights Reserved

Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

338 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 21, 2009 SundayPuzzled over US move*SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 6LENGTH: 237 words

PUTRAJAYA: He is disappointed and a little puzzled by the United States' government recent move to list Malaysia as one of the top trafficking offenders in the world.

But Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein said since the country had been re-relegated to Tier 3 recently (after it had been upgraded to Tier 2 last year after the enactment of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007), it would be taking the necessary measures to look into human trafficking.

He said he would wait for an official letter from the US to know why exactly Malaysia was downgraded and what the country should be addressing.

"Is it illegal workers, Myanmar refugees, child labour or prostitution? Maybe it's the implementation of the act we need to look at. But the issue of human trafficking involves international cooperation, and I feel we can work together with Australia, United Kingdom and the US to address this crime."

With the media spotlight on the recent downgrade, Malaysia faces embarrassment with the report saying, among other things, that it had become a destination and at least a source and transit country for the trafficking of women and children.

"I am not trying to defend that. But I hope people will be fair to us, and be more specific with respect to their judgments towards Malaysia."

"We will have to specifically ask the US why. Tell me which areas you want us to overcome and in my capacity, I will overcome it."

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

339 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 20, 2009 Saturday

Malaysian foreign minister talks about efforts to tackle human trafficking

LENGTH: 277 words

Text of report in English by Malaysian official news agency Bernama website

["Malaysia Downgraded To Tier 3 In US Tip Report"]

KUALA LUMPUR, June 19 (Bernama) - Malaysia has been downgraded to Tier 3 from Tier 2 in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2009 released on June 16 by the US Department of States, said Foreign Minister Datuk Anifah Aman.

He said Malaysia had enforced the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act in 2007 to prosecute traffickers, and protect and rehabilitate the victims.

The act is aimed at upgrading Malaysia's status in tackling human trafficking, he said in a statement Friday.

The TIP Report ranks countries based on their level of compliance on established minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

"Malaysia's seriousness in tackling the issue can be seen in the number of cases brought to the court and the number of victims rescued.

"These are not considered in the TIP Report (between April 2008 and March 2009). Countries are ranked according to the Tiers based on the United States' perception on their records," he added.

Anifah said he met US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Ranking Minority Member of US Senate Committee Senator Richard Lugar when he visited Washington DC on Monday and Tuesday.

"During the meeting, I told them that Prime Minister Datuk Seri Najib Tun Razak took a serious view on an allegation that Malaysian civil servants had been implicated in human trafficking and he had ordered an investigation," said Anifah.

He said he had also proposed that human trafficking should be deliberated at the regional or international forum.

Source: Bernama website, Kuala Lumpur, in English 0004 gmt 20 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

340 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 20, 2009 Saturday

MALAYSIA DOWNGRADED TO TIER 3 IN US TIP REPORTLENGTH: 239 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 19

Malaysia has been downgraded to Tier 3 from Tier 2 in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2009 released on June 16 by the US Department of States, said Foreign Minister Datuk Anifah Aman.

He said Malaysia had enforced the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act in 2007 to prosecute traffickers, and protect and rehabilitate the victims.

The act is aimed at upgrading Malaysia's status in tackling human trafficking, he said in a statement today.

The TIP Report ranks countries based on their level of compliance on established minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

"Malaysia's seriousness in tackling the issue can be seen in the number of cases brought to the court and the number of victims rescued.

"These are not considered in the TIP Report (between April 2008 and March 2009). Countries are ranked according to the Tiers based on the United States' perception on their records," he added.

Anifah said he met US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Ranking Minority Member of US Senate Committee Senator Richard Lugar when he visited Washington DC on Monday and Tuesday.

"During the meeting, I told them that Prime Minister Datuk Seri Najib Tun Razak took a serious view on an allegation that Malaysian civil servants had been implicated in human trafficking and he had ordered an investigation," said Anifah.

He said he had also proposed that human trafficking should be deliberated at the regional or international forum.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

341 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 20, 2009 Saturday

ANTI-TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS ACT: SUHAKAM REGRETSLENGTH: 308 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 20

As human trafficking is an intricate crime, an overnight result should not be expected from the 18-month-old Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act (ATIP).

This is due to the complexities and wide range of stakeholders and actors involved in the trafficking chain, notes the Human Rights Commission of Malaysia (Suhakam).

"The multiple changes of hands and modus operandi between the time a person is trafficked to the place they are found or rescued from, require continuous efforts.

"Therefore, change cannot be expected at once," said Suhakam commissioner Datuk Dr Raj Abdul Karim when expressing deep regret over Malaysia's downgrading from Tier2 to Tier3 in the US Department of State's Trafficking In Persons Report 2009.

In a statement today, she said the report should have been more balanced and factual, and not merely fault finding.

The Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2009 released on June 16 by the US Department of State, indicated that Malaysia was downgraded to Tier 3 from Tier 2 for failing to fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and was not making significant efforts to curb TIP issues.

In 2007, Malaysia enforced the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act to prosecute traffickers, besides protecting and rehabilitating the victims.

The act is aimed at upgrading Malaysia's status in tackling human trafficking.

Dr Raj said it would not be possible to see results over a period of one year (US ATIP reporting period) as the implementation of the act and efforts to combat the inhumane crime of human trafficking took time to yield expected results.

"As such, Suhakam fails to understand the US Department of State's system of placing grades on a yearly basis.

"It should really be looking at efforts taken by the Government, non-governmental organisations and the civil society to handle the issue," she added.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

342 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 20, 2009 Saturday

ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES SERIOUS IN COMBATING HUMAN TRAFFICKING - MUSA

LENGTH: 284 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 20

Malaysian enforcement agencies are committed in addressing human trafficking by tightening surveillance and checks on travellers, said Inspector-General of Police Tan Sri Musa Hassan.

"We have solved many human trafficking cases, made arrests and charged those responsible. These prove our seriousness in eliminating trafficking in persons," he told reporters at the police family day at Titiwangsa Lake Garden here today.

Malaysia has been downgraded to Tier 3 from Tier 2 in the Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2009 released by US Department of State for allegedly not doing enough to combat human trafficking.

Musa said the Malaysian police would compare notes with the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) and the Australian police on human trafficking.

On a defamation suit filed against the government and the police by textile shop owner and his brother-in-law for wrongful arrest and trespass, Musa said it was their rights and the police were prepared to face it.

He said the duo, who were suspects in the Nurin Jazlin Jazimin's abduction and murder two years ago, were picked up based on information received.

Musa said the police had not closed the case and were still gathering evidence.

Trader Mohamad Zamri Ibrahim, 35, and former engineer Mohd Suhaimi Yusoff, 30, claimed that they want to clear their names which were tarnished due to the arrest and detention.

The two plaintiffs yesterday named investigating officer ASP Loh Pei Pei, Musa and the Government as defendants.

Eight-year-old Nurin went missing on Aug 20 2007 after going to a night market alone near her home in Wangsa Maju.

Her naked body was found stuffed in a sports bag and left outside a shop in Petaling Utama on Sept 17 2007.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

343 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 20, 2009 Saturday

Police: We're doing all we can on human trafficking

BYLINE: Fadhil A. Ghani; Sajahan Abdul Waheed

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 4

LENGTH: 336 words

KUALA LUMPUR: The deputy inspector-general of police yesterday rejected allegations that the force was not doing enough to investigate human trafficking cases.

Tan Sri Ismail Omar said the proof that police were giving attention to such cases lay in their records.

He said the United States State Department had no basis to put Malaysia in Tier 3 of its Trafficking in Persons black-list or to make allegations that the force had not done its best to counter the problem.

Ismail said the force will continue to do so until the issue was resolved.

"Although there are many challenges and factors in curbing the problem, we have managed to take appropriate action based on the power given to us and the laws of the country."

Ismail said policemen had been stationed at border areas and other "hot" spots for those attempting to smuggle illegals into the country, adding that the force also worked closely with other enforcement agencies in the country such as Customs, Immigration and the Anti-Smuggling Unit.

Meanwhile, Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein said Malaysia was waiting for a written reply from the United States embassy on its government's list of top trafficking offenders.

He said he was told the report would be submitted soon.

"I want to know which aspects they are referring to. They have to be more specific and should not make accusations without backing their claims," he said yesterday.

He said the government would take all steps under its jurisdiction to overcome the problem if it was within its control.

"The issues regarding human trafficking cannot be overcome overnight. We need to get an accurate account from the embassy."

He said Malaysia was blacklisted in 2001 but its ranking improved to Tier 2 in the subsequent years until 2007, when it was relegated to Tier 3. Last year, after the enactment of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007, Malaysia was again elevated to Tier 2.

Malaysia is listed with 16 other countries in Tier 3 this year, including six newly-added African nations.

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

All Rights Reserved

344 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 20, 2009 Saturday

A reality check

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 16

LENGTH: 422 words

HOME Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Hussein is seeking an explanation from the United States embassy for the report putting Malaysia back on the blacklist of the worst offenders in human trafficking. There's nothing wrong with doing that. Doubtless, it is the men and women in the Kuala Lumpur outpost who have been the major source of the country "narrative" on Malaysia in the US State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report 2009". To be sure, certain sections of one year's report are indistinguishable from those in another year. A case in point is the "recommendations" in this year's report which are almost identical to last year's. But there are crucial differences. In a nutshell, the main one is that when Malaysia was taken off the blacklist and put on the watch list last year, despite still not fully complying with the "minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking", it was because we were seen to be "making significant efforts to do so". But for this year's report, the assessment was that we were "not making significant efforts to do so".

In other words, it is not necessary to look any further than the report itself for the reasons for the damning conclusion. One of these involved the US Senate report on the trafficking of Myanmar refugees on our border with Thailand. In the view of the US ambassador James Keith, as expressed in a telephone interview from Washington DC, this was a major factor for our lowly status on the human trafficking scale. As the American ambassador has acknowledged, the problem has also to be tackled at the root causes in Myanmar. But as the home minister has rightly reiterated, we also have an obligation to "do whatever we can to overcome it".

The minister has also got it spot on in not sending a protest note. The police may have concluded that the allegations about the selling of refugees to brothels, restaurants and fishing boats were not "credible". But we should not close our eyes to the probable official connivance and corruption, the forced prostitution, forced labour and other abuses, or fool ourselves into thinking that the drowning of those seeking passage to third countries are isolated incidents. Rather than express outrage at being lumped together with countries like Myanmar, we should look at the blacklisting as a reality check. Furthermore, as this year's report says, as "a regional economic leader approaching developed-nation status, Malaysia has the resources and government infrastructure to do more in addressing trafficking in persons".

LOAD-DATE: June 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Editorial

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

345 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 19, 2009 Friday 11:56 PM EET

25 LITHUANIAN WOMEN FREED FROM SEXUAL SLAVERY ABROAD IN 2008

LENGTH: 364 wordsDATELINE: VILNIUS Jun 19

Some 25 Lithuanian women in 2008 were freed from sexual slavery abroad and returned back to their home country. A fifth of the victims of human trafficking were reportedly underage. Five indictments were made against Lithuanian citizens in 2008 for human trafficking, the Interior Ministry said.

Lithuanian women are reported to have fallen victim to human trafficking both within the country and taken abroad, namely the UK, Germany, France, Italy, Greece, the Czech Republic and the Netherlands. US Department of State Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons has come forward with the comprehensive report on the human trafficking situation in 2008 around the globe. Lithuania has for the sixth consecutive year retained Tier 1 status, meaning its efforts to eliminate human trafficking meet the minimum requirements. "While the report says Lithuania to be a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation, it also underlines that our government fully complies with the requirements to battle human trafficking," Lithuanian Interior Minister Raimundas Palaitis said. "In 2008, the government increased victim assistance funding to $150,000, demonstrated strong law enforcement efforts, and increased the number of victims referred by law enforcement personnel for assistance. It also ensured that a majority of convicted traffickers served significant time in prison," the report reads. The report cites an estimate that 20 percent of all victims of human trafficking in Lithuania are underage. The minister said the figure is inconceivable, however noting the percentage is lower than it was in 2007. The US Department of State in line with the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000 annually assesses anti-human trafficking efforts on the global level. The assessment groups countries into four different categories, starting with Tier 1 - countries displaying most ardent efforts to combat trafficking and ending with Tier 4 states, which seem to be experiencing the most problems in the field of battling human trafficking. Vilnius newsroom, +370 5 2058531, politika@bns.lt

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

346 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 19, 2009 Friday

St Vincent sees "no evidential basis" for being on US human trafficking list

LENGTH: 372 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

KINGSTOWN, St Vincent, CMC - St Vincent and the Grenadines has objected to being placed on the United States government's State Department watch list for human trafficking.

In a statement Thursday morning in Parliament, Prime Minister and National Security Minister Ralph Gonsalves accused the State Department of acting "unfair, wrong, arbitrarily" by placing St Vincent and the Grenadines on the second tier of the trafficking in persons watch list, as it released its ninth annual report on trafficking in persons.

"St Vincent does not have trafficking of persons," Gonsalves said, adding that the country's placement on the list was greeted here with "utter shock and disdain".

The Prime Minister sent a letter on Wednesday to US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton strongly expressing the government's displeasure and disagreement.

"There is no evidential basis for the placement of St Vincent and the Grenadines on any such watch list," it said.

The State Department report said "St Vincent and the Grenadines is a potential source country for children trafficked internally for the purposes of sexual exploitation; it may also be a destination country for women trafficked for the purposes of Commercial sexual exploitation".

The document claims that "a traditional practice of sending children away from home to live with another family is sometimes misused for the purpose of coercing children into commercial sexual exploitation.

"In these situations, care-givers force fostered children into sexual relationships in exchange for financial and in-kind compensation."

Gonsalves said that the persons charged with preparing that report on St Vincent and the Grenadines obviously did so "oblivious to the real facts of the situation", and wrote the report based on "hearsay, unreliable information and some mischief making possibly by some busy-bodies".

He said that besides his letter to Clinton, he has held discussions with the Charge d'Affaires of the United States Embassy to Barbados and the Eastern Caribbean, Brent Hardt and made clear his feeling on the matter.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 2050 gmt 18 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

347 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 19, 2009 Friday

Taiwan needs to do more to fight human trafficking: US report

LENGTH: 689 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

[By Roger Chou]

Taipei, June 18 (CNA) - Taiwan has made some progress in combating human trafficking over the past year, but should do much more, including extending labour protections to all categories of workers to prevent labour trafficking, according to the just-released 2009 US

Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The annual report placed Taiwan in Tier 2 ranking, which is for governments that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking prescribed by the US law that guides anti-human trafficking efforts -the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

Governments that fully comply are placed in Tier 1. Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed in Tier 3.

"Taiwan authorities made noticeable progress during the reporting period by passing a new anti-trafficking law, bolstering law enforcement efforts, and approving a budget plan of $14US.8 million for victim protection measures," the report acknowledged.

Trafficked victims -including men, women and children -are usually brought to Taiwan for forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation, according to the report.

Most trafficking victims are workers from rural areas of Vietnam, Thailand, Indonesia, and the Philippines. They are employed through recruitment agencies and brokers to perform low-skilled work in Taiwan's construction, fishing, and manufacturing industries, or to work as domestic helpers.

"Many of these workers fall victim to labour trafficking by unscrupulous brokers and employers, who force workers to perform work outside the scope of their contract and often under exploitative conditions, " the report said, which is available online.

Some women and girls from China and Southeast Asian countries are trafficked to Taiwan through fraudulent marriages, deceptive employment offers, and illegal smuggling for sexual exploitation and forced labour, the report found.

It said many migrant workers are charged job placement and service fees up to the equivalent of $14US,000, some of which are unlawful.

The report added that this results in substantial debt for the workers that unscrupulous labour brokers or employers may use as a coercive tool to subject the workers to involuntary servitude.

"Many foreign workers remain vulnerable to trafficking because legal protections, oversight by authorities and enforcement efforts are currently inadequate, " said the report.

Taiwan's regulations currently allow employers to implement a system of "forced savings, " whereby employers deduct up to 30 per cent of a foreign worker's monthly salary to be placed in a bank account in the worker's name, but inaccessible to the worker, the report said. This system has facilitated trafficking, it said.

The report cited NGOs saying that immigration, police and local law enforcement officials continue to view trafficking victims as runaways or criminals, resulting in some victims being penalized rather than assisted.

In addition to recommending that Taiwan extend labour protections to all categories of workers, the report also suggested that Taiwan implement its new comprehensive anti-trafficking law and effectively carry out its victim and witness protections so that victims are not penalized for acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked, which would encourage them to seek help.

It also suggested Taiwan increase police efforts to investigate trafficking crimes and to identify trafficking victims, and improve cooperation with governments of labour source countries on trafficking investigations.

Taiwan's National Immigration Agency (NIA), which did not have a direct response to the findings of the report, said Thursday that Taiwan has remained on Tier 2 in the annual report for three consecutive years. It said Japan and Singapore also received Tier 2 ranking.

The agency said Taiwan was placed on Tier 2 Watch List in 2006 and upgraded to Tier 2 the next year.

Source: Central News Agency website, Taipei, in English 1326 gmt 18 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

348 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

June 19, 2009 Friday

Justice chief seeks faster case resolution

SECTION: Pg. S1/11LENGTH: 215 words

Justice Secretary Agnes VST. Devanadera has ordered prosecutors to request courts to fast-track the resolution of human trafficking cases.

The directive tracked a 2009 Global Trafficking in Persons report of the US State Department that classified the Philippines under the tier 2 watch list.

The report noted "the government did not show evidence of progress in convicting trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for labor trafficking."

The US Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2008 provides that a country, which has been included in the tier 2 watch list for two consecutive years, may be subjected to restrictions on non-humanitarian and non-trade related foreign assistance. The Philippines is in the tier 2 watch list for the first time. It was previously in the lower tier 2 level.

Ms. Devanadera, however, said prosecutors should not "antagonize" the courts in seeking a faster resolution of cases, but at the same time should "exert all efforts" to address delays.

Assistant Chief State Prosecutor Severino Gana, Jr. noted advances in fast-tracking cases, including winning a Cebu case where a female, accused of harboring a person for pornography, was sentenced to life imprisonment and a P3-million fine. Mr. Gana is chairman of the Task Force on Trafficking in Persons.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

349 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Christian Science Monitor

June 19, 2009, Friday

A stop sign for human trafficking

BYLINE: the Monitor's Editorial Board

SECTION: EDITORIAL; Pg. 8

LENGTH: 614 words

It's not every day that the US government gives Nigeria a shout-out for a job well done. After all, the State Department labels this African nation's human rights record "poor" and its 2007 presidential election "seriously flawed."

But this week, the State Department praised Africa's most populous country for its progress in prosecuting human traffickers and helping their victims. "I can't talk about Nigeria enough," said Ambassador Luis Cde-Baca, who leads the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

In only five years, Nigeria has advanced from the State Department's human-trafficking "watch list" to its top tier of countries fully complying with standards to eliminate servitude.

That stands as proof that other countries and the world as a whole can do something about this scourge flourishing in the shadows. An estimated 12 million adults and children have been induced by force, fraud, or coercion to become prostitutes, miners, farmhands, domestics, sweatshop workers - mostly in the developing world.

In its ninth annual report on human trafficking, the State Department said this week that the economic crisis has made people more vulnerable to the false promises and trickery that can lead to enslavement. Of the 175 countries and territories it rated, the 2008 report put 52 of them on its watch list, up from 40 the year before - a 30 percent increase.

And yet, since 2000, more than half of all countries have enacted laws that ban human trafficking. Nongovernmental organizations are working more closely with law enforcement and that's leading to thousands of prosecutions. Last year, nearly 3,000 traffickers were convicted.

It's the law enforcement follow-through that counts most, and that's one reason why Nigeria moved into the top-tier rank. Over the last year, it investigated 209 trafficking cases resulting in 23 convictions - more than double the convictions from the year before.

That number is small considering that 150 million people live in this West African country. Nigeria is a source and a destination for coerced labor. Boys are forced to work as street vendors and beggars, in stone quarries and as domestics. Women and girls are trafficked mostly for the commercial sex trade and as servants.

But Nigeria's anti-trafficking trajectory is moving in the right direction. The government is making a concerted effort to train law enforcement and cooperate internationally. Last year it helped in the arrest of 60 Nigerian trafficking suspects in Europe. It has increased funding for its anti-trafficking program and is assisting victims by working with NGOs to provide shelter, counseling, and vocational training.

Nigeria's efforts are even more remarkable given what happened elsewhere on the continent. Of the seven countries demoted to the report's worst-performing category, six were from Africa (the seventh was Malaysia, where traffickers are exploiting migrants from Burma, or Myanmar).

Mr. CdeBaca said several of these countries had stalled in their commitment to curb "hereditary slavery," in which a slave caste serves the same families, sometimes going back hundreds of years. He singled out the West African countries of Chad, Mauritania, and Niger.

Human trafficking occurs in every country, including the United States - which for the first time will be rated in next year's report. No doubt, it, too, can do more to stop this serious crime.

At the end of the day, it's not enough to pass laws banning human trafficking. Cases must be investigated, suspects prosecuted, and traffickers convicted. Nigeria has shown the political will to follow through. Other countries can, too.

(c) Copyright 2009. The Christian Science Monitor

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Christian Science Publishing Society
All Rights Reserved

350 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Mirror (Sri Lanka)

June 19, 2009 Friday

'Lanka not doing enough to combat human trafficking'LENGTH: 574 wordsDATELINE: Colombo

Colombo, June 19 -- The United States has placed Sri Lanka together with India and 51 other countries, including China, Pakistan and Bangladesh on a "Tier 2 Watch List" for still not doing enough to combat human trafficking.

The report for 2008 released on Wednesday by the US State Department said Sri Lanka was primarily a source and, to a much lesser extent, a destination for men and women trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation. Sri Lankan men and women migrate willingly to Kuwait, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Lebanon, the United Arab Emirates, Oman, Bahrain, and Singapore to work as construction workers, domestic servants, or garment factory workers. Some of these workers find themselves in situations of involuntary servitude when faced with restrictions on movement, withholding of passports, threats, physical or sexual abuse, and debt bondage that is, in some instances, facilitated by large pre-departure fees imposed by labor recruitment agencies and their unlicensed sub-agents. The report said children were trafficked within the country for commercial sexual exploitation and, infrequently, for forced labour. It said a small number of women from Thailand, China, and Russia, and other countries of the former Soviet Union might be trafficked into Sri Lanka for commercial sexual exploitation. Sri Lanka does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Despite these overall efforts, the government has not shown evidence of progress in convicting and punishing trafficking offenders; therefore, Sri Lanka is placed on Tier 2 Watch List, the report said. While the Sri Lankan government did not achieve any convictions of trafficking offenders, it arrested 29 alleged traffickers and started prosecutions against ten people for trafficking-related offenses, an increase from the previous year when no one was arrested or prosecuted for trafficking-related crimes. It also drafted a national policy on migration that promises to prevent the trafficking of Sri Lankan migrants and it developed a national anti-trafficking task force that should become operational in the coming year. The report calls on Sri Lanka to vigorously investigate and prosecute suspected trafficking offenses and convict and punish trafficking offenders, particularly those responsible for recruiting victims with fraudulent offers of employment and excessive commission fees; follow through with the creation of the national anti-trafficking task force; develop and implement through training of law enforcement personnel formal victim referral procedures; and ensure that victims of trafficking found within Sri Lanka are not detained or otherwise penalized for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of their being trafficked. It also said although the Government of Sri Lanka made strides in arrests and prosecutions of alleged traffickers, it did not demonstrate adequate law enforcement efforts in addressing human trafficking cases over the reporting period. Sri Lanka prohibits all forms of trafficking through an April 2006 amendment to its penal code, which prescribes punishments of up to 20 years' imprisonment; these penalties are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with those prescribed for other grave offenses, such as rape. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Mirror Sri Lanka.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Wijeya Newspaper Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

351 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 19, 2009 Friday 7:53 AM GMTTaiwan cracks major human trafficking ring: reports*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 122 wordsDATELINE: TAIPEI June 19

Taiwan broke up the biggest human trafficking ring in the island's history, thwarting an operation to traffic young Chinese girls to the United States, the island's media reported Friday.

Taiwan's National Immigration Agency and the U.S. Department of Homeland Security conducted an eight-month joint investigation into the operation, which involved using Taiwanese passports for mainland Chinese girls, who were trafficked to the United States via Hong Kong to work in brothels, local media reported.

Taiwanese authorities reportedly arrested 74 members of the ring.

The U.S. State Department lists Taiwan as a "Tier 2" territory in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report, indicating a high level of human trafficking and smuggling.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Kyodo News Service
All Rights Reserved

352 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 19, 2009 Friday

POLICE DENY NOT DOING ENOUGH TO COMBAT HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 280 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 19

Police today refuted claims that the force was not doing enough to combat human trafficking, including those involving Myanmar refugees who were taken to Thailand from Malaysia, as mentioned in the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report 2009.

Deputy Inspector-General of Police Tan Sri Ismail Omar said on the contrary, police investigated all reports including those related to the trafficking of Myanmar into Thailand.

The TIP report downgraded Malaysia to Tier 3 this year from Tier 2 last year, putting the country on the US' human trafficking blacklist along with 16 other countries.

Describing the report as baseless, Ismail said the Malaysian authorities had been taking actions on the matter in accordance with the country's laws and regulations.

"In terms of enforcement, we have done our best to combat human trafficking. We have records to show that we have been discharging our duties to the best of our ability.

"We have also stationed personnel in border areas and in places which we think are prone to intrusion," he told reporters after closing the human right workshop for Asean police trainees at the Royal Malaysia Police College in Cheras, here today.

Ismail said that despite numerous challenges, he believed that police had the capability to tackle the crime.

"The important thing is that we are committed in discharging our duties and we are not alone... we have the support and cooperation from other agencies such as the Immigration, Customs and maritime enforcement agency," he said.

Apart from Malaysia, countries in the US blacklist for human trafficking include Zimbabwe, Sudan, Saudi Arabia, Myanmar, Papua New Guinea, Fiji and North Korea.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

353 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Mercury (South Africa)

June 19, 2009 Friday
e1 Edition

Trafficking warning for 2010

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2LENGTH: 195 words

The US government has warned South Africa to be ready for a possible upsurge of trafficking in prostitutes, especially children, into the country before the World Cup next year.

Washington has upgraded South Africa by one rank in its latest human trafficking report because of the government's "significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking".

The US State Department's 2009 Trafficking in Persons report, released this week, raises South Africa from "Tier 2 Watchlist" to "Tier 2" largely because of greater efforts by the police and judiciary to prosecute human traffickers, and the drafting of a dedicated anti-human trafficking bill.

The report says that "South Africa is a source, transit, and destination country for trafficked men, women, and children." This includes girls for prostitution and domestic servitude, and both boys and girls for the removal of their organs for "muti".

Ray Brown, political counsellor at the US embassy in Pretoria, said: "We are very happy to be a partner with the South African government in combating this problem because of its serious commitment to tackling it." - Independent Foreign Service

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: NM

354 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 19, 2009 FridayPRESS STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, MALAYSIA
US TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 2009*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 363 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia

The following information was released by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Malaysia:

Malaysia is concerned that it has been downgraded to Tier 3 in the US Trafficking in Persons Report 2009 that was released on 16 June 2009. The categorisation of countries into groups or Tiers is based solely on the US perception of that country's record relating to trafficking in persons. Malaysia was placed at Tier 2 (watch list) in 2008.

Malaysia implemented in 2007 the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act, which will result in better prosecution as well as protection and rehabilitation related to trafficking in persons. The implementation of the Act will lead to Malaysia attaining the highest possible standards in addressing trafficking in persons. The seriousness of Malaysia in handling this issue is also reflected by the increased number of prosecutions and number of victims saved thus far. The efforts that have been undertaken and that will be implemented to address this issue have obviously not taken into account in the US Trafficking in Persons Report (which covers the period April 2008 until March 2009).

It should be noted that YB Datuk Anifah Aman, Minister of Foreign Affairs had met with the US Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton and Senator Richard Lugar, the Ranking Minority Member of US Senate Committee on Foreign Relation during the Minister's visit to the United States on 14-15 May 2009. During these meetings, the Foreign Minister had informed the US side that the Malaysian Prime Minister was deeply concerned about the allegations of Malaysian officials being involved with trafficking in persons and had ordered the relevant Ministers to investigate these allegations. The investigations are now ongoing.

As the issue related to trafficking in persons might involve many parties, the Foreign Minister had also expressed his hope to Secretary Clinton that this matter would be explored and discussed at the regional level and international levels.

Malaysia hopes that with the full implementation and improvements of the existing legislations, the issue pertaining to trafficking in persons will be fully addressed.

Minister of Foreign Affairs, Malaysia

PUTRAJAYA

LOAD-DATE: July 18, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

355 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Star (South Africa)

June 19, 2009 Friday
e1 Edition

SA warned of 2010 upsurge in human trafficking; The US says law is needed to deal with trade in human beings

BYLINE: Peter Fabricius

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 6

LENGTH: 642 words

The US government has warned South Africa to prepare for a possible upsurge of trafficking in prostitutes, especially children, into the country before the World Cup.

Washington has upgraded South Africa by one rank in its latest human trafficking report because of the SA government's "significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking".

The US State Department's 2009 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report released this week raises South Africa from the "Tier 2 Watchlist" to "Tier 2" largely because of greater efforts by the SA police and judiciary to prosecute human traffickers and the drafting of a dedicated anti-human-trafficking bill.

The TIP report, which probes human trafficking around the world, says "South Africa is a source, transit, and destination country for trafficked men, women, and children."

This includes boy children being trafficked within SA from rural areas to cities for forced street vending, begging and crime, girls for prostitution and domestic servitude; and both boys and girls for the removal of their organs for "muti".

The report says South African women are trafficked to Europe and the Middle East for domestic servitude and sexual exploitation; Nigerian syndicates have reportedly begun trafficking women from South Africa to the US for African migrant clients there; while women and girls from Thailand, Congo, India, the People's Republic of China, Taiwan, Russia, Ukraine, Mozambique and Zimbabwe are trafficked to South Africa for commercial sexual exploitation, domestic servitude... Some of these women are trafficked onward to Europe for sexual exploitation.

Many Thai women are trafficked into South Africa's illegal brothels while Eastern European organised crime units force women from Russia and Ukraine into debt-bonded prostitution in exclusive private men's clubs, the report says.

Organised traffickers from China bring victims from Lesotho, Mozambique and Swaziland to Joburg for exploitation locally or to send them on to other cities, and men from China and Taiwan are trafficked to mobile sweatshop factories in Chinese urban enclaves in South Africa.

"Young men and boys from Mozambique, Malawi, and Zimbabwe voluntarily migrate illegally to South Africa for farm work, sometimes labouring for months... with little or no pay and under conditions of involuntary servitude before unscrupulous employers have them arrested and deported as illegal immigrants.

"The Government of South Africa does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it made significant efforts to do so over the past year.

"The government opened prosecutions against 16 suspected trafficking offenders during the year. It is continuing to prepare for late 2009 passage and subsequent implementation of its comprehensive anti-trafficking law (the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill) by developing inter-agency operating procedures and training officials on the law, victim identification, and agency roles.

"Foreign victims in South Africa, however, still face inadequate protection from the government. Labour trafficking does not receive as much government attention as does sex trafficking.

The report recommends several concrete steps be taken to combat trafficking in South Africa - including the enactment of the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill, and implementation of the Children's Amendment Act of 2007.

Ray Brown, political counsellor at the US embassy in Pretoria, said the government should be vigilant ahead of 2010. He said that it was by no means clear that the new dedicated anti-trafficking legislation would be in place before the World Cup, but even without it the South African authorities could adapt and use other legislation such as the Sexual Offences Act and Child Protection Act.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: SW

356 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Atlas Shrugs

June 18, 2009 Thursday 9:13 AM EST

Muslim Countries lead in Trafficking and Slavery

BYLINE: Pamela Geller

LENGTH: 1343 words

Jun. 18, 2009 (Atlas Shrugs delivered by Newstex) --

We seek broader engagement based upon mutual interest and mutual respect. We will listen carefully, we will bridge misunderstanding, and we will seek common ground. We will be respectful even when we do not agree. Obama Obama, champion of the new magical world of kumbaya, common goals, harmony and Jew hating, somehow missed this. Even so, RESPECT IT! This is the garbage we decent Americans have to swallow.

Muslim Countries in Mideast, Africa Lead World in Human Trafficking Gil Ronen hat tip Davida if (sLinkData != "") document.write("Edit
");

(IsraelNN.com) Muslim countries in the Middle East and north-central Africa lead the world in human trafficking, according to a new U.S. State Department report. Of the 17 countries that were given the "Tier 3" listing reserved for the worst offenders, nine were Muslim countries or countries with a large Muslim population from these two regions. Tier 3 countries are defined as those whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards of the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008 and "are not making significant efforts to do so."

The Middle Eastern countries with Tier 3 status are Iran, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Syria. The north-central African countries are Mauritania, Chad, Sudan, Niger and Eritrea, all of which have very large Muslim populations. Algeria, Libya, Tunisia, Egypt, Iraq, Yemen, Bahrain, Qatar, the UAE and Lebanon are on the Tier 2 Watchlist "one step above Tier 3."

Shyima Hall, 19, was photographed for the State Department report in the windowless garage where she was kept for two years. Shyima was 10 when a wealthy Egyptian couple brought her from a poor village in northern Egypt to work in their home in California. She used to wake before dawn and often worked past midnight ironing clothes, mopping the marble floors and dusting the family's crystal. She sometimes worked up to 20 hours a day and earned $45 a month. (Photo: Traffic in Persons Report 2009).

The data in the report indicates that Muslim countries in the Middle East and Africa are continuing their centuries-old practice of human trafficking. Historians estimate that between 9 and 14 million black Africans were brought to the Americas in the Atlantic slave trade and between 11 and 18 million black African slaves crossed the Red Sea, Indian Ocean, and Sahara Desert between the Muslim conquests in the 7th century and 1900.

Iran: The report says that Iran is a source, transit, and destination for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and involuntary servitude. Iranian women are trafficked internally for the purpose of forced prostitution and forced marriage. Iranian and Afghan children living in Iran are trafficked internally for the purpose of forced marriage, commercial sexual exploitation, and involuntary servitude as beggars or laborers to pay debts, provide income, or support drug addiction of their families. Iranian women and girls are also trafficked to Pakistan, Turkey, Qatar, Kuwait, the United Arab Emirates, Iraq, France, Germany, and the United Kingdom for commercial sexual exploitation.

The State Department report noted that the Government of Iran does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to do so. Lack of access to Iran by U.S. Government officials impedes the collection of information on the country's human trafficking problem and the government's efforts to curb it.

North Africa and Middle East: Tier 3 countries are shaded maroon. (Traffic in Persons Report 2009).

Saudi Arabia, the report says, is a destination country for men and women trafficked for the purposes of involuntary servitude and, to a lesser extent, commercial sexual exploitation. Men and women from Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Pakistan, the Philippines, Indonesia, Sudan, Ethiopia, and many other countries voluntarily travel to Saudi Arabia as domestic servants or other low-skilled laborers, but some subsequently face conditions indicative of involuntary servitude, including restrictions on movement, withholding of passports, threats, physical or sexual abuse, and non-payment of wages.

Some Saudi men have also used legally contracted temporary marriages in countries such as Mauritania, Yemen, and Indonesia as a means by which to sexually exploit migrant workers. Females as young as seven years old are led to believe they are being wed in earnest, but upon arrival in Saudi Arabia subsequently become their husbands sexual slaves, are forced into domestic labor and, in some cases, prostitution. The Government of Saudi Arabia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making discernible efforts to do so.

Syria is principally a destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of domestic servitude and commercial sexual exploitation. Women from Iraq, Eastern Europe, former Soviet states, Somalia, and Morocco are recruited as cabaret dancers and subsequently forced into prostitution after their employers confiscate their passports and confine them to their work premises. A significant number of women and children in the large Iraqi refugee community in Syria are forced into sexual exploitation by criminal gangs or, in some cases, their families. Some desperate Iraqi families reportedly abandon their girls at the border with the expectation that traffickers on the Syrian side would arrange forged documents for the children and work in a nightclub or brothel. Iraqi families arrange for young girls to work in clubs and to be married, often multiple times, to men for the sole purpose of prostitution.

Africa: Tier 3 countries are shaded maroon. (Traffic in Persons Report 2009).

In Kuwait, the majority of trafficking victims are from among the over 500,000 foreign women recruited for domestic service work. Men and women migrate from Nepal, India, Sri Lanka, the Philippines, Indonesia, Pakistan, and Bangladesh in search of work in the domestic and sanitation industries. Although they migrate willingly to Kuwait, upon arrival some are subjected to conditions of forced labor from their sponsors and labor agents, such as withholding of passports, confinement, physical sexual abuse and threats of such abuse or other serious harm, and non-payment of wages with the intent of compelling their continued service.

Adult female migrant workers are particularly vulnerable, and consequently are often victims of sexual exploitation and forced prostitution. There have been instances of domestic workers who have fled from their employers, lured by the promise of well-paying service industry jobs, and being coerced into prostitution. In other cases, the terms of employment in Kuwait are wholly different from those agreed to in their home countries. The Government of Kuwait does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making sufficient efforts to do so.

What Obama did not mention

The report has four tiers altogether: Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watchlist and Tier 3. Israel is in Tier 2, the second-best listing. It should be noted, however, that statistics regarding trafficking in Israel are largely provided by powerful organizations inside Israel which have been accused of exaggerating the severity of the situation there for political reasons. U.S. President Barack Obama, himself a descendant of black Africans, did not mention the subject of Muslim human trafficking in his recent speech to the Arab world in Cairo. He did mention, however, that for centuries, black people in America suffered the lash of the whip as slaves and the humiliation of segregation, but did so in the context of talking about Palestinian suffering.

Newstex ID: 35847839

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on Demand") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on Demand are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2009 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2009 Atlas Shrugs

357 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Africa - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 18, 2009 Thursday

US names Zimbabwe as source, transit, destination country for human trafficking

LENGTH: 434 words

Text of report by South Africa-based ZimOnline website on 18 June

[Report by Nokuthula Sibanda: "Zim on US Human Trafficking Blacklist"]

HARARE -The United States (US) has named Zimbabwe alongside six other African countries, which it accuses of human trafficking.

In a document entitled "Trafficking in Persons Report" released by the US State Department on Tuesday, Washington also cited Chad, Eritrea, Niger, Mauritania, Swaziland and Sudan as some of the African countries responsible for human trafficking.

The report says Zimbabwe "is a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation", citing the global economic crisis as also adding to the demand side of human trafficking.

Some of the countries on the US "blacklist" are Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Cuba, Fiji, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Papua New Guinea and Syria, according to the US State Department report for 2009.

The black listed countries risk suspension of US non-humanitarian aid.

Over the past decade Zimbabwe -which was once a model African economy -experienced an unprecedented economic recession that in addition to hyperinflation was also seen in shortages of food, rising unemployment and poverty that forced millions to leave the country in search of greener pastures.

At least three million or a quarter of the southern African country's 12 million people live in exile after fleeing an economic crisis once described by the World Bank as the worst in the world outside a war zone.

Critics blame President Robert Mugabe -in power since independence from Britain in 1980 -for ruining the economy through repression and wrong policies.

Mugabe denies ruining the economy and instead says his country's problems are because of sanctions and sabotage by Britain and its Western allies opposed to his land reforms.

A unity government formed by Prime Minister Morgan Tsvangirai and Mugabe in February is yet to convince rich Western nations that the southern African country is firmly on the path to genuine reform for them give it much needed financial support to resuscitate its shattered economy.

Under the inclusive government, Zimbabwe has halted its spectacular economic collapse, abandoning its worthless currency and easing price controls, which has brought food back on to store shelves.

But with state coffers empty, unemployment at 94 per cent, more than half the population surviving on international food aid and some squabbles still dogging the unity government, the country remains mired in crisis.

Source: ZimOnline, Johannesburg, in English 18 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2009 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

358 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 18, 2009 Thursday

US report criticizes Caribbean over human trafficking

LENGTH: 773 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website

WASHINGTON, CMC - The United States has placed three Caribbean Community (CARICOM) countries on its "Tier 2 Watch List" and one on its "Special Case" in its ninth Annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report. The State Department has also placed six CARICOM nations on its "Tier 2" list. The report, released here Wednesday, listed Belize, Guyana, and St Vincent and the Grenadines in the "Tier 2 Watch List" category, and Haiti as the "Special Case." Antigua and Barbuda, the Bahamas, Barbados, Jamaica, Suriname, and Trinidad and Tobago are listed in the "Tier 2" category.

Tier 2 applies to countries considered to be making minimal efforts to satisfy the US anti-Trafficking in persons' requirement, while "Tier 2 Watch List" is when their efforts are not enough, according to US standards. Washington said that Belize is a "source, transit, and destination country" for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour. It said the most common form of trafficking in Belize is the internal sex trafficking of minors, particularly situations in which "poor families push their school-aged daughters to provide sexual favours to wealthy older men in exchange for school fees, money, and gifts." This 'sugar daddy' phenomenon occurs in Belize and other Caribbean countries, but often it is not recognised as a form of human trafficking by local communities or law enforcement personnel," the report said. It said the Belize government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. "Despite these overall significant efforts, the government did not show evidence of progress in convicting and sentencing trafficking offenders last year," the report said, adding "therefore, Belize is placed on Tier 2 Watch List". The US said Guyana is also a source country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour. It said Guyanese trafficking victims have been identified within the country, as well as in Barbados, Brazil, Trinidad and Tobago, and Suriname. It said the majority of victims are trafficked internally for sexual and labour exploitation in the more heavily populated coastal areas and in the remote areas of the country's interiors. "In coastal areas, traffickers promise rural women and girls jobs as domestic servants, then coerce them into working in shops or homes for little or no pay, or sell them to brothels," the report said, stating, too, that the Bharrat Jagdeo administration does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to do so. But, despite its overall efforts, the US said the government did not show evidence of progress in prosecuting and punishing acts of trafficking. The Guyana government has already criticised the US report. Washington said St Vincent and the Grenadines is a "potential source country for children trafficked internally for the purposes of sexual exploitation," adding it may also be a destination country for women trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation. "Anecdotal reporting suggests the number of victims trafficked in, to, or through St Vincent and the Grenadines is small. "Information on the full extent of human trafficking in St Vincent and the Grenadines, however, is lacking, as neither the government nor NGOs have conducted any related investigations, studies, or surveys," it said noting that "reports indicate that a traditional practice of sending children away from home to live with another family is sometimes misused for the purpose of coercing children into commercial sexual exploitation". Despite overall significant efforts, it said the Ralph Gonsalves' administration also did not provide "evidence of vigorous law enforcement efforts to combat trafficking by investigating reports of the commercial sexual exploitation of children and of women who may be forced to engage in prostitution." The State Department said Haiti remains a "Special Case" for the fourth consecutive year as the new government, formed in September 2008, has not yet been able to address the significant challenges facing the country, including human trafficking. "The US government, however, notes the progress of Haiti's government, and urges the Government of Haiti to take immediate action to address its serious trafficking-in-persons problems," the report said.

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1450 gmt 18 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2009 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

359 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 18, 2009 Thursday 8:38 PM TST

Taiwan needs to do more to fight human trafficking: U.S. report

BYLINE: Roger Chou

LENGTH: 659 words

DATELINE: Taipei, June 18

Taiwan has made some progress in combating human trafficking over the past year, but should do much more, including extending labor protections to all categories of workers to prevent labor trafficking, according to the just-released 2009 U.S. Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The annual report placed Taiwan in Tier 2 ranking, which is for governments that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking prescribed by the U.S. law that guides anti-human trafficking efforts - the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

Governments that fully comply are placed in Tier 1. Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed in Tier 3.

"Taiwan authorities made noticeable progress during the reporting period by passing a new anti-trafficking law, bolstering law enforcement efforts, and approving a budget plan of $14US.8 million for victim protection measures," the report acknowledged.

Trafficked victims - including men, women and children - are usually brought to Taiwan for forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation, according to the report.

Most trafficking victims are workers from rural areas of Vietnam, Thailand, Indonesia, and the Philippines. They are employed through recruitment agencies and brokers to perform low-skilled work in Taiwan's construction, fishing, and manufacturing industries, or to work as domestic helpers.

"Many of these workers fall victim to labor trafficking by unscrupulous brokers and employers, who force workers to perform work outside the scope of their contract and often under exploitative conditions," the report said, which is available online.

Some women and girls from China and Southeast Asian countries are trafficked to Taiwan through fraudulent marriages, deceptive employment offers, and illegal smuggling for sexual exploitation and forced labor, the report found.

It said many migrant workers are charged job placement and service fees up to the equivalent of $14US,000, some of which are unlawful.

The report added that this results in substantial debt for the workers that unscrupulous labor brokers or employers may use as a coercive tool to subject the workers to involuntary servitude.

"Many foreign workers remain vulnerable to trafficking because legal protections, oversight by authorities and enforcement efforts are currently inadequate," said the report.

Taiwan's regulations currently allow employers to implement a system of "forced savings," whereby employers deduct up to 30 percent of a foreign worker's monthly salary to be placed in a bank account in the worker's name, but inaccessible to the worker, the report said. This system has facilitated trafficking, it said.

The report cited NGOs saying that immigration, police and local law enforcement officials continue to view trafficking victims as runaways or criminals, resulting in some victims being penalized rather than assisted.

In addition to recommending that Taiwan extend labor protections to all categories of workers, the report also suggested that Taiwan implement its new comprehensive anti-trafficking law and effectively carry out its victim and witness protections so that victims are not penalized for acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked, which would encourage them to seek help.

It also suggested Taiwan increase police efforts to investigate trafficking crimes and to identify trafficking victims, and improve cooperation with governments of labor source countries on trafficking investigations.

Taiwan's National Immigration Agency (NIA), which did not have a direct response to the findings of the report, said Thursday that Taiwan has remained on Tier 2 in the annual report for three consecutive years. It said Japan and Singapore also received Tier 2 ranking.

The agency said Taiwan was placed on Tier 2 Watch List in 2006 and upgraded to Tier 2 the next year.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

360 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

June 18, 2009

Trafficking battle call

BYLINE: BEGENA P PRADEEP

LENGTH: 754 words

BAHRAIN must step up the battle against human trafficking, according to a new US State Department report.

The country remains on a special watchlist of nations being monitored for what action they are taking to combat the problem, despite issuing new guidelines on the employment conditions of migrant workers.

Bahrain was one of 170 nations included in the ninth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP), which said it did little to improve its services to protect victims of trafficking.

It was placed in the second tier watchlist for failing to enforce laws against trafficking in persons and prevent the punishment of victims of trafficking.

This put it alongside countries such as Algeria, Azerbaijan, Bangladesh, Cambodia, China, Egypt, Ghana, India, Iraq, Lebanon, Libya, Pakistan, Philippines, Russia, Sri Lanka, Tajikistan, Tunisia and Uzbekistan.

However, Bahrain was ahead of most of the other Gulf countries, who ranked in the third tier, except Oman.

The US State Department is required by law to submit an annual report to Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of human trafficking.

Interim assessments are also made to gauge the anti-trafficking progress of countries.

Those in the first tier have governments that fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorisation Act (TVPA)'s minimum standards, while second tier countries are those whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The US ranks countries in the third tier as those whose governments do not fully comply with the act's minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so.

The report recommends that Bahrain significantly increases its investigation and prosecution of trafficking offences, particularly those involving forced labour.

It was also advised to apply formal procedures to identify victims of trafficking to ensure that victims are not punished for illegal migration or prostitution.

"The government made modest progress in conducting anti-trafficking law enforcement during the year, prosecuting its first case under its January 2008 anti-trafficking statute," said the report.

"The Interior Ministry's specialised unit investigated trafficking crimes, particularly those involving sex trafficking, claiming to have disbanded a prostitution ring and rescued 43 Chinese women believed to be trafficking victims.

"But prosecutors reportedly viewed the evidence as insufficient to pursue legal action."

The report noted that last December a Thai woman was jailed for three and a half years and fined BD5,000 for trafficking three other Thais into Bahrain for prostitution.

"During this time, the government reportedly closed several manpower agencies alleged to have confiscated workers' passports, switched contracts, or withheld payment of salaries," it said.

"The government also ordered 12 employers to pay back and release their workers."

The report said the law against withholding workers' passports, a common practice affecting migrant workers, was not enforced effectively and remains widespread.

It said the majority of victims sought shelter at their embassies or through the Migrant Workers Protection Society, which received a grant of BD6,000 from the government to operate its shelter.

Labour Market Regulatory Authority (LMRA) reforms allowing workers to change employers criminalising the use of "free visas" was praised.

However, the report noted that regulations do not apply to domestic workers, who are most vulnerable to forced labour.

"The government continued to lack a formal procedure to identify victims among vulnerable groups, such as domestic workers who have left their employers or women arrested for prostitution," it said.

The report said long legal delays and a perceived bias against foreign workers by judges and prosecutors discouraged workers from filing cases.

However, it noted that Bahrain's efforts to prevent trafficking had increased in the last year.

"The Interior Ministry produced a brochure describing Bahrain's anti-trafficking law, distributing them to at-risk groups upon arrival in the country, and soliciting complaints to its hotline for investigations," it said.

Bahrain was also praised for providing services and support valued at more than $60,000 (BD22,617) allowing 315 civil society volunteers, journalists, foreign diplomats, and government officials, including LMRA officials to be trained.

Foreign Ministry officials were yesterday unavailable for comment.
begena@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

361 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Jordan Times (Amman)

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 18, 2009 Thursday'Anti-trafficking measures fall short of standards'*BYLINE: Hani Hazaimah, Jordan Times, AmmanSECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 1029 words

Jun. 18--AMMAN -- A US State Department report on human trafficking released on Tuesday acknowledged the government is making significant efforts to fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but they are still not enough.

The State Department on Tuesday posted its ninth annual Trafficking in Persons Report on its website, which came in 318 pages, covering 170 countries across the globe.

The report said: "Jordan is a destination and transit country for women and men from South and Southeast Asia for the purpose of forced labour." However, it advanced the Kingdom's status to Tier 2, compared to Tier 2 Watch List in 2008, indicating progress in the Kingdom's push to eliminate human trafficking.

An official, who spoke to The Jordan Times on condition of anonymity Wednesday, said the government will reply to the allegations included in the report after it is studied by a special ad hoc committee tasked with examining and responding to international reports.

The report alleged that "women from Morocco and Tunisia [are] being subjected to forced prostitution after arriving in Jordan to work in restaurants and nightclubs".

The report added some women from other countries, such as Bangladesh, Sri Lanka, Indonesia and the Philippines who migrate willingly to work as domestic servants, are subjected to conditions of forced labour, citing a ban on new Filipina workers migrating to the Kingdom for domestic work because of "a high rate of abuse of Filipina domestic workers by employers in Jordan".

The report highlighted efforts by the government to address trafficking, citing a recently endorsed Anti-Trafficking Law that prohibits all forms of trafficking and imposes penalties of up to 10 years imprisonment for forced prostitution and trafficking involving aggravating circumstances such as the trafficking of a child or trafficking involving a public official.

"The government of Jordan made improved efforts to criminally punish trafficking offenders during the reporting period," the report said, adding, however, that penalties prescribed for labour trafficking offences not involving aggravating circumstances are limited to a minimum of six months imprisonment and a maximum fine of JD5,000 -- penalties that are not sufficiently stringent.

"Although the Jordanian government did not provide comprehensive data on its Anti-Trafficking Law enforcement efforts over the last year," the State Department said, "it reported investigating at least 19 cases, of which 10 were sent to judicial authorities for prosecution and nine were resolved administratively."

During 2008, the Ministry of Labour closed seven labour recruitment agencies for offences related to forced labour, and investigated 535 general labour complaints received from Jordanian and foreign workers through the ministry's hotline, which included some indicators of forced labour, such as employers withholding workers' passports, according to the report.

It added: "In late 2008, the Criminal Investigation Department [CID] investigated the forced prostitution of two Tunisian women and arrested their trafficker. In early 2009, the CID investigated and forwarded for prosecution two cases, involving seven women, of forced labour in nightclubs."

Meanwhile, the report underlined that the government in 2008 began prosecuting 75 municipal employees in Karak for abuses of their power that included forging work permits for migrant workers.

"During the year, the government amended its Labour Law to cover agriculture and domestic workers, passed comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, initiated a joint labour inspector and police anti-trafficking investigation unit, started a Human Trafficking Office within the Public Security Directorate's Criminal Investigation Unit, and improved efforts to identify victims of trafficking and related exploitation among foreign domestic workers, foreign labourers in the Qualifying Industrial Zones, and foreign women in prostitution," the report said.

In its recommendations, the report called on the Kingdom to enforce the Anti-Trafficking Law "by increasing efforts to investigate, prosecute and sentence trafficking offenders, particularly those involving forced labour; [and] complet[ing] regulations defining the terms of employment for domestic workers and those governing the operation of recruitment agencies".

The recommendations also included enhancing the services available for trafficking victims to include shelter, implementing a comprehensive awareness campaign to educate the public on trafficking and forced labour, focusing on domestic workers and the new Anti-Trafficking Law, and strengthening efforts to proactively identify victims of trafficking and forced labour and ensure victims are not punished for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of their being trafficked.

Regarding the government's efforts to prevent trafficking, the report said the Ministry of Labour collaborated with local NGOs to raise awareness of labour trafficking through ads on billboards and public service announcements in the print media and via radio, and continued training labour inspectors on various facets of human trafficking. Efforts also included the distribution of a guidebook on protection of foreign domestic workers, including hotlines to report abuse.

"The human trafficking phenomenon affects virtually every country, including the United States. In acknowledging America's own struggle with modern-day slavery and slavery-related practices, we offer partnership. We call on every government to join us in working to build consensus and leverage resources to eliminate all forms of human trafficking," US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in a statement posted on the State Department website.

To see more of the Jordan Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.jordantimes.com>. Copyright (c) 2009, Jordan Times, Amman Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20090618-JT-Anti-trafficking-measures-fall-short-of-standards-0618

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: JT

362 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Kuwait Times

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 18, 2009 Thursday

Khorafi, MPs blast US over trafficking report

BYLINE: B Izzak, Kuwait Times

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 622 words

Jun. 18--KUWAIT -- National Assembly Speaker Jassem Al-Khorafi and several lawmakers yesterday blasted the United States for keeping Kuwait on its trafficking in persons blacklist and accusing Kuwait of not doing enough to improve human rights conditions of expatriate manpower. Khorafi harshly criticized Washington, saying the United States believes it is a country of angels and a guardian of the entire world.

I have repeatedly said that Kuwait is not a country of angels but what hurts me is that the United States thinks itself to be a country of angels," Khorafi told reporters in comments over the new US Trafficking in Persons report. The speaker said that the picture the report depicted about Kuwait is "neither true nor adequate and I think those who prepared the report did not consult with the US embassy in Kuwait.

Khorafi said that he hopes that the US leadership realizes that "it is not the world's police and not a guardian of the world and if it wants to be so it should make sure that the information it gathers is true". He added that Kuwait has an Assembly and a parliamentary committee for human rights which receives and follows up any complaints from any side and tries to resolve them with concerned authorities. Khorafi called on the government to respond to the accusations in the report through a detailed reply , describing the report as excessive.

Kuwait was among 17 countries on the blacklist. The report accused Kuwait of admitting men and women from Asia and Africa to work as servants but then subjecting them to involuntary servitude. It however said that Kuwait has made some progress in punishing culprits.

Liberal MP Aseel Al-Awadhi meanwhile said the material in the report is regrettable and rings danger bells about the inhuman conditions of expatriate laborers. She accused the government of failing to deal with the issue of expatriate labor. MP Adnan Abdulsamad said Washington should better focus on improving human rights conditions in the United States rather than criticizing others.

MP Saleh Ashour admitted there are violations against expatriate manpower, but added that authorities are taking legal actions against violators. MP Hassan Jowhar said the US report includes many facts about the reality in Kuwait and demanded for finding a fundamental solution to the problems of expatriates in the country.

In another development, Interior Minister Sheikh Jaber Al-Khaled Al-Sabah yesterday met with a number of MPs and discussed with them the implications of the grilling scheduled to be debated on June 23. MP Mubarak Al-Waalan, who attended the meeting, hailed the minister for accepting to face the grilling but added that he will support the grilling against the minister. Sheikh Jaber on Tuesday referred the first issue raised by the grilling to the public prosecution for an investigation. The first point alle ges that the Interior Ministry awarded a KD 5.3 million contract in violation of the law and in which costs were highly exaggerated.

Meanwhile, MP Khaled Al-Sultan yesterday resigned as secretary general of the Islamic Salaf Alliance, but added he will remain a member of the political bureau of the Salafist group. Sultan has been in the post for the past 17 years. Salafist MP Ali Al-Omair was appointed acting secretary general until a permanent official is elected.

To see more of The Kuwait Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.kuwaittimes.net/>. Copyright (c) 2009, Kuwait Times Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20090618-KU-Khorafi-MPs-blast-US-over-trafficking-report-0618

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: KU

Copyright 2009 Kuwait Times

363 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 18, 2009 ThursdayCOMMENDED IN US REPORT ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING*LENGTH: 370 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 18

Although Malaysia was placed on the United States human trafficking blacklist, the Women, Family and Community Development Ministry was commended in the same report, its minister, senator Datuk Seri Shahrizat Abdul Jalil, said today.

She said the ministry had done well in combating human trafficking.

"My ministry has done everything we can to combat this threat. We do not want Malaysia to be a port of call for this sort of undesirable activities. However, being blacklisted was due to many aspects such as women, labour and refugees.

"According to the American embassy here, they are very happy with the steps taken by my ministry, especially since we do not condone such acts as this issue is close to our hearts," Shahrizat told reporters here.

Asked about the Parti Keadilan Rakyat women's wing's success in pushing through a constitutional amendment for a 30 per cent quota for women leaders at all levels of the party, Shahrizat said she was happy that the Opposition had achieved something based on her presentation in the Cabinet back in 2004.

"On Aug 4, 2004, the Cabinet gave approval on a policy to ensure that at least 30 per cent of high-profile positions would be allocated to women. It's good to see that the opposition has managed to achieve something that I initiated in the BN (Barisan Nasional)," she said.

She said a paper on Wanita Umno's own 30 per cent quota was being prepared for submission to party vice-president Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein.

Shahrizat, who is also Wanita Umno chief, also said that she would send a letter of invitation to the PAS women's wing chief, Nuridah Saleh, tomorrow to initiate unity talks.

She hoped that Nuridah would accept her invitation and put political ideologies aside to overcome the political crisis faced by the country.

However, minutes after the news conference, 10 PAS Members of Parliament, including those from the women's wing strongly turned down any talks on a unity government.

"We PAS MPs would like to state that we hold strongly to the decision of the PAS general assembly which unanimously wants PAS to strengthen the opposition alliance and reject any form of cooperation with Umno/BN, including the unity government," they said in a statement.

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

364 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

June 18, 2009 Thursday

Trafficking worsens in Philippines

BYLINE: Llanesca T. Panti And Angelo S. Samonte

LENGTH: 833 words

Human trafficking situation in the Philippines fell a notch after the US State Department kept the country on the Tier 2 Watch List on Wednesday.

Tier 2 means that number of victims of severe forms of trafficking was increasing significantly.

According to the 2009 US Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report for the Philippines, the country was put on Tier 2 Watch List because the government failed to show evidence of progress in convicting human traffickers, particularly those in labor trafficking. The report added the situation here worsened, despite the significant government efforts.

The report described the country as a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor. A significant number of Filipino men and women who migrate abroad for work were also subjected to involuntary servitude in Bahrain, Brunei, Canada, Cote d'Ivoire, Cyprus, Hong Kong, Japan, Kuwait, Lebanon, Malaysia, Palau, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Singapore, South Africa, Taiwan, Turkey and the United Arab Emirates, the report added.

Even Muslim girls from Mindanao were being trafficked to the Middle East by other Muslims, according to the report.

Filipino women were also trafficked abroad for commercial sexual exploitation, primarily to Hong Kong, Japan, Malaysia, Singapore, South Korea and countries in Africa, the Middle East and Western Europe.

"Internally, women and children are trafficked from poor farming communities in the Visayas and Mindanao to urban areas, such as Manila and Cebu City, but also increasingly to cities in Mindanao, for commercial sexual exploitation or for forced labor as domestic servants or factory workers," the report also said. "An increasing number of women and children from Mindanao were trafficked internally and transnationally for domestic work."

As a result, the Philippines ranked one notch lower in the Tier 2. The country has been in that status for three years.

Countries with Tier 1 status are seen as doing a good job against human trafficking.

Worse situation

In the same US report, the Philippines inched closer to Tier 3, which groups countries that did not implement considerable measures to breach the minimum target.

Thirty-nine other countries are on the Tier 2 list, which is a notch higher than the lowest ranking of Tier 3. Countries in this category could face sanctions from Washington, such as the withholding of non-humanitarian or non-trade related US aid.

Human traffickers, according to the report, use land and sea transportations to transfer victims from island provinces to major cities. The criminals also use budget airline carriers to transport victims out of the country, a growing trend.

"Traffickers used fake travel documents, falsified permits and altered birth certificates," it said.

The migrant workers were cited as the most vulnerable of the victims, since they were often subjected to violence, threats, inhumane living conditions, non-payment of salaries, and withholding of travel and identity documents.

A small number of women were also occasionally trafficked from the People's Republic of China, Russia, South Korea and Eastern Europe to the Philippines for commercial sexual exploitation.

The report, citing information from non-government organizations, also disclosed that organized crime syndicates, including syndicates from Japan, were heavily involved in Manila's commercial sex industry. International organized crime syndicates also transported people from mainland China through the Philippines to third-country destinations.

"Child sex tourism continues to be a serious problem for the Philippines, with sex tourists coming from Northeast Asia, Australia, Europe, and North America to engage in sexual activity with minors," it said.

The report said that only four trafficking convictions were obtained in the Philippines under the 2003 anti-trafficking law during the reporting period. Plus, there were no reported labor trafficking convictions, despite widespread reports of Filipinos trafficked for forced labor within the country and abroad.

Palace vows action

The government vowed to intensify its campaign against human trafficking in light of the US report.

"We have to advise authorities, like the Bureau of Immigration, to be on look out for such activity [human trafficking]," Executive Secretary Eduardo Ermita said. "We won't tolerate human trafficking and BI should be alerted to be more focused in monitoring not just in the port of Manila but also in Davao, Cebu and Zamboanga."

He added that he does not believe that the US government would sanction the Philippines for failing to effectively address human- trafficking issues in the country.

"We're a sovereign state, and we have own laws and legal system," Ermita said. "I don't suppose we can be sanctioned if we feel under sovereign state to undertake violations of law like trafficking we can't be dictated upon. They should respect our sovereignty."

LOAD-DATE: June 24, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

365 of 404 DOCUMENTS

South China Morning Post

June 18, 2009 Thursday

US says HK slipping in exploitation fight

BYLINE: Phyllis Tsang

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 02

LENGTH: 294 words

The US State Department yesterday said Hong Kong was doing worse in combating human-trafficking within its borders.

The department for the first time downgraded the city from tier 1 to tier 2 status in its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report", which has been mandated by the US Congress since 2001.

"Hong Kong is primarily a transit point for illegal migrants, some of whom are subject to conditions of debt bondage, forced commercial sexual exploitation, forced commercial sexual exploitation, and forced labour," the report said.

It said some women in Hong Kong's commercial sex trade were believed to be victims of trafficking. Some had been lured under false pretences by crime syndicates or acquaintances and then had their passports confiscated when they arrived, leaving them trapped by debt.

Foreign domestic workers also faced high levels of debt owing to the terms of their employment, it said.

The Hong Kong government did "not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking" and "did not investigate, prosecute, or convict any trafficking offenders", the report said.

A government spokesman called the report's criticisms "unfounded and unfair".

"We do not see any difference, certainly no deterioration, in the trend of such crimes or the effectiveness of our law enforcement in term of number of arrests, prosecution or convictions," he said. The government was disappointed that Hong Kong was ranked as tier 2, he said.

The mainland was listed on the tier 2 "watch list" as "a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purpose of forced labour and sexual exploitation." If China does not improve its record, it will be moved to tier 3 next year, barring a presidential waiver.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

366 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 18, 2009 Thursday 1:03 PM EST

Release of the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 429 wordsDATELINE: PORT LOUIS, Mauritius

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

On Tuesday, June 16, 2009, U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton released the ninth annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report at a press conference in the State Department's Press Briefing Room in Washington, D.C.

In the 2009 TIP Report, the rating for Mauritius has been upgraded from Tier 2 to Tier 1. Countries assessed as meeting the minimum standards of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act are classified as Tier 1. The Parliament's passage of a comprehensive human trafficking law in April 2009 brought Mauritius into full compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Mauritius sustained its strong efforts to identify, address and prevent incidences of trafficking in the last year. Government officials demonstrated an increasing level of awareness of human trafficking and commitment to address the problem. Public awareness projects, particularly those convened for school students by police officers and the National Children's Council, were frequently conducted and broad-reaching. There was also improvement in the protections available to trafficking victims. According to the 2009 TIP Report, the government made notable efforts to prevent the sex trafficking of children and reduce the demand for commercial sex acts during the year.

This 175-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, a modern-day form of slavery. Its findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons.

This year the State Department TIP report recommends that to advance its anti-trafficking efforts, the Government of Mauritius could utilize newly passed anti-trafficking legislation to investigate and prosecute trafficking offenses and convict and punish trafficking offenders.

This year's Report includes a particular focus on the effects of the global economic crisis on the supply and demand of human trafficking. Modern-day slavery continues to be a problem in nearly every country in the world and traffickers continue to search for new opportunities to exploit men, women, and children.

The full text of the TIP Report is available on the State Department's website, www.state.gov/g/tip. The Mauritius country report is also available from the "Country reports" feature box on the homepage of the Embassy website: <http://mauritius.usembassy.gov>.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS C-AmbRan 100110-MT93-2565358 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: January 12, 2010LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Targeted News Service LLC
All Rights Reserved

367 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 17, 2009 Wednesday 5:54 AM GMT

Malaysia opposes its re-listing on US trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 326 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, June 17 2009

Malaysia has accused the United States of unfair treatment over its decision to re-list the country on a human trafficking blacklist.

Washington's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report", released yesterday, says Malaysia is failing to comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking and "is not making significant efforts to do so".

Last year the report elevated Malaysia to a "watch list" from the 2007 blacklist after finding that it was "making significant efforts" to comply with standards.

"It is unfair to put us back on the list as we are doing our best," Malaysian Deputy Home Minister Abu Seman Yusop told reporters.

"We will have to consider our next action in opposing the re-listing of our country on the blacklist," he added.

Abu Seman said the Malaysian government did not condone human trafficking and had taken stern action to deal with the problem, including enacting an anti-human trafficking law in 2007 and setting up a special task force.

The report said that while the Malaysian government took early steps to fight sex trafficking, it has yet to fully tackle labour trafficking.

It said there were "credible allegations", including those in a US Senate report this year, that some immigration officials took part in trafficking and extorting refugees from Myanmar.

Malaysia, which is listed with 16 other countries, including six newly-added African nations, could face sanctions such as the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade related US aid.

Malaysian Prime Minister Najib Razak said recently his country was being used as a transit point for illegal immigrants.

Recent incidents include the arrests of 17 Iraqis and seven Indonesians over the weekend after authorities intercepted a boat that was trying to smuggle some of them to Australia via Indonesia.

Authorities have said 12 suspected illegal immigrants were drowned off Malaysia's southern coast in the last two months when they tried to sneak out of the country.

rb-ly/ft

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

368 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 17, 2009 Wednesday 2:55 AM GMT

AFP Asia news agenda

LENGTH: 668 words

DATELINE: HONG KONG, June 17 2009

Duty Editor: Adrian Addison

News Desk: +852 2829 6211

ASIA NEWS HIGHLIGHTS ON WEDNESDAY

+ China's Hu meets Medvedev, Putin in Moscow

+ Pakistan president in talks with NATO, EU

MOSCOW: Chinese President Hu Jintao meets Russian counterpart Dmitry Medvedev and Prime Minister Vladimir Putin. Medvedev at 0900 GMT. Putin at 0600 GMT (RUSSIA-CHINA-DIPLOMACY)

BRUSSELS: Pakistan's President Asif Ali Zardari visits for talks at NATO headquarters and a landmark summit with senior European Union officials. 0830 GMT (EU-PAKISTAN-SUMMIT, NATO-PAKISTAN-DIPLOMACY)

-- OTHER STORIES --

BEIJING: Reporting on seven teachers and students from a Californian school who have been diagnosed with swine flu in China (HEALTH-FLU-CHINA-US-SCHOOL)

-- Attending press conference at 0200 GMT by environmental group Greenpeace and poverty alleviation group Oxfam on how climate change worsens conditions for the poor (CHINA-CLIMATE-ENVIRONMENT-GREENPEACE)

-- Moving a story on the start of a new campaign against corruption in the booming city of Shenzhen, just north of Hong Kong, as China prepares for the sensitive 60th anniversary of the communist state (CHINA-POLITICS-ECONOMY-CORRUPTION)

-- Chinese share prices down 0.28 percent (STOCKS-CHINA-OPEN)

JAKARTA: Monitoring the rescue effort after more than 40 miners were feared dead after a massive explosion of methane gas collapsed a coal mine (INDONESIA-MINING-LANDSLIDE)

KUALA LUMPUR: Watching after the US relisted Malaysia on its human trafficking blacklist (MALAYSIA-US-RIGHTS-TRAFFICKING)

MANILA: Asian Development Bank (ADB) president Haruhiko Kuroda and climate change expert Rajendra Pachauri discuss effects of climate change on Asia at a forum on 0300 GMT (ADB-ASIA-CLIMATE-ECONOMY)

PESHAWAR, Pakistan: Covering as Pakistan military prepares to launch a fresh offensive against Taliban leader in tribal areas bordering Afghanistan (PAKISTAN-UNREST)

PHNOM PENH: Reporting on the UN-backed war crimes trial of former Khmer Rouge prison chief Duch (CAMBODIA-UN-TRIAL)

SEOUL: Watching developments in North Korean nuclear standoff after US President Barack Obama describes its atomic programme as a "grave threat" (NKOREA-NUCLEAR)

-- Football. South Korea vs Iran in World Cup qualifier, kick-off 1100 GMT

(FBL-WC2010-ASIA-KOR-IRN)

SINGAPORE: Reporting on world oil prices in Asian trade (COMMODITIES-ENERGY-OIL-ASIA-PRICE)

-- Singapore releases export data for May (SINGAPORE-ECONOMY-TRADE)

SYDNEY: Football. World Cup qualifier, Australia v Japan in Melbourne (FBL-WC2010-AUS-JPN)

- Covering case of a Melbourne underworld matriarch accused over the execution-style killing of her brother-in-law, in a case police describe as too far fetched for television (AUSTRALIA-CRIME-GANGS)

TOKYO: Japan's Prime Minister Taro Aso holds a one-on-one debate in parliament with opposition leader Yukio Hatoyama after his approval rating slumped below 20 percent ahead of a general election (JAPAN-POLITICS)

-- Philippine President Gloria Arroyo arrives on a four-day visit (JAPAN-PHILIPPINES-DIPLOMACY)

-- Bank of Japan releases a monthly report on economic and financial developments for June (JAPAN-ECONOMY)

-- The dollar fell against the yen and rose against the euro (FOREX-ASIA)

-- Share prices rose 0.40 percent in morning trade (STOCKS-JAPAN)

-- Moving a feature on the unique Japanese sport of sumo, which is attracting more foreigners as young Japanese prefer other sports (JAPAN-LIFESTYLE-SUMO-JPN) and an interview with a Mongolian sumo champion who details the harsh life that recruits face (JAPAN-LIFESTYLE-SUMO-JPN-MONGOLIA-CONDITIONS)

WASHINGTON: Secretary of State Hillary Clinton opens a US-India business summit (US-INDIA-TRADE)

WELLINGTON: France names team for second Test against the All Blacks (RUGBYU-FRA-NZL-TEAM)

YANGON: Reporting on an application at Myanmar's high court by Aung San Suu Kyi's lawyers to appeal against a ban on two witnesses in her trial on charges of breaking her house arrest rules (MYANMAR-POLITICS-SUUKYI)

afp

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

369 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Asian News International (ANI)

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

US report puts India under watch for human trafficking

BYLINE: ANILENGTH: 182 words

Washington June 17(ANI): A US report on global human trafficking has placed India in tier 2 watch list of countries.

The report that was released by the Secretary of State Hillary Clinton expressed its unhappiness over the failure of Indian authorities to curb human smuggling.

The 2009 Trafficking in Persons, report observed that in recent years, there has been an increase of sex trafficking to sub cities and India is a destination for women and girls from Nepal and Bangladesh for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation.

The report also says that, India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. It also says that India is making significant efforts to control it.

Despite the efforts put by the Indian Government, there was no sufficient progress in its law enforcement to address human trafficking, the report observed.

The report also mentions that, the Indian labours who migrate willingly to Middle East, Europe, and the US in search of work as domestic servants and un skilled labourers, are becoming the victims of labour trafficking.(ANI)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: 239

370 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

US adds Malaysia to human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 647 words

Text of report in English by Malaysian independent website Malaysiakini, owned by Mkinin Dotcom, on 17 June

[Unattributed report: "M'sia, 6 African nations join 'modern slavery' list"]

The United States today added six African countries to a blacklist of countries trafficking in people, and put US trading partner Malaysia back on the list.

Chad, Eritrea, Niger, Mauritania, Swaziland, and Zimbabwe were added to the list in the annual report, which analysed efforts in 173 countries to fight trafficking in humans for forced labour, prostitution, military service and other reasons.

Staying on the blacklist list are US allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait but also Cuba, Fiji, Iran, Burma, North Korea, Papua New Guinea, Sudan, and Syria, according to the State Department report for 2009.

Removed from the list were Qatar, Oman, Algeria, and Moldova.

"This is modern slavery, a crime that spans the globe, providing ruthless employers with an endless supply of people to abuse for financial gain," US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said in introducing the report.

The 'Trafficking in Persons Report' said "the global economic crisis is also boosting the demand side of human trafficking."

The 17 countries on the blacklist could face sanctions, including the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade related US aid.

The report said Malaysia fails not only to "fully comply" with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking but "is not making significant efforts to do so."

Last year the report elevated Malaysia to a "watch list" from the 2007 blacklist after finding that it was "making significant efforts" to comply with such standards.

The new report said that while the government took early steps to fight sex trafficking, it has yet to fully tackle labour trafficking in Malaysia.

It also said there were "credible allegations," including those in a Senate report this year, that some immigration officials took part in trafficking and extorting refugees from Burma.

Zimbabwe joins rogues' gallery

Like many African and other poor countries, the report said, Zimbabwe "is a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation."

Some of the many Zimbabweans who fled to neighbouring countries amid Zimbabwe's severe economic and political crisis faced "human trafficking," it said.

It charged that members of Zimbabwe's military were involved in trafficking.

Chad "showed no results in enforcing government policy prohibiting recruitment of child soldiers," the 320-page report said.

The government of Niger "demonstrated marginal efforts to combat human trafficking, including traditional slavery, during the last year," it said.

"The government of Mauritania made inadequate efforts to raise awareness of trafficking during the last year," it added.

Eritrea showed no progress in prosecuting or punishing traffickers, while Swaziland showed no effort to do the same.

Burma shows some progress

The report said Saudi Arabia and Kuwait admit men and women from Asian and African countries to work as domestic servants or other low-skilled labourers, but then subject many to "involuntary servitude."

It added that Saudi Arabia made "no discernible efforts" to punish or prosecute traffickers, although Kuwait "demonstrated some progress" in punishing them.

North Korea does not recognise or make any attempt to identify trafficking victims, it said. Nor does it make any effort to prosecute perpetrators.

But another longstanding blacklist member Burma showed some progress to fight cross-border trafficking as well as limited efforts to investigate and prosecute internal trafficking, it said.

Fiji, described as a source country for child labourers and prostitutes, showed no significant efforts to protect victims or prosecute perpetrators, it said.

Source: Malaysiakini website, Petaling Jaya, in English 17 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

371 of 404 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

Malaysia criticizes US decision to put country on human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 369 words

Text of report in English by Malaysian independent website Malaysiakini, owned by Mkinin Dotcom, on 17 June
[Unattributed report: "Outcry over human trafficking blacklist"]

Malaysia has accused the United States of unfair treatment over its decision to re-list the country on a human trafficking blacklist.

Washington's annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report', released yesterday, says Malaysia is failing to comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking and "is not making significant efforts to do so".

Last year the report elevated Malaysia to a 'watch list' from the 2007 blacklist after finding that it was "making significant efforts" to comply with standards.

"It is unfair to put us back on the list as we are doing our best," Malaysian Deputy Home Minister Abu Seman Yusop told reporters.

"We will have to consider our next action in opposing the re-listing of our country on the blacklist," he added.

Abu Seman said the Malaysian government did not condone human trafficking and had taken stern action to deal with the problem, including enacting an anti-human trafficking law in 2007 and setting up a special task force.

Transit point for illegal immigrants

The report said that while the Malaysian government took early steps to fight sex trafficking, it has yet to fully tackle labour trafficking.

It said there were "credible allegations", including those in a US Senate report this year, that some immigration officials took part in trafficking and extorting refugees from Burma.

Malaysia, which is listed with 16 other countries, including six newly-added African nations, could face sanctions such as the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade related US aid.

Malaysian Prime Minister Najib Razak said recently his country was being used as a transit point for illegal immigrants.

Recent incidents include the arrests of 17 Iraqis and seven Indonesians over the weekend after authorities intercepted a boat that was trying to smuggle some of them to Australia via Indonesia.

Authorities have said 12 suspected illegal immigrants were drowned off Malaysia's southern coast in the last two months when they tried to sneak out of the country.

Source: Malaysiakini website, Petaling Jaya, in English 17 Jun 09

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2009 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

372 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Daily Times

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

US adds Pakistan to human trafficking watchlistLENGTH: 226 wordsDATELINE: Pakistan

Pakistan, June 17 -- The Obama administration on Tuesday expanded the US watchlist of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking, putting more than four dozen nations on notice that they may face sanctions unless their records improve.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, the first released since President Obama took office, placed 52 countries and territories - mainly in Africa, Asia and the Middle East - on the watch list. That number is a 30 percent jump from the 40 countries on the list in 2008. Several previously cited nations were removed from the list, but new countries cited for human trafficking include Angola, Bangladesh, Cambodia, Iraq, Lebanon, Nicaragua, Pakistan, the Philippines, Qatar, Senegal and the United Arab Emirates, according to the report. The report also placed the Netherlands' Antilles, a self-governing Dutch territory in the Caribbean, on the watchlist. Trafficking sanctions: If a country appears on the list for two consecutive years it can be subject to US sanctions. Seventeen nations, up from 14 in 2008, are now subject to the trafficking sanctions, which can include a ban on non-humanitarian and trade-related aid and US opposition to loans and credits from the International Monetary Fund and World Bank. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Times.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 Right Vision News
All Rights Reserved

373 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

June 17, 2009 WednesdayUS report puts India under watch for human trafficking*LENGTH: 194 wordsDATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 17 -- A US report on global human trafficking has placed India in tier 2 watch list of countries.

The report that was released by the Secretary of State Hillary Clinton expressed its unhappiness over the failure of Indian authorities to curb human smuggling. The 2009 Trafficking in Persons, report observed that in recent years, there has been an increase of sex trafficking to sub cities and India is a destination for women and girls from Nepal and Bangladesh for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation. The report also says that, India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. It also says that India is making significant efforts to control it. Despite the efforts put by the Indian Government, there was no sufficient progress in its law enforcement to address human trafficking, the report observed. The report also mentions that, the Indian labours who migrate willingly to Middle East, Europe, and the US in search of work as domestic servants and un skilled labourers, are becoming the victims of labour trafficking. Published by HT Syndication with permission from Asian News International.

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

374 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Irish Times

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

Ireland criticised in US report on human trafficking

BYLINE: RUADHÍN MAC CORMAIC, Migration Correspondent

SECTION: IRELAND; Other Stories; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 617 words

THE GOVERNMENT is not fully complying with minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking, a report by the US State Department has found.

The annual Trafficking in Persons report, which is regarded as the most comprehensive global compendium of trafficking trends, again places the Republic in the second of three tiers, indicating that the Government is not adhering to minimum standards but is making significant efforts to do so.

Those efforts include the enacting of legislation criminalising trafficking, the initiation of awareness campaigns and the investigation of nearly 100 cases of potential trafficking.

Although Ireland made significant strides, there was no evidence that trafficking offenders were prosecuted or convicted during the reporting period, and concerns remained about victim identification and protection, the report states.

For the second consecutive year, the US government names Ireland as a destination and transit country for women, men and children trafficked for sexual exploitation and forced labour.

It states that women from eastern Europe, Africa, South America and Asia have been trafficked here for forced prostitution, while labour trafficking victims reportedly came from Bangladesh, Pakistan, Egypt, the Philippines and elsewhere. The report also notes that, over the last eight years, 388 unaccompanied immigrant children have disappeared from State care.

While Irish authorities believe the majority of these children have been reunited with family members, the government reported that a small number of the missing children have been found in involuntary servitude in brothels, restaurants, and in domestic service.

The State Department recommended that Ireland vigorously prosecute trafficking offences and convict offenders, and continue to implement procedures to guide officials in identifying possible victims among vulnerable groups, such as unaccompanied foreign minors.

It also suggested that the Government should continue to take steps to ensure trafficking victims are not penalised for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked.

The report, released yesterday by US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, added six African countries to a tier 3 blacklist of countries that do not make significant efforts to comply with minimum standards. These were Chad, Eritrea, Niger, Mauritania, Swaziland, and Zimbabwe.

US allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait remained on the list, as did Cuba, Fiji, Iran, Burma, North Korea, Sudan, and Syria. The 17 countries on the blacklist could face sanctions, including the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade related US aid.

With this report, we hope to shine the light brightly on the scope and scale of modern slavery so all governments can see where progress has been made and where more is needed, Mrs Clinton said.

The report also observed that the global economic crisis was boosting the demand side of human trafficking.

A shrinking global demand for labour and a growing supply of workers willing to take even greater risks for economic opportunities seem a recipe for increased forced labour cases of migrant workers and women in prostitution, it stated.

The Immigrant Council of Ireland endorsed the report's recommendations.

We have been raising concerns for some time that there are real problems in the identification of victims of sex trafficking in Ireland and although we acknowledge that the Government is committed to combating trafficking, this remains a real concern, chief executive Denise Charlton said.

388:

The number of unaccompanied immigrant children who have disappeared from State care in the last eight years, according to a US State Department report

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Irish Times
All Rights Reserved

375 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Irish Times

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

Poverty boosting human trafficking - US report

SECTION: WORLD; Other World Stories; Pg. 11

LENGTH: 483 words

MILLIONS OF people around the world are living in bondage and the global financial crisis has made many more vulnerable to labour and sex trafficking, the US state department said yesterday.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, which tracks modern slavery such as forced labour and the sex trade, the state department said growing poverty around the world had sparked an increase in both the supply and demand for human trafficking.

In a time of economic crisis, victims are more vulnerable, affected communities are more vulnerable, Luis de Baca said as he presented the report.

Persons who are under economic stress are more likely to fall prey to the wiles of the traffickers who often get their victims through promises of a better life, promises of better earnings.

Mr de Baca said human trafficking could be valued at about $50 billion (EUR 36 billion) a year. That includes about $31 billion profit earned by the traffickers, plus about $20 billion in opportunity cost from lost labour of the people who are forced into bondage.

US secretary of state Hillary Clinton urged governments to work to eliminate forms of human trafficking. This year, there is a new urgency in this call, she wrote in a preface to the report.

As the ongoing financial crisis takes an increasing toll on many of the world's migrants who often risk everything for the slim hope of a better future for their families too often they are ensnared by traffickers who exploit their desperation.

We recognise their immense suffering and we commit to aiding their rescue and recovery.

The state department expanded a blacklist of governments it believes are not doing enough to stop human trafficking to 17 out of 175 countries it monitors in the annual report.

Chad, Malaysia, Niger, Mauritania and Zimbabwe were included among the worst offenders putting them at risk of losing some US aid.

Cuba, Burma and North Korea have received the lowest ranking in each year they have been included in the report, which started nine years ago. The lowest ranking means the US could withhold aid that is not humanitarian or trade-related.

According to the International Labour Organisation (ILO), about 12.3 million adults and children are in forced labour and sexual servitude at any time in the world.

Almost 1.4 million of those are victims of sex trafficking, ILO figures show.

They labour in fields and factories, under brutal employers who threaten them with violence if they try to escape, Mrs Clinton said at an event to present the report.

They work in homes for families that keep them virtually imprisoned. They are forced to work as prostitutes or to beg in the streets, fearful of the consequences if they fail to earn their daily quota.

This is modern slavery, she said. A crime that spans the globe, providing ruthless employers with an endless supply of people to abuse for financial gain. (Reuters)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Irish Times
All Rights Reserved

376 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Irish Times

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

Ireland criticised in US report on human trafficking

BYLINE: RUADHÍN MAC CORMAIC, Migration Correspondent

SECTION: IRELAND; Other Stories; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 617 words

THE GOVERNMENT is not fully complying with minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking, a report by the US State Department has found.

The annual Trafficking in Persons report, which is regarded as the most comprehensive global compendium of trafficking trends, again places the Republic in the second of three tiers, indicating that the Government is not adhering to minimum standards but is making significant efforts to do so.

Those efforts include the enacting of legislation criminalising trafficking, the initiation of awareness campaigns and the investigation of nearly 100 cases of potential trafficking.

Although Ireland made significant strides, there was no evidence that trafficking offenders were prosecuted or convicted during the reporting period, and concerns remained about victim identification and protection, the report states.

For the second consecutive year, the US government names Ireland as a destination and transit country for women, men and children trafficked for sexual exploitation and forced labour.

It states that women from eastern Europe, Africa, South America and Asia have been trafficked here for forced prostitution, while labour trafficking victims reportedly came from Bangladesh, Pakistan, Egypt, the Philippines and elsewhere. The report also notes that, over the last eight years, 388 unaccompanied immigrant children have disappeared from State care.

While Irish authorities believe the majority of these children have been reunited with family members, the government reported that a small number of the missing children have been found in involuntary servitude in brothels, restaurants, and in domestic service.

The State Department recommended that Ireland vigorously prosecute trafficking offences and convict offenders, and continue to implement procedures to guide officials in identifying possible victims among vulnerable groups, such as unaccompanied foreign minors.

It also suggested that the Government should continue to take steps to ensure trafficking victims are not penalised for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked.

The report, released yesterday by US Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, added six African countries to a tier 3 blacklist of countries that do not make significant efforts to comply with minimum standards. These were Chad, Eritrea, Niger, Mauritania, Swaziland, and Zimbabwe.

US allies Saudi Arabia and Kuwait remained on the list, as did Cuba, Fiji, Iran, Burma, North Korea, Sudan, and Syria. The 17 countries on the blacklist could face sanctions, including the withholding of non-humanitarian, non-trade related US aid.

With this report, we hope to shine the light brightly on the scope and scale of modern slavery so all governments can see where progress has been made and where more is needed, Mrs Clinton said.

The report also observed that the global economic crisis was boosting the demand side of human trafficking .

A shrinking global demand for labour and a growing supply of workers willing to take even greater risks for economic opportunities seem a recipe for increased forced labour cases of migrant workers and women in prostitution, it stated.

The Immigrant Council of Ireland endorsed the report's recommendations.

We have been raising concerns for some time that there are real problems in the identification of victims of sex trafficking in Ireland and although we acknowledge that the Government is committed to combating trafficking, this remains a real concern, chief executive Denise Charlton said.

388:

The number of unaccompanied immigrant children who have disappeared from State care in the last eight years, according to a US State Department report

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Irish Times
All Rights Reserved

377 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Irish Times

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

Poverty boosting human trafficking - US report

SECTION: WORLD; Other World Stories; Pg. 11

LENGTH: 483 words

MILLIONS OF people around the world are living in bondage and the global financial crisis has made many more vulnerable to labour and sex trafficking, the US state department said yesterday.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons report, which tracks modern slavery such as forced labour and the sex trade, the state department said growing poverty around the world had sparked an increase in both the supply and demand for human trafficking.

In a time of economic crisis, victims are more vulnerable, affected communities are more vulnerable, Luis de Baca said as he presented the report.

Persons who are under economic stress are more likely to fall prey to the wiles of the traffickers who often get their victims through promises of a better life, promises of better earnings.

Mr de Baca said human trafficking could be valued at about $50 billion (EUR 36 billion) a year. That includes about $31 billion profit earned by the traffickers, plus about $20 billion in opportunity cost from lost labour of the people who are forced into bondage.

US secretary of state Hillary Clinton urged governments to work to eliminate forms of human trafficking. This year, there is a new urgency in this call, she wrote in a preface to the report.

As the ongoing financial crisis takes an increasing toll on many of the world's migrants who often risk everything for the slim hope of a better future for their families too often they are ensnared by traffickers who exploit their desperation.

We recognise their immense suffering and we commit to aiding their rescue and recovery.

The state department expanded a blacklist of governments it believes are not doing enough to stop human trafficking to 17 out of 175 countries it monitors in the annual report.

Chad, Malaysia, Niger, Mauritania and Zimbabwe were included among the worst offenders putting them at risk of losing some US aid.

Cuba, Burma and North Korea have received the lowest ranking in each year they have been included in the report, which started nine years ago. The lowest ranking means the US could withhold aid that is not humanitarian or trade-related.

According to the International Labour Organisation (ILO), about 12.3 million adults and children are in forced labour and sexual servitude at any time in the world.

Almost 1.4 million of those are victims of sex trafficking, ILO figures show.

They labour in fields and factories, under brutal employers who threaten them with violence if they try to escape, Mrs Clinton said at an event to present the report.

They work in homes for families that keep them virtually imprisoned. They are forced to work as prostitutes or to beg in the streets, fearful of the consequences if they fail to earn their daily quota.

This is modern slavery, she said. A crime that spans the globe, providing ruthless employers with an endless supply of people to abuse for financial gain. (Reuters)

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Irish Times
All Rights Reserved

378 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

HUMAN TRAFFICKING: MALAYSIA WANTS US EMBASSY TO EXPLAIN

LENGTH: 685 words

DATELINE: PUTRAJAYA June 17

Malaysia will seek an explanation from the United States (US) Embassy after the country put Malaysia on its list of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking.

Home Minister Datuk Seri Hishammuddin Tun Hussein said the move was to identify the causes leading to the allegations and claims.

"In 2007, we were placed on level three and at the time, a special legislation had to be drafted. At that time, the anti-human trafficking act was introduced and our status had been brought down to level two.

"Today, we were put back on three so we will see the US Embassy to identify what really are the allegations and claims," he told reporters here today.

He said that if in 2007 Malaysia looked at it proactively and reacted positively with regard to the matter, he was sure that the same would be done to tackle the allegations.

The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2009 that analysed efforts in more than 173 countries to combat human trafficking had blacklisted Malaysia and 16 other countries.

The report said that Malaysia became a destination and at least a source and transit country for the trafficking of women and children for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation and men, women and children for the purpose of forced labor.

Last year, Malaysia was removed from the list and put on the Level 2 watchlist.

Hishammuddin said Malaysia would use the same mechanism to interact with the US Embassy to find out what had made them so concerned and would do whatever it takes to overcome the issue.

However, he said, there were limitations in terms of border and others, and the US was realistic about it that they would take that into consideration.

"But otherwise, I feel that they are making judgement on something that is beyond of our control. That would be unfair.

"I just need to know from them what is it that has become an issue. If it is within our control, we will do whatever it takes to overcome it," he said.

Meanwhile, Hishammuddin said that from Monday, he would visit areas considered as hot spots for having high crime rates so that the ministry could look at the measures to be taken to tackle the problem.

"The time has come for me to see for myself the situation down there.

"If before this I saw our staff at the Prisons Department, police and Immigration Department, next week I will go down to the areas considered as hot spots where crimes happen, like meeting the victims of loan sharks," he said.

Meanwhile at the Parliament lobby in Kuala Lumpur, Deputy Home Minister Datuk Wira Abu Seman Yusop said it was wrong to blacklist Malaysia as one of the worst human trafficking countries and to accuse the country of not doing anything to curb the problem.

He said the government had set up a committee to act on this matter and various actions had been taken since the enactment of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act.

"The authorities had arrested quite a number of illegal entries through Malaysian waters recently and kept close cooperation with our neighbours like Australia.

"Recently, the advisor to the prime minister of Australia came to discuss common issues including human trafficking," he said.

Deputy Dewan Rakyat Speaker Datuk Dr Wan Junaidi Tuanku Jaafar who is also chairman of the Asean Inter-Parliamentary Assembly (AIPA) described the listing of Malaysia in the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2009 as a political ploy.

"In 2006 when the country did not have the Act dealing with human trafficking, the US accused us of failing to comply with the United Nations regulations while many other countries also did not have such an Act.

"When we have the Act in force, they did not change the country's position from Level 3 to Level 2 so here it looks like something quite suspicious," he said.

He said that during the IAPA's first meeting in April, Malaysia had reached a resolution together with other Asean countries to focus on the harmonisation laws dealing with human trafficking.

"We will bring the resolution to the AIPA meeting in August in Thailand because it is a very important agenda to be discussed," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

379 of 404 DOCUMENTS

UNI (United News of India)

June 17, 2009 Wednesday

India figures on US human trafficking watch listLENGTH: 397 wordsDATELINE: Washington

Washington, Jun. 17 -- India figures along with 52 other countries and territories that the United States has put on its "watch list" for suspicion of not doing enough to combat human trafficking.

The State Department's annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report' released yesterday by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton records a 30 per cent increase in the number of such countries, mainly in Africa, Asia and the West Asia. Besides India, others on the list are Pakistan and Bangladesh. The report says India is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation. India is also a destination for women and girls from Nepal and Bangladesh trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation. Though India has made significant efforts to check the trafficking, the document says, it has not demonstrated sufficient progress in its law enforcement efforts. Clinton called the trafficking of persons for forced labor, sexual exploitation and other illicit purposes "modern-day" slavery that spans the globe and affects every country including the United States. India figures along with 52 other countries and territories that the United States has put on its "watch list" for suspicion of not doing enough to combat human trafficking. The State Department's annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report' released yesterday by Secretary of State Hillary Clinton records a 30 per cent increase in the number of such countries, mainly in Africa, Asia and the West Asia. Besides India, others on the list are Pakistan and Bangladesh. The report says India is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation. India is also a destination for women and girls from Nepal and Bangladesh trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation. Though India has made significant efforts to check the trafficking, the document says, it has not demonstrated sufficient progress in its law enforcement efforts. Clinton called the trafficking of persons for forced labor, sexual exploitation and other illicit purposes "modern-day" slavery that spans the globe and affects every country including the United States. Published by HT Syndication with permission from United News of India.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireCopyright 2009 UNI
All Rights Reserved

380 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

June 16, 2009 Tuesday

US expands human trafficking watchlist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 461 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Obama administration on Tuesday expanded the U.S. watchlist of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking, putting more than four dozen nations on notice that they may face sanctions unless their records improve. The move came as officials said the world financial crisis has left more people at risk for the crime.

The State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," the first released since President Barack Obama took office, placed 52 countries and territories mainly in Africa, Asia and the Middle East on the watchlist. That number is a 30 percent jump from the 40 countries on the list in 2008.

Several nations that had been cited previously were removed from the list, but new countries cited for human trafficking problems included Angola, Bangladesh, Cambodia, Iraq, Lebanon, Nicaragua, Pakistan, the Philippines, Qatar, Senegal and the United Arab Emirates.

The report also placed the Netherlands' Antilles, a self-governing Dutch territory in the Caribbean, on the watchlist.

"With this report, we hope to shine the light brightly on the scope and scale of modern slavery so all governments can see where progress has been made and where more is needed," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said as she released the 320-page document.

"Economic pressure, especially in this global economic crisis, makes more people susceptible to the false promises of traffickers," she said.

Inclusion on the watchlist means those countries' governments are not fully complying with minimum standards set by U.S. law for cooperating in efforts to reduce the rise of human trafficking a common denominator in the sex trade, coerced labor and recruitment of child soldiers.

If a country appears on the list for two consecutive years, it can be subject to U.S. sanctions.

Seventeen nations, up from 14 in 2008, are now subject to the trafficking sanctions, which can include a ban on non-humanitarian and trade-related aid and U.S. opposition to loans and credits from the International Monetary Fund and World Bank. The penalties can be waived if the president determines it is in U.S. national interest to do so.

Those 17 countries include traditional U.S. foes like Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan and Syria, but also American allies and friends such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

Malaysia, another U.S. partner, was added to the list of worst offenders, as were the African nations of Zimbabwe, Chad, Eritrea, Mauritania, Niger and Swaziland.

Luis Cdebaca, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the addition of the six African countries was due largely to a relaxation in efforts to fight domestic slavery, which has persisted.

"Those efforts seem to have stalled," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

381 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Christian Science Monitor

June 16, 2009, Tuesday

Economic downturn fuels human trafficking

BYLINE: Howard LaFranchi Staff writer of The Christian Science Monitor

SECTION: USA; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 754 words

DATELINE: Washington

The economic downturn is adding a new dimension to the global problem of human trafficking - known as modern-day slavery - as workers desperate for income accept increasingly onerous conditions or fall prey to international cheap-labor rings.

The result, according to the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report, is an increase in the number of countries, primarily in the developing world, that are either overlooking rising incidents of trafficking and bondage, or are failing to enforce the laws they've passed to curb the problem.

The report, which covers 2008 but which is the Obama administration's first on the issue, places 52 countries and territories on the watch list of countries that are not doing enough to stem human trafficking, up from 40 countries last year.

"In a time of economic crisis, workers are more vulnerable ... and persons under economic stress are more likely to fall prey to the wiles of traffickers," says Luis CdeBaca, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

The uptick in countries on the US watch list reflects both the increased number of countries included in the ranking this year - up by 20 to a total of 173 countries - and the tighter standards passed by Congress last year for judging a country's performance.

But the economic crisis is clearly another factor, says Mr. CdeBaca. As economies have soured, more workers in sectors ranging from agriculture and fishing to construction and domestic services have fallen prey to employers who deny wages, claiming they are owed debts workers are unable to repay, or who use an employee's murky legal status to force them into bondage.

Traditionally, human trafficking has been associated with the international sex trade. And forced prostitution of women and children remains a major contributor to trafficking, but CdeBaca notes that the International Labor Organization this year estimates 12.3 million cases of human bondage worldwide, of which just over one-tenth, or 1.5 million, are thought to be cases of sexual servitude.

In more evidence that labor trafficking isn't getting enough attention from economically-strapped countries, the State Department notes that of the 2,983 convictions reported worldwide, only 104 were for trafficking in the labor sector.

One the bright side, the State Department showcases Nigeria, a country that this year moved up to the elite list of countries that fully comply with the minimum international standards for protecting trafficking victims. Highlighting Nigeria's "political will" to address the issue, CdeBaca says, "I can't talk about it enough" as an example for other countries.

Not so encouraging was Malaysia, which suffered a downgrade of its ranking over evidence of increased trafficking of Burmese refugees for servitude in the South Asian country. The downgrade reflects the findings of a US Senate Committee on Foreign Relations report earlier this year that exposed rampant exploitation and trafficking of Burmese migrants and refugees - often with the collaboration of Malaysian officials.

Domestic and international anti-slavery organizations have been crucial in highlighting cases and ending abusive practices, says the new US report - the ninth since human trafficking legislation was passed in 2000. One such organization is the Touch a Life Foundation, a Dallas-based organization working to rescue victims ranging from boys enslaved by fishermen on Ghana's Lake Volta to girls and women in sexual servitude in Cambodia.

Pam Cope, Touch a Life's cofounder, says the traditional acceptance of servitude in some cultures and lax enforcement of existing laws are contributing to human trafficking as much as the economic downturn.

"I don't really see it having so much to do with the poor economy. I just think human trafficking has become a huge money-making industry," she says, adding that too many countries fail to enforce the laws they have to stop it.

That's the case of Cambodia, she says, where authorities look the other way as visiting foreigners exploit locals for sex and other services. A different case is Ghana, she says, where her organization is working with local men to rescue small boys enslaved by fishermen and to educate tribal chiefs about the long-term impact of slavery on their communities.

"I'm hopeful with Ghana," she says, "because the people we're working with there are really taking this effort to end this slavery and making it their own."

(c) Copyright 2009. The Christian Science Monitor

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

382 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 16, 2009 Tuesday 11:56 PM GMTU.S. blasts N. Korean forced labor*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 240 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON June 16

The United States on Tuesday blasted North Korea for continuing to force hundreds of thousands of its people to perform hard labor in political prison camps.

"The North Korean regime continues to use forced labor as part of an established system of political repression," the State Department said in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

"Hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children in political prison camps are subjected to reeducation through labor, a common punishment in which prisoners, including children, are forced to participate in logging, mining, and crop tending," it said.

The State Department kept North Korea on a blacklist of countries it considers are not doing enough to stop human trafficking. Sixteen other nations were placed on the list out of 175 governments it monitors in the annual report.

All the nations on the blacklist could face sanctions, including the suspension of U.S. nonhumanitarian aid. Newly added to the list this year are Chad, Eritrea, Niger, Mauritania, Swaziland and Zimbabwe.

Citing nongovernmental organizations' estimates, the report said tens of thousands of North Koreans presently live in China and over 80 percent of North Korean refugees are "victims of human trafficking."

"North Koreans forcibly repatriated from China...are often jailed and forced into prison camps, where they may undergo torture, forced labor, sexual abuse by prison guards, and other severe punishment," it added.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Kyodo News Service
All Rights Reserved

383 of 404 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 16, 2009

Introduction to State Dept. 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report; Report raises awareness, encourages governments to combat trafficking

SECTION: NEWS FROM AMERICA.COM AND THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 2846 words

(begin text)

U.S. Department of State

Washington, D.C.

June 16, 2009

[The full report is available on the State Department website in PDF format at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2009/index.htm>.]

Introduction

OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

Trafficking in Persons Report 2009

Purpose

The Department of State is required by law to submit each year to the U.S. Congress a report on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. This is the ninth annual TIP Report; it seeks to increase global awareness of the human trafficking phenomenon by shedding new light on various facets of the problem and highlighting shared and individual efforts of the international community, and to encourage foreign governments to take effective action against all forms of trafficking in persons.

The United States' Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), as amended, guides efforts to combat human trafficking. The most recent amendments to the TVPA were enacted in December 2008. The purpose of the law is to punish traffickers, protect victims, and prevent trafficking from occurring. Freeing victims from this form of modern-day slavery is the ultimate goal of this report -- and of the U.S. Government's anti-human trafficking policy.

Human trafficking is a multi-dimensional issue. It is a crime that deprives people of their human rights and freedoms, increases global health risks, fuels growing networks of organized crime, and can sustain levels of poverty and impede development in certain areas.

The impacts of human trafficking are devastating. Victims may suffer physical and emotional abuse, rape, threats against self and family, and even death. But the devastation also extends beyond individual victims; human trafficking undermines the health, safety, and security of all nations it touches.

A growing community of nations is making significant efforts to eliminate this atrocious crime. The TVPA outlines minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons. Countries that do not make significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards receive a Tier 3 ranking in this report. Such an assessment could prompt the United States to withhold nonhumanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance. In assessing foreign governments' efforts, the TIP Report highlights the "three P's" -- prosecution, protection, and prevention. But a victim-centered approach to trafficking also requires attention to the "three R's" -- rescue, rehabilitation, and reintegration. Sharing the best practices in these areas will encourage governments to go beyond the initial rescue of victims and restore to them dignity and the hope of productive lives.

Human Trafficking Defined

The TVPA defines "severe forms of trafficking" as:

- a. sex trafficking in which a commercial sex act is induced by force, fraud, or coercion, or in which the person induced to perform such an act has not attained 18 years of age; or
- b. the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision, or obtaining of a person for labor or services, through the use of force, fraud, or coercion for the purpose of subjection to involuntary servitude, peonage, debt bondage, or slavery.

A victim need not be physically transported from one location to another in order for the crime to fall within these definitions.

The Scope and Nature of Modern-Day Slavery

The common denominator of trafficking scenarios is the use of force, fraud, or coercion to exploit a person for profit. Traffickers can subject victims to labor exploitation, sexual exploitation, or both. Trafficking for labor exploitation, the form of trafficking claiming the greatest number of victims, includes traditional chattel slavery, forced labor, and debt bondage. Trafficking for sexual exploitation typically includes abuse within the commercial sex industry. In other cases, individuals exploit victims in private homes, often demanding both sex and work. The use of force or coercion can be direct and violent or psychological.

A wide range of estimates exists on the scope and magnitude of modern-day slavery. The International Labor Organization (ILO) the United Nations agency charged with addressing labor standards, employment, and social protection issues estimates that there are at least 12.3 million adults and children in forced labor, bonded labor, and sexual servitude at any given time.

Of these victims, the ILO estimates that at least 1.39 million are victims of sexual servitude, both transnational and within countries. According to the ILO, 56 percent of all forced labor victims are women and girls.

Human traffickers prey on the weak. Targeting vulnerable men, women, and children, they use creative and ruthless ploys designed to trick, coerce, and win the confidence of potential victims. Very often these ruses involve promises of a better life through employment, educational opportunities, or marriage.

The nationalities of trafficked people are as diverse as the world's cultures. Some leave developing countries, seeking to improve their lives through low-skilled jobs in more prosperous countries. Others fall victim to forced or bonded labor in their own countries. Women, eager for a better future, are susceptible to promises of jobs abroad as babysitters, housekeepers, waitresses, or models -- jobs that traffickers turn into the nightmare of forced prostitution without exit. Some families give children to adults, often relatives, who promise education and opportunity but instead sell the children into exploitative situations for money. But poverty alone does not explain this tragedy, which is driven by fraudulent recruiters, employers, and corrupt officials who seek to reap profits from others' desperation.

Focus of the 2009 TIP Report

The TIP Report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on governments' efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons. It includes countries of origin, transit, or destination for trafficking victims. It represents an updated, global look at the nature and scope of trafficking in persons and the broad range of government actions to confront and eliminate it.

The 2009 TIP Report covers the period April 2008 through March 2009. During this time and since passage of the TVPA, the fight against trafficking passed an important milestone, as more than half of the world's countries have enacted criminal legislation prohibiting all forms of trafficking in persons. Over the last year alone, 26 countries enacted new anti-trafficking legislation, some going beyond the minimum standards of the TVPA and the 2000 UN TIP Protocol by offering the victims of trafficking restitution through court proceedings and other protections.

The last year was marked also by the onset of a global financial crisis, which has raised the specter of increased human trafficking around the world. As a result of the crisis, two concurrent trends -- a shrinking global demand for labor and a growing supply of workers willing to take ever greater risks for economic opportunities -- seem a recipe for increased forced labor cases of migrant workers and women in prostitution.

Because trafficking likely extends to every country in the world, the omission of a country from the report may indicate only a lack of adequate information. The country narratives describe the scope and nature of the trafficking problem, and the government's efforts to combat trafficking. Each narrative also contains an assessment of the government's compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking as laid out in the TVPA and includes suggestions for additional government actions. The remainder of the country narrative describes each government's efforts to enforce laws against trafficking, to protect victims, and to prevent trafficking. Each narrative explains the basis for ranking a country as Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, or Tier 3. In particular, if a country has been placed on Tier 2 Watch List, the narrative will contain a statement of explanation, using the special criteria found in the TVPA for the Watch List.

Methodology

The Department of State prepared this report using information from U.S. embassies, foreign government officials, nongovernmental and international organizations, published reports, research trips to every region, and information submitted to tipreport@state.gov. This e-mail address allows NGOs and individuals to share information on government progress in addressing trafficking. U.S. diplomatic posts reported on the trafficking situation and governmental action based on thorough research that included meetings with a wide variety of government officials, local and international NGO representatives, officials of international organizations, journalists, academics, and survivors.

To compile this year's report, the Department reviewed credible information sources on every country and assessed each government's anti-trafficking efforts. In prior years a "significant number" (defined to be 100 or more) of trafficking victims had to be documented for a country to be ranked on the TIP Report. The William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2008 (TVPRA of 2008) eliminated this requirement, thereby expanding the scope of countries included in this year's Report.

Some countries have held conferences and established task forces or national action plans to create goals for anti-trafficking efforts. While such activities are useful and can serve as a catalyst toward concrete law enforcement, protection, and prevention activities in the future, these conferences, plans, and task forces alone are not weighed heavily in assessing country efforts. Rather, the report focuses on governments' concrete actions to fight trafficking, especially prosecutions, convictions, and prison sentences for traffickers as well as victim protection measures and prevention efforts. Although critical to increasing anti-trafficking efforts, the Report does not give great weight to laws in draft form or laws that have not yet been enacted. In general, the Report does not focus on governmental efforts that have indirect implications for trafficking, such as general efforts to keep children in school or general economic development programs, though the Report is making a stronger effort to identify trafficking vulnerabilities and measures taken by governments to prevent trafficking that may result from such vulnerabilities. Similarly, this Report attempts to identify systemic contributing factors to particularly forms of human trafficking. These include particular policies or practices, such as labor recruiters' charging of excessive fees to prospective migrants and governmental policies allowing employers to confiscate passports of foreign workers -- factors that have been shown to contribute to forced labor.

Tier Placement

The Department places each country in the 2009 TIP Report onto one of the three tier lists as mandated by the TVPA. This placement is based more on the extent of government action to combat trafficking than on the size of the problem, although that is also an important factor. The Department first evaluates whether the government fully complies with the TVPA's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Governments that fully comply are placed on Tier 1. For other governments, the Department considers the extent of efforts to reach compliance. Governments that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed on Tier 2. Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed on Tier 3. Finally, the Department considers the Special Watch List criteria and, when applicable, moves Tier 2 countries to Tier 2 Watch List.

The TVPA lists three factors by which to determine whether a country should be on Tier 2 (or Tier 2 Watch List) versus Tier 3: (1) the extent to which the country is a country of origin, transit, or destination for severe forms of trafficking; (2) the extent to which the country's government does not comply with the TVPA's minimum standards including, in particular, the extent to which officials or government employees have been complicit in severe forms of trafficking; and (3) the government's resources and capabilities to address and eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons.

Tier 2 Watch List

The TVPA requires that certain countries be placed on a Special Watch List. This includes countries in which:

- a. The absolute number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is very significant or is significantly increasing;
- b. There is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons from the previous year, including increased investigations, prosecutions, and convictions of trafficking crimes; increased assistance to victims; and decreasing evidence of complicity in severe forms of trafficking by government officials; or
- c. The determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional steps over the next year.

Countries that meet one of these three criteria are placed into what the Department of State has termed the "Tier 2 Watch List." There were 40 countries on Tier 2 Watch List in the June 2008 report. Two additional countries were reassessed as Tier 2 Watch List countries in November 2008. The Department of State included these 42 countries in an "Interim Assessment" released on January 27, 2009.

Of these 42 countries on Tier 2 Watch List at the time of the Interim Assessment, 11 moved up to Tier 2 in this report, while four fell to Tier 3 and 27 remain on Tier 2 Watch List. Countries on Tier 2 Watch List in this report will be re-examined in the next Interim Assessment, which will be submitted to the U.S. Congress by February 1, 2010.

Amendments made by the TVPRA of 2008 provide that any country that has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for two consecutive years (beginning with the 2009 Report) will be ranked Tier 3, unless the President waives application of this provision based on a determination that, among other things, the government has a written plan for meeting the TVPA's minimum standards.

Potential Penalties for Tier 3 Countries

Pursuant to the TVPA, governments of countries on Tier 3 may be subject to certain sanctions whereby the U.S. Government may withhold nonhumanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance. Countries that receive no such assistance may not receive such assistance and, in addition, may not receive funding for government employees' participation in educational and cultural exchange programs. Consistent with the TVPA, governments subject to sanctions would also face U.S. opposition to assistance (except for humanitarian, trade-related, and certain development-related assistance) from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. Imposed sanctions will take effect October 1, 2009; however, all or part of the TVPA's sanctions can be waived if the President determines that the provision of such assistance to the government would promote the purposes of the statute or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. The TVPA also provides that sanctions can be waived if necessary to avoid significant adverse effects on vulnerable populations, including women and children. Sanctions would not apply if the President finds that, after this report is issued but before sanctions determinations are made, a government has come into compliance with the minimum standards or is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance.

No tier ranking is permanent. Every country can do more, including the United States, which has a significant human trafficking problem. All countries must maintain and increase efforts to combat trafficking.

How the Report Is Used

The TIP Report is a diplomatic tool for the U.S. Government to use to encourage continued dialogue and to help focus resources on prosecution, protection, and prevention programs and policies. In the narrative of each ranked country, the Report provides specific recommendations to facilitate future progress. The Department of State will continue to engage governments on the Report's contents in order to strengthen cooperative efforts to eradicate trafficking. In the coming year, and particularly in the months before sanctions are determined for Tier 3 countries, the Report will inform programs that will address all aspects of trafficking, administered not only by the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, but also tapping the longstanding expertise of others in the U.S. Government, such as the Department of State's Bureau of Democracy, Labor, and Human Rights, the Departments of Labor, Justice, and Health and Human Services. The Department hopes this report will be a catalyst for increased government and nongovernment efforts to combat human trafficking around the world.

(end text)

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: WF

Copyright 2009 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

384 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 16, 2009 Tuesday 5:45 AM EST

Georgia Maintains Tier 1 Status, Increases Victim Assistance in Fight against Human Trafficking

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 238 words

DATELINE: TBILISI, Ga.

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

On Tuesday, June 16th, Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and Senior Advisor to the Secretary and Ambassador-at-large to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Luis de Baca released the 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report. For the third year in a row Georgia was placed on Tier 1, which means Georgia fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Georgia retained its Tier 1 ranking in part because the government has significantly increased its victim assistance funding to $250,000 and modestly increased the number of victims assisted by government-funded programs. The government also provided $150,000 in funding for the support of two trafficking shelters that provided full victim assistance, including medical aid, psychological counseling, and legal assistance. The government continued to implement a formal mechanism for its officials to identify and refer victims for assistance. All convicted trafficking offenders were given adequate prison sentences.

The Department of State is required by law to submit a report each year to the U.S. Congress on foreign government's efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. The report also raises awareness, highlights best practices, and inspires governments to take action against trafficking.

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS C-AmbRan 091221-mt93-2531539 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: December 22, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

385 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

June 16, 2009 Tuesday 9:08 PM GMT

US expands human trafficking watchlist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 461 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Obama administration on Tuesday expanded the U.S. watchlist of countries suspected of not doing enough to combat human trafficking, putting more than four dozen nations on notice that they may face sanctions unless their records improve. The move came as officials said the world financial crisis has left more people at risk for the crime.

The State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," the first released since President Barack Obama took office, placed 52 countries and territories mainly in Africa, Asia and the Middle East on the watchlist. That number is a 30 percent jump from the 40 countries on the list in 2008.

Several nations that had been cited previously were removed from the list, but new countries cited for human trafficking problems included Angola, Bangladesh, Cambodia, Iraq, Lebanon, Nicaragua, Pakistan, the Philippines, Qatar, Senegal and the United Arab Emirates.

The report also placed the Netherlands' Antilles, a self-governing Dutch territory in the Caribbean, on the watchlist.

"With this report, we hope to shine the light brightly on the scope and scale of modern slavery so all governments can see where progress has been made and where more is needed," Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton said as she released the 320-page document.

"Economic pressure, especially in this global economic crisis, makes more people susceptible to the false promises of traffickers," she said.

Inclusion on the watchlist means those countries' governments are not fully complying with minimum standards set by U.S. law for cooperating in efforts to reduce the rise of human trafficking a common denominator in the sex trade, coerced labor and recruitment of child soldiers.

If a country appears on the list for two consecutive years, it can be subject to U.S. sanctions.

Seventeen nations, up from 14 in 2008, are now subject to the trafficking sanctions, which can include a ban on non-humanitarian and trade-related aid and U.S. opposition to loans and credits from the International Monetary Fund and World Bank. The penalties can be waived if the president determines it is in U.S. national interest to do so.

Those 17 countries include traditional U.S. foes like Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan and Syria, but also American allies and friends such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait.

Malaysia, another U.S. partner, was added to the list of worst offenders, as were the African nations of Zimbabwe, Chad, Eritrea, Mauritania, Niger and Swaziland.

Luis Cdebaca, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the addition of the six African countries was due largely to a relaxation in efforts to fight domestic slavery, which has persisted.

"Those efforts seem to have stalled," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2009 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

386 of 404 DOCUMENTS

June 16, 2009 Tuesday 3:11 PM EST

Recession boosts global human trafficking, report says

BYLINE: By Elise Labott CNN State Department Producer

SECTION: U.S.

LENGTH: 788 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The global financial crisis has increased the worldwide trade in trafficked persons, says a State Department report released Tuesday.

The State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report also says trafficking has increased in Africa and slaps six African nations on a blacklist of countries not meeting the minimum standard of combating trafficking.

The report, mandated by Congress, features data and statistics from 175 countries around the world regarding the amount of human trafficking that goes on within their borders.

The report cites the International Labor Organization, which estimates that at least 12.3 million adults and children are victims of forced labor, bonded labor and sex slavery each year.

"This is modern slavery. A crime that spans the globe, providing ruthless employers with endless supply of people to abuse for financial gain," Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said as she announced the report. "With this report, we hope to shine the light brightly on the scope and scale of modern slavery, so all governments can see where progress has been made and where more is needed."

The report says the global economic crisis is boosting the demand for human trafficking because of a growing demand for cheap goods and services.

"A striking global demand for labor and a growing supply of workers willing to take ever greater risks for economic opportunities seem a recipe for increased forced labor cases of migrant workers and women in prostitution," it says.

It predicts that the economic crisis will push more businesses underground to avoid taxes and unionized labor, which will increase the use of forced, cheap and child labor by cash-strapped multinational companies.

African countries Nigeria and Mauritius are praised in the report for making strong efforts to combat trafficking.

But six African nations -- Chad, Eritrea, Mauritania, Niger, Swaziland and Zimbabwe -- were put on the report's "Tier 3" blacklist of countries whose efforts to combat trafficking are inadequate.

Most of the countries are "source" and "destination" countries, the report says, meaning trafficking victims both come from and are sent there. Most are trafficked throughout Africa, but many end up in the Middle East, it says.

Iran, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Syria remain on the blacklist for another year, with the report saying they often become a destination for trafficked persons who are sold into domestic servitude. Other repeat offenders on the list include North Korea, Myanmar and Fiji.

The State Department also put Malaysia in the Tier 3 list, because of its trafficking of Burmese refugees.

The report cites information that Malaysian immigration officials sold refugees to traffickers operating along its border with Thailand. When the victims were unable to pay a ransom demanded by the traffickers, the report says, they were sold for labor and commercial sex exploitation.

The blacklisted countries are subject to U.S. sanctions if they don't make greater efforts to fight trafficking.

The Philippines, Cambodia, Bangladesh and Pakistan were added to a "watch list" because of what the report calls a worsening trafficking record in those countries. The 52 countries on the watch list have failed to meet the minimum anti-trafficking standards but are making efforts to do so.

For the first time, countries that have been on the watch list for two years -- including China, Russia, India, Sri Lanka and Egypt -- will automatically be moved to the Tier 3 blacklist next year without a presidential waiver if they fail improve their trafficking record, the State Department said.

This year, the Justice Department also put out a report on U.S. efforts to combat trafficking efforts at home. In 2008, the FBI opened 132 trafficking investigations, made 139 arrests and obtained 94 convictions.

Clinton invited to Tuesday's event members of Congress who are active on the issue, as well as global advocates for trafficking victims, in an effort to give the issue a higher profile and shine a spotlight on the need to combat it.

Calling for a renewed worldwide partnership between countries and non-governmental organizations to combat trafficking, Clinton said, "Trafficking thrives in the shadows, and it can be easy to dismiss it as something that happens to someone else, somewhere else. But that's not the case.

"Trafficking is a crime that involves every nation on Earth, and that includes our own," she said, calling trafficking a "grave problem" in the United States.

For the first time, she said, the United States next year will rank its own efforts at combating trafficking along with the rest of the world. She expressed hope that it will be on the Tier 1 list of countries that are making robust efforts.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

387 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Gazette (Montreal)

June 15, 2009 Monday
Final Edition

Cambodia shows how not to clean up the sex trade

BYLINE: The EconomistSECTION: EDITORIAL / OP-ED; The Economist; Pg. A21LENGTH: 521 words

In eerie, deserted silence on the outskirts of Phnom Penh sits the Prey Speu detention centre. Barely legible on its grimy walls a few weeks ago were cries for help and whispers of despair from the tormented souls once crammed into its grimy cells. "This is to mark that I lived in terror under oppression," read one message.

It recalls a Khmer Rouge torture centre from the genocidal 1970s. But in fact the building was used just last year as a "rehabilitation" centre, where detained sex workers, along with beggars and the homeless, learned sewing and cooking. They were rounded up in a crackdown on trafficking for the sex industry.

At first an attempt to clean up Phnom Penh, it soon escalated into a violent campaign by the police against prostitutes and those living on the street. According to Licadho, a local human-rights group, guards at the centre beat three people to death, and at least five detainees killed themselves. Sreymoa, a trafficked sex worker detained in May 2008 with her 4-year-old daughter, recalls daily beatings, rapes and one death.

Partly to allay the previous U.S. administration's concerns about trafficking, Cambodia in February 2008 outlawed prostitution. Three months later the U.S. Department of State took Cambodia off its annual "watch list" of human-trafficking countries. But the police read the law as entitling them to lock up all sex workers, not help victims of trafficking.

Reports of abuses soon surfaced, at first denied by the government. But in August it halted the raids as the United Nations and NGOs expressed mounting concern. One worry was that they would endanger HIV/AIDS-prevention programs. The prevalence of HIV in Cambodia had fallen to 0.8 per cent of the population since the government adopted a campaign in 2001 for "100-per-cent condom" use.

Now, however, fearing the brothels where they worked would be raided, many sex workers had started plying their trade on the streets or in karaoke bars, where health-care workers could not find them to distribute condoms.

Tony Lisle, of the UN's AIDS organization, says that since the raids stopped, HIV-prevention efforts have resumed with more success. Sex workers in bars as well as brothels are to be covered, and the police to be encouraged to teach sex workers about condom use. But those campaigning for sex workers' rights have objected, fearing that this might give the police a pretext to renew the raids. Jason Barber of Licadho says that for years the government has stopped arbitrary detentions when a fuss has been made, only to restart them as soon as attention has shifted.

Indeed, just before a regional summit in Phnom Penh in late May, the police again herded up beggars, sex-workers, and drug-users and sent them back to Prey Speu, newly reopened (with the graffiti painted over). Detaining sex workers is much easier than arresting the traffickers. But the global slowdown is adding to the ranks of the unemployed.

The World Bank forecasts that 200,000 Cambodians will fall below the poverty line this year. Many will fall into prostitution or beggary, whatever the law says and high-minded donors hope.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC:

Photo: NICOLAS ASFOURI, AFP GETTY IMAGES; Prostitutes in Phnom Penh: Efforts to wipe out the sex trade led to abuses and and hurt the fight against HIV. ;

DOCUMENT-TYPE: column

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2009 The Gazette, a division of CanWest MediaWorks Publication Inc.
All Rights Reserved

388 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Targeted News Service

June 11, 2009 Thursday 9:28 PM EST

U.S. State Department Releases 2009 Trafficking in Persons Report: South Africa Upgraded

BYLINE: Targeted News ServiceLENGTH: 356 wordsDATELINE: PRETORIA, South Africa

The U.S. Embassy issued the following news release:

The United States Department of State released the 2009 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report on June 16. South Africa's ranking has been upgraded from Tier 2 Watchlist to Tier 2, indicating that this past year, the government made significant efforts to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act, as amended (TVPA), requires the Secretary of State to submit an annual report to Congress. The goal of this report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery. The entire TIP Report, including the South Africa country report, is available on-line at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip>.

South Africa is a source, transit, and destination country for trafficked men, women, and children. This past year, the government has taken steps with the NGO community to enhance legal protection and other supports for victims of trafficking. The government opened prosecutions against 16 suspected trafficking offenders during the year. It is continuing to prepare for late 2009 passage and subsequent implementation of its comprehensive anti-trafficking law by developing inter-agency operating procedures and training officials on the law, victim identification, and agency roles. Foreign victims in South Africa, however, still face inadequate protection from the government. Labor trafficking does not receive as much government attention as does sex trafficking.

The report recommends several concrete steps be taken to combat trafficking in South Africa -- among them, that the South African government pass and enact the Prevention and Combating of Trafficking in Persons Bill; implement the Children's Amendment Act of 2007; and support prevention strategies developed by NGOs to address demand for commercial sex acts and protect children from commercial sexual exploitation in advance of the 2010 World Cup.

Contact: Sharon Hudson-Dean, 079/111-8276

Copyright Targeted News Services

TNS C-AmbRan 091221-mt93-2530689 61MarlizTagarum

LOAD-DATE: December 22, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Gulf Daily News

May 15, 2009

Workers 'ripe' for exploitation

LENGTH: 560 words

HUMAN trafficking in Bahrain primarily consists of the exploitation of workers who arrive in the country legitimately but fall into rogue hands, a top government official told a UN General Assembly meeting.

Government action alone is not sufficient and foreign embassies, non-governmental organisations and the business community have to be engaged to combat the practice, said Foreign Ministry assistant under-secretary for co-ordination and follow-up Shaikh Abdulaziz bin Mubarak Al Khalifa.

"Above all, awareness is the key," he said at the 63rd General Assembly Thematic Dialogue on Human Trafficking in New York on Wednesday.

The topic of discussion was 'Articulating a Global Plan of Action: Drawing Upon Practice at the National and Regional Level'.

Other speakers included UN special rapporteur on trafficking in persons Joy Ngozi Ezeilo, India's Apne Aap Women Worldwide president Ruchira Gupta and UN Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women member Saisuree Chutikul.

The Susan Mubarak Women's International Peace Movement head Aleya Hammad was the moderator.

Trafficking exists in the world because there is a supply of desperate, vulnerable people, ripe for exploitation, and a demand for cheap labour, said Shaikh Abdulaziz, who heads the Bahrain National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking.

"Thus, both supply and demand sides of the equation must be addressed.

"International co-operation is essential, but there are also measures that countries should take individually.

"Trafficking in Bahrain primarily consisted of the exploitation of workers who had legitimately entered the country.

"Legislation was enacted in January last year to define and criminalise trafficking, along with a national committee to combat it, involving government and non-governmental organisations.

"Shelters for victims have been established and awareness programmes instituted for lay people and those involved in the criminal justice system.

"Most significantly, the government has announced that the sponsorship system, tying workers to their employers and a source of much abuse, will be abolished on 1 August.

"In Bahrain, it has been found, however, that government action alone is not sufficient and foreign embassies, non-governmental organisations and the business community have to be engaged."

He said that to strengthen regional and international co-operation, Bahrain had hosted an international forum on the topic, with participation at the highest level.

"The outcome, known as the Manama Declaration, stresses the need for action at the national and international levels, in both the government and private sectors, and made clear the role of awareness."

He hoped it would become a cornerstone of international efforts against the problem.

Efforts

The US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report rated Bahrain last year in the Tier 2 category based on its "significant efforts" to address the issue and pledges.

It urged Bahrain to stop deporting victims of human trafficking and set up a shelter to provide them with medical and psychological care.

The department is required by law to submit an annual report each year to Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of human trafficking.

The aim is to raise awareness as well as highlight and encourage international community's effort to combat the problem.

LOAD-DATE: May 15, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

Copyright 2009 Gulf Daily News - Hilal Publishing and Marketing Group.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

390 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

May 10, 2009

Bahrain rights drive expanded

BYLINE: SOMAN BABY

LENGTH: 485 words

BAHRAIN's efforts to eliminate human trafficking will come under the spotlight at the UN next week.

Chairman of the national committee for combating human trafficking, Shaikh Abdul Aziz bin Mubarak Al Khalifa, has been invited to make a presentation at the thematic meeting of the UN General Assembly in New York on Wednesday.

"I consider it as an opportunity to bring our human rights records to international attention," Shaikh Abdul Aziz told the GDN.

"I shall talk about the committee's successful efforts to eliminate the practice of human trafficking by implementing the anti-human trafficking law."

Shaikh Abdul Aziz said the first prosecution under the law took place in December last year.

"A foreign woman, working as a waitress in a hotel, was jailed for three years for encouraging prostitution in the country," he said.

Shaikh Abdul Aziz said the abolition of the sponsorship system was the latest measure undertaken by the government as part of eliminating human trafficking.

He said the committee would make every effort to ensure that expatriate workers are treated in Bahrain with dignity.

"The committee has representatives from various ministries, including the ministries of Interior, Labour, Justice, Information and Foreign Affairs," he said.

"This helps us to forward complaints from workers brought to our attention directly to the concerned ministries or departments.

"For example, if there is a case to prosecute a sponsor, it will be brought to the notice of the Justice Ministry to ensure that justice is done without delay."

Cases of sponsors harassing the workers will be taken up with the Interior Ministry and non-payment of salary will be brought to the notice of the Labour Ministry, said Shaikh Abdul Aziz, who is also the Foreign Ministry assistant under-secretary.

"The committee now meets once a month, and reviews its activities," he added. "A public awareness campaign will be strengthened with the support of the Information Ministry."

"Leaflets in different languages will be distributed in various places."

The committee had so far received very few complaints, said Shaikh Abdul Aziz.

"The committee will expand its activities in the new year to help workers in distress and stop all forms of human trafficking in Bahrain," he added.

The US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report rated Bahrain last year in the Tier 2 category based on its "significant efforts" to address trafficking and on future pledges.

It urged Bahrain to stop deporting victims of human trafficking and to set up a shelter to provide them with medical and psychological care.

The US State Department is required by law to submit an annual report each year to Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of human trafficking.

The aim is to raise global awareness as well as highlight and encourage efforts by the international community to combat the problem.

soman@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: May 10, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

Copyright 2009 Gulf Daily News - Hilal Publishing and Marketing Group.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

391 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Cape Argus (South Africa)

April 16, 2009 Thursday
e1 Edition

SECTION: LIFE; Pg. 19

LENGTH: 242 words

Human trafficking is modern-day slavery. It is the selling of people for exploitation, be it for sex, labour or the harvesting of organs and body parts. According to the International Organisation for Migration, human trafficking is the third most lucrative crime in the world, after drug trafficking and weapon smuggling.

1 Is it really happening in SA?

Since there is no legislation criminalising human trafficking in South Africa, no official statistics are available.

South Africa is, however, widely regarded as a source, destination and transit country for human trafficking.

In 2005, a situational assessment on human trafficking in South Africa reported that in the five months between October, 2004, and March, 2005, a task team (investigating the commercial sexual exploitation of children) dealt with 62 cases relating to the commercial sexual exploitation of children.

1 Human trafficking and the law

In June, 2007, a human trafficking bill was drafted but has not yet been passed.

The South African government has ratified the Palermo Protocol (the protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in people) and established an inter-sectoral task team on trafficking in people.

But because of our failure to meet the minimum standards needed to eliminate trafficking, and for failure to provide data on trafficking crimes, South Africa has been placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" by the US Department of State in its Trafficking in Persons Report.

LOAD-DATE: April 16, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: CA

392 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Cyprus Mail

Internet Edition

Cyprus Mail

April 5, 2009 Sunday

For the priest with a crusade the campaign never ends

BYLINE: Elias Hazou

LENGTH: 2348 words

EIGHT years ago last week, Oxana Rantseva plunged to her death from a fifth-storey apartment in Limassol. The circumstances surrounding her death have never been fully elucidated. The 20-year-old Russian was an artiste working for a well-known cabaret in the coastal town. Her body was found only an hour after police had released her into the custody of her employer.

She had been tricked into coming to work in Cyprus as a translator. But Oxana found herself employed at Zigos Cabaret. She stayed there for seven days before fleeing, leaving behind a note that read:

[#x20ac]oeI[#x20ac][TM]m tired. I[#x20ac][TM]m leaving for Russia.[#x20ac]

She disappeared and after a day her employer notified police that she had abandoned her workplace.

Ten days later she was spotted during the early hours at a local discotheque by another cabaret artiste, who tipped off Oxana[#x20ac][TM]s employer. The latter, along with a relative, picked up the young woman and took her to the police station.

The duty officer at the station released her into her employer[#x20ac][TM]s custody, who was told to come back with her the next day to clear the issue up with immigration. Oxana never made it to sunrise. Her family believes that in a desperate bid to escape from her apartment, she slipped and fell to her death.

More recently, former US Ambassador to Cyprus Michael Klosson and Turkish Cypriot politician Serdar Denktash joined forces to rescue another victim of sexual exploitation, Elena Potoran from Moldavia.

Like Oxana, Elena had been duped into coming to work on the island, this time as a waitress. Instead, she found herself working at a cabaret in a Turkish Cypriot cabaret.

Elena, a virgin, refused to have sex with customers, but allegedly was forced to do it on the very first night. Eventually, through an intricate salvage operation involving a Russian Orthodox cleric in the south, the US Embassy in Nicosia and Serdar Denktash, Turkish Cypriot police raided the cabaret and freed Elena from the clutches of her boss.

The priest in question is Father Savvas Michaelides, who used to run a shelter for artistes in Limassol that claims to have rescued hundreds of women from the sex trade. He continues to counsel them.

The crusading cleric[#x20ac][TM]s ultimate goal is the criminalisation of the sex trade on the demand side. In his view, the most effective way of cracking down on traffickers and pimps is to go after the punters.

And he advocates following the Swedish model - a ban on the purchase of sexual services which observers there say has drastically reduced human trafficking and prostitution, though it has had the side-effect of driving the trade underground.

To Father Savvas, it[#x20ac][TM]s all or nothing. Half measures get you nowhere. And he feels that the government[#x20ac][TM]s recent attempts to crack down on cabarets in Cyprus are just that - half measures.

Under the new regime introduced last year, performers must be hired in dance troupes of four. They must also have papers proving they are professional dancers with a minimum of two years paid experience and dancing qualifications.

Where necessary the artistes will have to show they are [#x20ac]owell known[#x20ac] in their own country or internationally. In addition, if one member leaves, the entire troupe has to leave. Moreover, the paperwork process has been moved from the Interior Ministry (Immigration) to the Ministry of Labour.

Cabaret owners say these are impossible conditions that will drive them out of business. Father Savvas is not convinced; he says that cabarets will simply find a workaround. One way, he surmises, is that cabarets will be able to procure forged documents certifying that a woman is a professional dancer. While that may increase the costs of recruiting women - for example through kickbacks to authorities in the country of provenance - it can be done.

For years, our government has been an accomplice to sexual exploitation. How? By issuing artiste visas. But the inescapable truth is that artistes are in fact prostitutes. Therefore, the government has been condoning this activity, Father Savvas told the Sunday Mail.

The US Trafficking in Persons report has placed the Republic of Cyprus on the Tier 2 Watch List for three consecutive years. Tier 2 is for countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards set by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act 2000 for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to bring themselves in compliance. Cyprus is the only EU country in that category.

It is thought this sort of pressure has forced the government's hand. But a mentality shift is also needed, says Father Savvas.

Sadly, in Cyprus buying a woman is still considered acceptable behaviour, and even something men take pride in doing. All that needs to change, through a combination of government action and an awareness campaign to inform people of the evils of trafficking and sexual exploitation.

The priest is well aware that cabarets are only part of the equation. It's no secret that recent years have seen a steady rise in the number of women employed as barmaids on the island but who in reality offer sex services on the side, with the bar owners getting a piece of the action. But because these women are registered as barmaids and their profession has the veneer of legitimacy, it is that much harder to crack down on the activity. Potentially, this status allows for greater exploitation of the women.

A study commissioned by AKEL found that as many as 80 per cent of bars hired out women for sex. Although the data for this category was based largely on anecdotal evidence, in the year 2000 around 430 out of 537 bars were said to be involved in this activity.

Why is the government still issuing hundreds of barmaid visas? If they really want to stamp out sexual exploitation, they should abolish them as well, said Father Savvas.

The aforementioned study attempted to gauge the size of the informal, underground and illegal economy on the island, with emphasis on the exploitation of women and prostitution. It found that the turnover ran in the tens of millions of euros.

Hotels across the country also generate a sizeable income through room reservations. It is common knowledge that punters often meet women for sex at hotels.

Though bordering on the conspiracy-theory, Father Savvas maintains there are a great deal of vested interests keeping the sex industry going. Among other things, the industry generates income for lawyers defending cabaret owners against charges of abuse brought up by artistes. Some of these lawyers happen to be members of parliament.

It brings to mind a line from the movie American Gangster, where Detective Richie Roberts laments on the drugs trade: They don't want this to stop. It employs too many people. Cops, lawyers, judges, probation officers, prison guards. The day dope stops coming into this country, a hundred thousand people lose their jobs.

Being a prominent activist, Father Savvas was once interviewed by a French television network about human trafficking in Cyprus. Soon after the documentary was broadcast in France, Interior Minister Neoclis Sylikiotis happened to be on a visit to that country. During one of his meetings, someone who had watched the documentary broached the subject of human trafficking with regard to Cyprus, and on his return to the island Sylikiotis was able to use this as ammunition to crack down on the activity.

But there was a flipside: a few days later, Father Savvas got a call from a concerned CTO (Cyprus Tourism Organisation) officer.

He complained to me that we had become a laughing stock in Europe, hinting that my interview was a bad move, Father Savvas told the Sunday Mail.

Prostitution and sexual trafficking are two sides of the same coin. It doesn't matter whether the girl is aware of what her job entails. And consumption (punters buying drinks for artistes) is sexual harassment, no matter what spin you put on it.

Majority of girls know the score

IN CYPRUS, the act of prostituting oneself is legal and there are no laws against the purchase of sexual services; however, it is illegal for third parties (i.e. pimps) to earn a living out of prostitution. Otherwise said, brothels are outlawed.

Cabarets have been able to evade the arm of the law because they are registered as [nightclubs] and on paper are legitimate businesses.

Kleitos Kleovoulou, owner of the Mirage nightclub in Limassol, describes cabarets as strip-joints, where men come to meet women.

[We sell the company. What happens afterwards between two consenting adults is their own business. We never push the girls to have sex,] he insisted.

Though admitting that abuse of women was common in the past (cabaret owners would hold on to a woman's passport or threaten her if she refused to go out with punters), Kleovoulou said that today cabarets have cleaned up their act and that abuse is the exception rather than the rule.

And he shoots down the victimisation argument, pointing out that 99 per cent of the women coming to work as artistes know the score.

[Yes, some of the girls hate the job and leave, and they are free to do so,] said Kleovoulou, rejecting the notion of debt bondage, after numerous reports that girls have been manipulated into having sex with customers to repay their airfare once they reached the island.

[But many of them come back several times. Either way, I can guarantee you that no one is forced to do anything against their will.]

Kleovoulou himself has been in jail after one of the women he employed reported him to the police for abuse. He claims it was a set-up.

And while professing to have the [outmost respect] for Father Savvas - the two are acquainted - he says that stories of exploitation should be taken with a pinch of salt.

According to Kleovoulou, women are often coached or cajoled into testifying against their employer. In return for testifying, he says, the women are allowed to stay on the island for a year, during which time they receive state benefit.

Asked by the Sunday Mail whether it would not be more profitable for the girls to remain employed at cabarets rather than receive the monthly benefit, Kleovoulou said:

[Maybe so, but more often than not the girls go to the police when their contract is coming at an end, so that they get to stay here for another year. For many of these girls, who come from poor countries, the state benefit is way better than any salary they could get back home.]

Kleovoulou, who worked at Las Vegas Olympic Garden Cabaret for years before returning to Cyprus, ascribes to the view that having regulated prostitution is better than unregulated prostitution. An outright ban is of course out of the question - and unrealistic.

[Look, there will always be a demand for sex. And we agree that the worst practices should be rooted out. But what about all the girls working out of apartments? Does anyone check them for HIV and other diseases? No. By law, girls working at cabarets undergo all these medical checks.]

Kleovoulou believes that the new regulations governing cabaret girls have arisen out of a misguided attempt by the government to control the sex trade.

[The people who are behind this idea, they couldn't figure out a clever way of regulation. Under pressure from the Americans, they decided effectively to shut us down, using the new rules as a disguise. It's as simple as that.]

[This business about artistes requiring dancing certificates is utter nonsense.

Let's face it, the girls are strip dancers. I mean, come on, it's like asking Cicciolina [the famous Italian porn actress] for a university degree!]

Though denying that cabarets are in the prostitution business, Kleovoulou argues that sexual services perform a vital social function.

[Even here in Cyprus we're seeing an increase in sex crimes, minors being raped and what not. Now imagine what would happen if someone could no longer pay for sex. Things would get worse.]

And according to Kleovoulou - who claims credit for introducing a Hollywood style and glamour to the local cabaret scene - equating cabarets to brothels is a false impression.

[People come here to relax, to wind down. We put on exotic shows, we have lap dances. You wouldn't believe the clientele we've had. Famous people, even politicians. I think that some folks are taking this whole business way too seriously. Do they want to create a theocracy or something? They should lighten up a bit.]

Competition from bars and so-called [massage parlours] is getting tougher, and the economic crisis isn't helping either. Now, Kleovoulou says, the new regulations are the final nail in the coffin for cabarets.

Desperate times call for desperate measures - so to speak. In a marketing ploy, Kleovoulou, for example, plans to perk up business by bringing back an oldie. Every weekend, his cabaret will be staging a competition, where male punters walk up on the stage and are stripped by the girls.

The goal is to see which guy gets an erection first. If you get an erection, you win, Kleovoulou says.

The jackpot now stands at 10,000.

I'm still looking for a winner. We've had hundreds of guys go up on stage, and believe it or not they all freeze up. Personally, I was amazed by this, given the Cypriot male's macho ego. Just goes to show you.

Side bar

Human trafficking is the recruitment, transportation, harbouring, or receipt of people for the purposes of slavery, forced labor (including bonded labor or debt bondage), and servitude. It is the fastest growing criminal industry in the world, with the total annual revenue for trafficking in persons estimated to be between $5 billion and $9 billion.

Exploitation includes forcing people into prostitution or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery and servitude. For children, exploitation may also include forced prostitution, illicit international adoption, trafficking for early marriage, or recruitment as child soldiers, beggars, for sports (such as child camel jockeys or football players), or for religious cults.

LOAD-DATE: May 11, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 70

Copyright 2009 Cyprus Mail - Cyprus Mail Co. Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

393 of 404 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

April 4, 2009 Saturday 2:27 PM EST

GUINEA FEELS EFFECTS OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

LENGTH: 543 words

CONAKRY, Guinea, April 2 -- The U.S. Agency for International Development issued the following news release:

An elderly man from a remote area of Guinea broke into tears when he related how he was powerless to assist an orphan boy taken from his family and sent to a gold mine where he was forced to work from dusk till dawn. In Upper Guinea a mother explained that her daughter left home one day and never returned, apparently suffering a fate similar to other children in the village. These cases are not isolated incidents, but form a disturbing pattern of trafficking in persons that targets young children and even babies. The Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report ranks countries worldwide on a tier system based on their compliance with minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking. The four categories, indicating incrementally increasing levels of trafficking, include Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3. Guinea was recently upgraded to Tier 2 watch list, reflecting deepening concern and drawing special worldwide attention to the problem. Along the border of Guinea authorities reported 52 cases of trafficked young boys and girls between one and 15 years old. Young children are trafficked for sexual exploitation, illegal adoptions, and cheap labor, particularly in the mining sector. In Guinea, the majority of trafficked children are taken to Conakry for work. The trafficking usually involves an intermediary who promises the parents to educate the child or help the child find work then sells the child into virtual slavery. Guinea also serves as a transit country for international trafficking. UNICEF has identified a variety of trafficking operations including cross-border trafficking networks that transport young girls from Guinea, Togo and Burkina Faso to Nigeria, or from neighboring countries to Conakry for domestic or sexual work. Some children are transported to Europe, and some trafficking involves individuals who wish to immigrate illegally to other countries. The two-year USAID project, Strengthening Communities against Trafficking and Exploitation (SCATE), is active in Guinea and Mali. In this initiative, Save the Children program works to reinforce the capacity of village members, community councils, and government authorities face the threat of trafficking through training and legal reform. The effort also aims to alert authorities, particularly immigrations officials at the border, to detect trafficking in persons. To help young trafficking victims readjust once they have been returned to their families, vocational training centers strive to provide children with useful skills. The program has met with success. The USAID anti-trafficking program in Guinea yielded impressive results in 2007. Eleven 11 districts covered by a USAID-sponsored Save the Children project took part in the education and child protection assistance plan. The 2008 report from Save the Children's indicates that 350 parenting association and management committees have been reinforced. Over 200 teachers have been trained in protection/education, and more than 3000 children sensitized to the dangers of human trafficking. For more information please contact: Sarabjit Jagirdar, Email:- htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: April 4, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

394 of 404 DOCUMENTS

PNG Post-Courier (Australia)

March 24, 2009 Tuesday
1 Edition

PNG placed in human trafficking

BYLINE: By Caldron LaepaSECTION: HOME NEWS; Pg. 10LENGTH: 220 words

PNG has been rated in the third tier on United States Annual Reporting on Trafficking in Persons in its 2008 report.

This was revealed during the 2009 Human Smuggling and Trafficking conference last week.

Countries were rated by how they implemented the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. Those under the first tier are countries that are fully complying with the law, the second tier countries are making a significant effort to meet the minimum standard and those under the third tier are nations that did not comply with the minimum standards and whose governments are not acting significantly in dealing with the issue.

Speaking at the conference, Deputy Prime Minister Dr Puka Temu said there were relevant laws that could be applied to deal with human trafficking in PNG. Dr Temu said even though the criminal code did not provide a direct approach to human trafficking and smuggling in 2002, the Government introduced laws on commercial sex exploitation of children. He urged government departments to form working groups to continue implementation of necessary measures. We need to work together to ensure that the three Ps prosecution, protection and prevention are fully implemented. PNG Law Reform Commission Secretary Dr Lawrence Kalinoe said there was evidence of human smuggling and trafficking in the country.

LOAD-DATE: March 24, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: PTC

395 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Cyprus Mail

Internet Edition

Cyprus Mail

March 12, 2009 Thursday

Anti-trafficking offices to be expanded

BYLINE: Alexia Saoulli

LENGTH: 468 words

TRAFFICKING of human beings for sexual and labour exploitation is a problem that the police force wants to better curtail.

For this reason the police office responsible for handling combatting of trafficking of human beings will be extended to all districts with special training offered to the officers involved.

The idea is to better investigate trafficking cases in an effort to deal with the problem more effectively.

Although the initiative had not yet been implemented, it had the full backing of the police leadership, said Chief Superintendent Charalambos Ioannou.

Ioannou, who heads Department C at the Police HQ, said a circular had been issued recommending the office was strengthened. More details about the plan would be available over the next few days, he said.

It is thought that around 20 officers will be appointed across all districts and responsible for handling trafficking cases. They will all receive special training for this purpose. Up until now investigations have come under each district's Criminal Investigation Departments.

Each district office will be answerable to the Combatting of Trafficking of Human Beings Office in Nicosia which is headed by Rita Superman and comes under the umbrella of Department C. Superman's office will be responsible for the all over co-ordination of operations.

The scheme will greatly facilitate the office which is currently staffed by Superman and two other officers.

Meanwhile reports that Cyprus was involved in receiving thousands of trafficked women for sexual exploitation were referring to the occupied areas, said Superman.

According to press reports Tel Aviv police are searching for the suspected ringleader of Israel's biggest woman trafficking network which smuggled thousands of women from the former Soviet Union into Israel, Cyprus, Belgium and England, forcing them to work as prostitutes.

This was referring to the occupied areas, she said.

Nevertheless the US Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report has placed the Republic of Cyprus on the Tier 2 Watch List for three consecutive years.

Tier 2 is for countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards set by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act 2000 for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant effort to bring themselves in compliance. It is the only EU country in that category.

It is thought that improvements to the Combatting of Trafficking of Human Beings Office could have something to do with recent changes in US legislation that stipulate any country on Tier 2 for two consecutive years is automatically demoted to Tier 3 Watch List.

Tier 3 status is for countries that neither comply with the minimum standards nor make significant efforts to come into compliance. In 2008 Tier 3 countries included Iran, North Korea, Qatar and Fiji.

LOAD-DATE: March 12, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 70

Copyright 2009 Cyprus Mail - Cyprus Mail Co. Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

396 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Gates of Vienna

March 12, 2009 Thursday 11:58 PM ESTGates of Vienna News Feed 3/12/2009*BYLINE: Baron BodisseyLENGTH: 24496 words

Mar. 12, 2009 (Gates of Vienna delivered by Newstex) --

There are a lot of news stories tonight about the Netherlands. Bus drivers in Arnhem walked off the job to protest increasing violence on their buses by oeyouths. Stores in an Amsterdam shopping mall (including IKEA) were closed down due to terrorist bomb threats. The Dutch have been cited by the Council of Europe for their human rights violations. And a new chief of police has been appointed for the region of Zuid-Holland, despite being a white male.

Thanks to Amil Imani, C. Cantoni, CSP, Insubria, JD, Steen, TB, Tuan Jim, and all the other tipsters who sent these in. Headlines and articles are below the fold.

Financial Crisis

|45 Percent of Worlds Wealth Destroyed: Blackstone CEO

|Chinese Exports Plunge: Minus 25% in February

|David Frum: an Insiders Guide to the Obama Administrations Mistakes

|Iran Says Capitalism on Verge of Collapse

|Obamas Honeymoon Bliss Fading

|US Calls for Tripling of IMF Firepower

USA

|EPA Plans U.S. Registry of Greenhouse Gas Emissions

|For Sale: the New York Times Corporate Jet

|Lies in Plain Sight

|Listen to the Gitmo Five

|Obama Grants 2 More Lobbyists Waivers

|Obama: Pro-Israel Talk, Anti-Israel Walk

|S.F. Police Union Accuses Ayers in 1970 Bombing

|Terrorist Watch List Hits 1 Million

Canada

|Canada: Khawaja Sentenced to 10 1/2 Years on Terror Charges

Europe and the EU

|Court Rules on CIA Snatch Secrecy

|Czech Republic: NATO Must Remain Basis of European Defence " Klaus

|Czech Republic: Qatar Sends to Czech Republic Decision on Prince Sani " Server

|Denmark: Victims Funeral Procession in Nørrebro

|Denmark: Minister: OK to Secret Hearings

|Energy: Segolene Royal Launches Regional Solar Energy Plan

|Film: Catalonia Forces 50% Films to be Dubbed in Catalan

|Finland: Interior Ministry Plans Tighter Screening of Gun Licence Applicants

|Finland: Dispute Over Female Clergy Leads to First Sackings of Church Employees

[Finland: Shooting Clubs: New Age Limits Kill Shooting Hobby
 [Finland: Indian oeFilm-Maker Convicted of Human Trafficking
 [Greece: Stop to New Bar and Restaurant Licences in Athens
 [Greece: Hundreds of Public Officials Accused of Corruption
 [Netherlands: Bus Drivers Walk Out in Protest at Aggression
 [Netherlands: White Male Candidate Nominated After All
 [Netherlands First Choice for Somalians
 [Netherlands: Council of Europe Criticises Dutch Human Rights
 [Netherlands: Cabinet Ignores Motion to Protest Wilders Ban in EU
 [Netherlands: Police Arrest Seven in Amsterdam Terror Threat
 [Row After French Director Compares Illegals to War-Time Jews
 [Sweden: Criminal Gangs Show No Signs of Leaving Sweden
 [UK: Muslim Protester Who Works as Baggage Handler at Luton Airport Has Security Pass Suspended After Hurling Abuse at Troops
 [UK: Stop Pandering to Enemies of Our Way of Life
 Balkans
 [Serbia: Minister, 7.9% of Population Under Line of Poverty
 [Serbia: One in Four Citizens Works in Grey Zone
 [Serbia-Spain: Accord on Avoiding Double Taxation Signed Mediterranean Union
 [Energy: EU Commission, Integrated Med Market Needed
 [Mediterranean: First Western Area Country Talks in Genoa
 North Africa
 [Al Azhar Says Yes to Organs Explant From Sentenced to Death
 [Algeria: Newspaper Seized for Article on Bouteflika
 [Darfur: Algeria Rejects Arrest Warrant for Bashir
 [Economy: Tunisian Minister Says Trade Balance is Improving
 [ENI: it Will Take Months to Purchase Stake, Libyan Ambassador
 [Israel: Shalit, Family Fears Forthcoming Netanyahu Govt
 [Oil: OPEC Considering More Production Cuts, Khelil Says
 [Tunisia: Leather-Footwear Export Triples in 10 Years
 Israel and the Palestinians
 [#x2dc]Deep Concern Obama Ready to Talk to Hamas
 [EU Concerned on Demolition in East Jerusalem
 [Israel: Street Named in Honour of Egyptian Singer
 Middle East
 [Iraq: Saddam Aide Gets 15-Year Jail Term for Murders
 [Iraq: Suspected Iranian Bombing Kills Child
 [Iraq: Shoe Thrower Sentenced to 3 Years
 [Saudi Arabia: Prison, Whipping for 75-Year-Old Widow: Her Nephew Brought Her Bread
 [Turkey, Egypt Under Fire for Textile Duties
 [Turkeys Arab-Bound Trade Shows Sharp Rise
 [Turkey Opens Education Center in Lebanon
 Russia
 [Estonia: Kremlin Loyalist Says Launched Estonia Cyber-Attack
 South Asia
 [Malaysia: Visas for 70,000 Bangladeshi Immigrants Revoked
 [More Troops in Thai South
 [Pakistan: Islam Has [#x2dc]No Link With Terrorism, Says PM
 [Pakistan: Swat Valley: Sharia Implemented on 16 March
 [Singapore: 2 Ji Detainees Released
 [Thai Bloggers Face Jail Without Bail for Discussing Monarchy
 Far East
 [Philippines: Cardinals Rosales and Vidal Pressure Arroyo for Agrarian Reform
 Latin America

|From Chile, Appeal to End Embargo Against Cuba
 |The Americas Report: Nicole Ferrand on Islamic Terrorism in Latin America
 |Venezuela: Israel Lobbies Chavez to Curb Anti-Semitism in Venezuela
 Immigration
 |Denmark: Immigration Service to Reopen Old Residency Cases
 |Justice Dept. Investigates Arizona Sheriff for Enforcing Immigration Law
 |Spain: Government Wont Prosecute if Illegals Taken in Culture Wars
 |Coed Showers Going Statewide?
 |Germany: the Anti-God Squad
 |Girl Scouts Birthday " But Nothing to Celebrate
 |Judge Orders Homeschoolers Into Public District Classrooms
 |Policy Discriminating Against Bible Clubs Challenged
 |UK: Labour Double Standards as Smoking Ban is Lifted for G20 World Leaders
 General
 |An Appeal to Cultural Muslims
 |Regulate Armed Robots Before Its Too Late
 |Space Junk Threat Worried Space Station
 |Why We Elect Liars as Leaders

45 Percent of Worlds Wealth Destroyed: Blackstone CEO

Private equity company Blackstone Group LP (BX.N) CEO Stephen Schwarzman said on Tuesday that up to 45 percent of the worlds wealth has been destroyed by the global credit crisis.

Between 40 and 45 percent of the worlds wealth has been destroyed in little less than a year and a half, Schwarzman told an audience at the Japan Society. This is absolutely unprecedented in our lifetime.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Chinese Exports Plunge: Minus 25% in February

Experts were expecting a reduction of 5%. Party academics estimate that the government will have to find work for at least 50 million unemployed.

Beijing (AsiaNews/Agencies) " Chinas exports fell 25.7 % in February from a year earlier. Imports fell 24.1%, the General Administration of Customs also announced today. Economists forecasts had put the slide at 5% exports and 25% imports.

The new data confirms the worrying slowdown in the Chinese economy, the third strongest in the world, and up until now based on exports, a sector now in crisis because of the global economic situation.

Reductions in exports are creating heavy unemployment. Businesses which relied upon foreign orders are closing without notice, leaving thousands of workers on the streets without jobs. According to academics of the Chinese communist party, this year the government will have to find work for an estimated 50 million people.

In order to halt the effects of the crises, linked to exports, the government has planned to increase internal demand, by adopting a packet of measures worth 4 trillion Yuan (over 400 billion Euro) as well as tax relief for exporters and investment in large infrastructural projects.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[\[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

David Frum: an Insiders Guide to the Obama Administrations Mistakes

Invited by a reporter Monday to criticize President Obamas economic plans, the chair of the White House Council of Economic Advisers, Christina Romer, naturally brushed the question aside. "You want me to tell you whats wrong with the fiscal stimulus package?" she said. "SO not going to do that!"

Too late! As it happens, the lecture Romer had just finished delivering at the Brookings Institute on Monday afternoon was criticism enough.

An expert on the Great Depression, Romer organized her lecture around six lessons distilled from the era. The administration she serves seems to be disregarding every one of them.

LESSON ONE: Romer warned that a small fiscal stimulus has only small effects. "While Roosevelts fiscal actions were a bold break from the past, they were nevertheless small relative to the size of the problem, she said. Roosevelts spending increased the deficit by only 1.5 percent of GDP in 1934. And Obama? His fiscal stimulus is certainly big-almost $800 billion, or oeclose to three percent of GDP in each of the next two years, Romer said. But most of that money wont be spent until 2010 or later, meaning its fairly modest right now, when we really need it.

LESSON TWO: Romer argued that monetary expansion can be a powerful tool even when interest rates have reached zero. The Roosevelt administration reflatd by taking the U.S. off the gold standard in 1933-and then (unintentionally) by issuing oegold certificates against the European gold that flowed into the U.S. as war approached in the late 1930s. The Obama administration, by contrast, seems to have written off monetary policy as exhausted, and is betting everything on the power of its inadequate fiscal stimulus.

Romer expressed her concerns on this matter delicately: "In thinking about the lessons from the Great Depression for today, she said, "I want to tread very carefully. A key rule of my current job is that I do not comment on Federal Reserve policy. So, let me be very clear-I am not advocating going on a gold standard just so we can go off it again, or that Tim Geithner should start conducting rogue monetary policy. But the experience of the 1930s does suggest that monetary policy can continue to have an important role to play even when interest rates are low by affecting expectations, and in particular, by preventing expectations of deflation.

Behind Romers delicate words is a question: Why does the Obama administration talk down the importance of monetary policy? The Federal Reserve still has weapons in its arsenal, including whats called oequantitative easing-technical jargon for what amounts to printing more money and deliberately inflating. These measures are not only powerful, they are a lot easier to stop when they are no longer needed-unlike, say, the administrations big spending plans.

LESSON THREE: Romer warned against cutting back on stimulus too soon-the mistake that FDR made in 1937. That may sound like a justification for the slow-release Obama fiscal plan. But as Romer notes, FDRs stimulus was not so much ended as it was counteracted, by the imposition of Social Security taxes in 1937, for example. In the same way, the Obama administration has already announced that upper-bracket income taxes will rise in 2011. More ominously, thats likely the date at which the administrations cap-and-trade plan will go into effect, sharply increasing energy costs.

Romer seems worried about this problem too: "We will need to monitor the economy closely to be sure that the private sector is back in the saddle before government takes away its crucial lifeline, she said.

LESSON FOUR: Romer noted that financial recovery and real recovery go together. But not in this administration! The stimulus plan is already enacted. A huge omnibus spending bill is rolling to the finish line. And big budget increases in fiscal 2010 seem certain. Yet at best the Obama financial plan is still a work in progress. My colleague John Makin from the American Enterprise Institute offers a tougher description: the plan, he says, is oepaque, ad hoc and unsystematic.

LESSON FIVE: Romer urged that the recovery efforts must be global. Too bad, then, about this report in Tuesdays Washington Post: oe Even as world trade takes its steepest drop in 80 years amid the global economic crisis, the administration is preparing to take a harder line with Americas trading partners. It will seek new benchmarks before supporting already-written trade agreements with Colombia and South Korea and is suggesting that it will dig in its heels on global trade talks, demanding that other countries make broader concessions first.

LESSON SIX: Romers final lesson may be the least reassuring: Despite the chaos, loss of faith and lost wealth, the Great Depression, she said, oedid eventually end. So it did. And so did the dinosaurs. In the long run we are indeed all dead. In the short run, however, it would be nice not to be poor.

In an administration that increasingly seems baffled by the financial crisis, a White House official who is willing to pierce the illusion of happy consensus can do a real service. We dont need jolly, bogus reassurance. We need real thinking and a more open and productive debate. The administrations top economist has now publicly, if elliptically, served notice of the likely inadequacy of the administrations plans. Better to correct course early rather than too late!

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Iran Says Capitalism on Verge of Collapse

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad told regional leaders on Wednesday that the capitalist system was close to collapse.

Opening a one-day summit of the 10-nation Economic Cooperation Organization (ECO) including Turkey, Pakistan and other neighbors, he also suggested a single currency should be used in trade between members.

" Hat tip: JD

[Return to headlines]

Obamas Honeymoon Bliss Fading

President Obamas honeymoon is beginning to fade.

Members of Congress and old political hands say he needs to show substantial progress reviving the economy soon.

Some Democrats have started to worry that voters dont and wont understand the link between economic revival and Obamas huge agenda, which includes saving the banking industry, ending home foreclosures, reforming healthcare and developing a national energy policy, among much else.

While lawmakers debate controversial proposals contained in the new presidents debut budget " cutting farm subsidies, raising taxes on charitable contributions, etc. " there is a growing sense that time is running out faster than expected.

Democrats from states racked by recession say Obama needs to produce an uptick by August or face unpleasant consequences. Others say that there is more time, but that voters need to see improvement by the middle of next year.

" Hat tip: JD

[Return to headlines]

US Calls for Tripling of IMF Firepower

The US raised the stakes in its drive for an aggressive response to the global financial crisis on Wednesday, calling for a tripling of the International Monetary Funds firepower and bigger fiscal stimulus measures worldwide.

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

EPA Plans U.S. Registry of Greenhouse Gas Emissions

The Environmental Protection Agency plans to establish a nationwide system for reporting greenhouse gas emissions, a program that could serve as the basis for a federal cap on the buildup of carbon dioxide and other gases linked to global warming.

The registry plan, which was announced yesterday, would cover about 13,000 facilities that account for 85 to 90 percent of the nations greenhouse gas output. It was drafted under the Bush administration but stalled after the Office of Management and Budget objected to it because the EPA based the rule on its powers under the Clean Air Act.

oeOur efforts to confront climate change must be guided by the best possible information, said EPA Administrator Lisa P. Jackson in a statement. oeThrough this new reporting, we will have comprehensive and accurate data about the production of greenhouse gases. This is a critical step toward helping us better protect our health and environment " all without placing an onerous burden on our nations small businesses.

Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer, both California Democrats, had inserted language in a 2007 spending bill instructing EPA to develop a national greenhouse gas reporting system.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

For Sale: the New York Times Corporate Jet

by Micahel Calderone

It looks like Arthur Sulzberger Jr. may have to fly commercial: The Times Co. is selling its corporate jet.

Editor & Publisher pulled out this nugget from the Times annual meeting proxy.

Besides chauffeuring around the Times top executive, the jet came in handy after the Iowa caucus last year, as Times staffers avoided congestion at the Des Moines airport en route to New Hampshire.

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Lies in Plain Sight

The establishment press gives no airtime to experts with a pragmatic sense of economics. They dont report the lavish soirees the Obamas have been throwing, or the harridan Nancy Pelosis squandering of taxpayer money on military jets to ferry her family and friends around the country. Not a word has been spoken with respect to Obama lying about banning earmarks and curtailing the influence of lobbyists. Most Americans would be amazed to learn that aggressor nations such as North Korea and Iran " which were supposed to have changed their tunes as soon as Obama was sworn in " have stepped up their anti-American rhetoric.

Most importantly, we dont hear that Congress and the Obama administration are wiping their behinds with the Constitution and quite literally stealing billions of dollars from us on a weekly basis.

" Hat tip: JD

[Return to headlines]

Listen to the Gitmo Five

WASHINGTON WONKS IN DENIAL KSM: TELLING US EXACTLY WHAT HE BELIEVES.

AS White House staffer Jane Austen put it to Sen. Darcy: oeIt is a truth universally acknowledged that a single terrorist in possession of a good bomb must be in want of patient understanding.

Unfortunately for Washington wonks determined to deny that Islamist extremists are motivated by extremist Islam, the pride and prejudice of Allahs butchers were on public display (again) this week.

Framed in florid quotations from the Koran, the Gitmo Five " hard-core terrorists, including Khalid Sheik Mohammed " proclaimed in a filing released by a brave military judge that oeWe are terrorists to the bone who regard the charges resulting from oethe blessed 11 September operations as oebadges of honor.

Desperate to placate its blame-America supporters, the Obama administration has clamped down on news from Guantanamo. Why? After their lurid criticisms of Gitmo, the Dems now have the worlds worst killers on their hands.

And they dont know what to do. Responsibility sucks.

At the core of our inability to cope with Islamist terrorists lies Washingtons denial that fanatical Islam is even a factor. Yet refusing to accept that Islam Gone Wild is behind the actions of al Qaeda or the Taliban is akin to insisting that sex has nothing to do with making babies.

Other factors may intensify or accelerate a terrorists will to slaughter the innocent. But the dark heart of the matter is that these men believe theyre on a mission from their god to punish the godless (including fellow Muslims who dont measure up).

Yet, no matter how fiercely our enemies declare that their faith compels them to kill, our elected and appointed officials continue to insist that the terrorists dont understand themselves " that theyre really driven by economic factors or our own foreign-policy missteps, that their savage interpretation of Islam is only a ploy . . .

Shouldnt we pay just a little attention to what our enemies say about themselves?

Radical Islam isnt just a smokescreen. Jihad is real. And it aint about who got the Coca-Cola franchise in Khartoum.

As I seethe through DC meetings (always careful to wash thoroughly afterward), Im continually disheartened by the contortions of oeexperts determined to prove that enemies who regard death as a promotion arent really devout, that they just need hugs and massive amounts of aid.

A few weeks back, I spoke to a roomful of senior military officers. In response to my suggestion that we should listen to what terrorists are only too glad to tell us, a foreign oecounterinsurgency expert insisted that religion simply isnt a factor.

To buttress his claim, he cited the survey every Muslims-R-Us analyst trots out: In questioning 138,000 prisoners who passed through US hands in Iraq, barely 10 percent claimed to be motivated by Islam, while 60 percent of the violent actors said they did it for money. (The rest were just in a bad mood.)

Even if every Iraqi told the complete truth, that misses the point. This isn't about quantity, but the quality of commitment. Terrorist movements never field a majority or even a significant minority of a population. At most, a few hundred fanatics were behind 9/11.

Anyway, who paid the did-it-for-cash bunch? The religious fanatics.

Even in ethnic struggles, such as those in the Balkans in the 1990s, the violence begins with less than 1 percent of the population armed and determined. The ranks of the violent swell for various reasons, but it's the hard-core believers in the supremacy of their blood or faith who instigate the destruction of troubled societies.

To counter that carpetbaggers statistics, I pointed out that a sampling of 138,000 German POWs in 1945 would have shown that fewer than 5 percent were unrepentant believers in Nazi ideology. But subtract Nazism from the German political equation, and there would've been no World War II in Europe. True believers shatter worlds.

As for the argument that not every terrorist lived in a state of perfect religious purity before jumping into jihad, that utterly misses the point: A society's prevailing sense of right and wrong is shaped by centuries of religious culture. American atheists conform to behavioral values ingrained in us all by thousands of years of Judeo-Christian authority.

In the Greater Middle East, even lackadaisical Muslims have been molded by the legacy of 13 centuries of Islam. Thus Mom thinks it a splendid thing that her son strapped on a bomb and became a martyr by murdering 40 innocents in a market.

Her culture admires that sacrifice. Ours doesn't.

Listen to the Gitmo Five. Unlike our Washington pols, they have intellectual integrity. They're telling us honestly who they are and why they seek to kill us.

Our response? They don't know what they're talking about.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Obama Grants 2 More Lobbyists Waivers

Brings La Raza immigration activist on board

The waivers were provided for Jocelyn Frye, director of policy and projects in the Office of the First Lady, and Cecilia Munoz, director of intergovernmental affairs in the executive office of the president. The two waivers were announced on the White House blog Tuesday evening, which said the exceptions were granted under a public interest exemption of the executive order on ethics.

Munoz was a senior vice president for the National Council of La Raza, where she supervised all legislative and advocacy activities on the state and local levels. Munoz was heavily involved in the immigration battles in Congress in recent years, and is now a principal liaison to the Hispanic community for the administration.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Obama: Pro-Israel Talk, Anti-Israel Walk

Barely a month into the presidency of Barack Obama, a profound realization is spreading among the pro-Israel community: we do not have an ally in the White House. The growing threat that Israel and the Jewish People now face demands an immediate acceptance of the facts on the ground regarding President Obama's perspective and agenda, and decisive action to prevent the frightening reality that he may play a leading role in creating.

So how exactly did this get by most Jewish voters during last year's election? While some, including this author, warned of his dubious associations and likely course of action regarding Israel, Obama brilliantly pandered to Jewish crowds around the country with his scripted and amorphous proclamations of support for Israel, while utilizing an array of prominent Jewish surrogates in order to avoid any real accountability.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

S.F. Police Union Accuses Ayers in 1970 Bombing

Leaders of San Francisco's police officers union have accused Weather Underground co-founder Bill Ayers and his wife, Bernardine Dohrn, of taking part in the 1970 bombing of a city police station that killed a sergeant.

The union leveled the charge in a letter to a conservative organization lobbying for arrests in the case, but said it had not been in contact with investigators and had no new evidence related to the bombing, which killed Sgt. Brian McDonnell.

Instead, the union cited information from a former Bay Area resident, Larry Grathwohl, who is working with the conservative group, America's Survival Inc. of Maryland. Grathwohl asserts that he infiltrated the Weather Underground as an FBI informant and heard Ayers confess to a role in the bombing.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Terrorist Watch List Hits 1 Million

The government's terrorist watch list has hit 1 million entries, up 32% since 2007.

Federal data show the rise comes despite the removal of 33,000 entries last year by the FBI's Terrorist Screening Center in an effort to purge the list of outdated information and remove people cleared in investigations.

It's unclear how many individuals those 33,000 records represent " the center often uses multiple entries, or identities, for a person to reflect variances in name spellings or other identifying information. The remaining million entries represent about 400,000 individuals, according to the center.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Canada: Khawaja Sentenced to 10 1/2 Years on Terror Charges

OTTAWA " Momin Khawaja, the Ottawa computer specialist who plotted jihad from his government desk, was sentenced Thursday to a further 10 1/2 years in jail on five terrorism-related charges, including financing and facilitating a group of British Islamist extremists plotting to bomb London and to wage religious war against the West.

Khawaja, 29, was found guilty in October, five years after he was arrested in what was seen as a key test of Canadas Anti-terrorism Act, controversial legislation that was enacted just three months after 9/11.

The court accepted the Crowns argument that Khawaja had agreed to build 30 remote-controlled bomb detonators for jihadists, although it is not clear that he knew where or how they would be deployed.

Khawaja was working in Ottawa as a software contractor for the Department of Foreign Affairs, when the Mounties swooped on March 29, 2004.

Hours later, hundreds of British police and MI5 security service officers fanned out across pre-dawn London. They arrested several people and seized 600 kilograms of ammonium nitrate, which they say was to be used in chemical attacks against public sites in and around London by a British terrorist cell directed from Pakistan.

British police charged several suspects, all of Pakistani descent, with terrorism offences. Five were convicted last year and sentenced to life terms.

Khawajas defence lawyer, Lawrence Greenspon, suggested during pre-sentence hearings that Khawaja, who has been behind bars for five years, should serve just one day more. Greenspon contended that Khawajas actions were oethe low-er end of the spectrum and not oetrue terrorism.

Khawaja did not take the stand in his defence and has been silent on the charges since his arrest.

Crown attorney David McKercher has called Khawaja a threat to society and had asked the courts to impose a life sentence.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Court Rules on CIA Snatch Secrecy

Both sides claim victory in cleric rendition case

(ANSA) " Rome, March 12 " Italys Constitutional Court left both sides in a CIA rendition case crying victory after ruling prosecutors had broken state secrecy rules in some cases but not others.

The ruling meant a Milan trial into the 2003 abduction of Muslim cleric Hassan Mustafa Omar Nasr will go ahead next Wednesday but prosecutors will have to do without some pieces of evidence.

In particular, certain documents on the activities of military intelligence agency SISMI have been ruled inadmissible, as well as the confession of a Carabinieri officer who said he took part in the snatch.

But prosecutors will be allowed to use wiretaps of SISMI agents.

However, the exact impact of the sentence on the trial is not yet sure, the presiding judge said Thursday.

oeWe shall have to wait for the explanation of the verdict, which typically comes out weeks or even months after rulings, said Judge Oscar Magi.

Prosecutor Armando Spataro said Wednesday night's verdict showed we were correct while the state's general advocate, Ignazio Francesco Caramazza, claimed a complete victory.

Legal experts said the prosecutors would perhaps be hampered by not being allowed to ask questions about relations between the CIA and SISMI.

The upper and lower house caucus chiefs for Premier Silvio Berlusconi's People of Freedom Party, Maurizio Gasparri and Fabrizio Cicchitto, reacted to the court ruling Thursday by saying the prosecutors should be punished for damaging the Italian secret service, Italy's reputation and the fight against terrorism.

"This does not end here, they said, announcing moves to call Spataro and his fellow prosecutors to account.

The Constitutional Court took two days to examine three pleas from successive Italian governments on the trial of several top Italian spies and 26 CIA agents in the abduction of Nasr.

It also considered two counterpleas, from the Milan judge and the prosecution in the case, arguing that state secrecy norms were not violated and the abduction itself was a subversive act that breached the Constitution. Spataro has accused Berlusconi and his predecessor Romano Prodi of using national security norms to obstruct justice and prevent the truth from emerging.

Successive Italian governments, while denying any role in Nasr's abduction, have argued that the probe compromised relations with foreign security agencies.

The abduction of Nasr claimed headlines worldwide and stoked discussion of the controversial US policy of extraordinary rendition, which was recently extended by President Barack Obama under the proviso that detainees' rights should be respected.

The top Italian defendant in the case is Niccolò Pollari, the former head of SISMI, which recently changed its name to AISE.

Eight Italians including Pollari and his former deputy Marco Mancini are on trial with the 26 CIA agents, who are being tried in absentia.

The US agents include ex-Rome CIA station chief Robert Seldon Lady and ex-Milan chief Jeff Castelli.

PERFECT EXAMPLE OF RENDITION.

The Council of Europe, Europe's human rights body, has called Nasr's case a perfect example of rendition.

Nasr, the former head of Milan's main mosque, disappeared from the northern Italian city on February 17, 2003.

Prosecutors say he was snatched by a team of CIA operatives with SISMI's help and whisked off to a NATO base in Ramstein, Germany.

From there, he was taken to Egypt to be interrogated, allegedly under duress.

Nasr, who was under investigation in Italy on suspicion of helping terrorists, was released early in 2007 from an Egyptian jail where he says he was beaten, given electric shocks and threatened with rape.

He has demanded millions of euros in compensation from the Italian government.

Berlusconi, who was in power at the time of the events, has been called to testify at the trial.

Prodi, his predecessor and successor, has also been admitted as a witness.

The CIA was first granted permission to use rendition in a presidential directive signed by President Bill Clinton in 1995 and the practice grew sharply after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Czech Republic: NATO Must Remain Basis of European Defence " Klaus

Prague " NATO has been one of the pillars of the free world and must remain the basis of the European defence architecture, Czech President Vaclav Klaus writes in a commentary in Hospodarske noviny (HN) when ten years have passed since the Czech Republics entry to NATO.

This is the only way to preserve the firm Transatlantic bond on which the postwar security in Europe is based, Klaus says.

He writes that he considers the Czech Republics accession to NATO on March 12, 1999 the fulfillment of one of the key priorities of the countrys post-November 1989 foreign and security policy.

All considerations about the future development of European integration in the security area should follow the priority to maintain NATOs efficiency and ability of action, Klaus points out.

oeWe must not allow further enlargement to occur at the expense of the ability of action and devaluate the strength and scope of NATOs security commitments. We must not allow for NATOs trustworthiness and strength in the world to decline, Klaus writes.

He says he thinks that NATO has always meant more than a mere military and security pact.

The defence alliance of the most significant democratic countries from both sides of the Atlantic are namely connected not only by joint political interests, but also by the values that these countries are prepared to develop and defend, Klaus notes.

Europe owes its unprecedented 64 years in peace exactly to the U.S. military force and the alliance with it.

oeMany of us viewed NATO, even in the communist era, as one of the fundamental pillars of the free world. We saw that it had proved successful face to face to the expansion of the communist totalitarian rule and that it had considerably contributed to the victory of the free world in the Cold War, Klaus writes.

He adds that the statesmen from the NATO member states who have contributed to the enlargement of the Alliance by the accession of the communist countries deserve great thanks.

During the ten years in NATO, Czech soldiers have proved that they are reliable allies, they have shown courage in combat actions and initiative, Klaus writes.

NATO membership has enabled the Czech military to be transformed into a modern armed force, he concludes in HN.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Czech Republic: Qatar Sends to Czech Republic Decision on Prince Sani " Server

Prague " Qatar has at last sent to the Czech Justice Ministry the official decision by which the Qatari prosecutors office halted the prosecution of Prince Hamid bin Abdal Sani who was convicted of sex with underage girls in the Czech Republic, server Tyden.cz reports today.

[Comment from Tuan Jim: By islamic standards, they certainly werent underage.]

The Czech verdict was not valid. The Prague Municipal Court could now re-open the case on the basis of the Qatari decision.

The two-page document must first be translated from Arabic, however.

A Prague court sentenced Prince Sani to 2.5 years in prison for sex with 16 underage and juvenile girls in 2005.

The court made the decision even though then justice minister Pavel Nemecek decided to hand over Sanis prosecution to Qatar a few days after Sani was charged.

The lower court and later the Municipal Court in Prague said Nemeceks decision was illegal.

The Supreme Court, however, said law allows the minister to make such a decision.

Sani was released from custody and he left for Qatar where he was arrested, spent eight days in custody and then was investigated for several months.

The Qatari prosecutor, however, eventually halted the prosecution.

Qatar took time sending the official decision and the Czech Justice Ministry sent it several notes, Tyden.cz writes.

The decision eventually arrived in the Czech Republic in February.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Denmark: Victims Funeral Procession in Nørrebro

The Copenhagen police has given the go-ahead for a funeral procession in Nørrebro as part of a demonstration against an ongoing gang war in the district.

The family of Mustafa Shakir Hsownay, who was an innocent victim of a shooting in the Mjølnerparken Estate in Nørrebro on February 27, has been given permission to hold a funeral procession through Nørrebrogade on Saturday.

Mustafa Shakir Hsownays coffin will be carried a 3.5 km stretch from Nørrebro Station to Nørreport.

The demonstration has been registered, and since theres nothing in the rules that says that you cannot carry a coffin during a demonstration, they have permission, Jørgen Thomsen of the Permissions and Licensing Department of the Copenhagen Police tells bt.dk.

The family says that the procession is in protest against an ongoing gang war in the capital, according to bt.dk.

Mustafa Shakir Hsownay was killed while sitting in his car in a parking lot at the Mjølnerparken Estate on Feb. 27. Police say he had nothing to do with the ongoing gang war between bikers and immigrant gangs that has plagued the Nørrebro district in recent months.

" Hat tip: TB

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Denmark: Minister: OK to Secret Hearings

Denmark is to allow secret intelligence material to be presented in closed administrative extradition court sessions, in cases of claims of dangerous foreigners.

The Minister for Integration Birthe Rønne Hornbech (Lib) is proposing that secret intelligence material can be presented in special closed court sessions in cases involving the administrative expulsion of foreigners deemed a security risk.

Hitherto, the Security and Intelligence Service has declined to provide secret intelligence to back up expulsion orders in order not to compromise its methods and relations with other services.

Hornbech's proposal will be contingent on all court officers and lawyers having security clearance, and that the accused is not present in court. At the same time, the proposal suggests that detained individuals, or those on restraining orders, can be denied contacts and visits with people who can counteract an expulsion.

Finally, the proposal calls for the use of electronic tags in cases in which those under restraining orders have ignored the rules governing their leave to remain in the country.

Case in question The proposals come in the wake of a controversy surrounding a Tunisian man who was administratively expelled from Denmark because of allegations that he had planned to murder a Danish cartoonist who had produced a published cartoon of the Prophet Mohammed.

The man could not, however, be expelled to Tunisia for fear of torture in his home country and was given extraordinary leave to remain in Denmark under special restraining orders.

The man appealed the administrative expulsion order, but the Security and Intelligence Service declined to produce its evidence in court for fear of compromising its methods and sources.

The ministerial proposals are expected to be put to Parliament before the summer recess and are based on a report in which the authors have studied how similar cases are handled in countries such as Great Britain, Germany, Sweden, Canada and France.

Lawyers Although reluctant to enforce additional security clearance on defence lawyers, the Danish Bar and Law Society says the proposal is a step forward.

"The courts will be involved in more cases" but this is not a practice that would exist in an ideal world, says Bar and Law Society Chairwoman Sys Røvsing, who adds that she would prefer full openness in all cases.

She says that additional security clearance for lawyers is not what the society would like to see. "We normally live up to our obligations or we are struck off, she says adding that clearance should not be necessary.

"But let's live with it for a period and see how it goes, she concludes.

[Comment from Tuan Jim: If I heard statements like that coming from the ACLU here in the US, I think my head would explode.]

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Energy: Segolene Royal Launches Regional Solar Energy Plan

(ANSAMed) " BRUSSELS, FEBRUARY 27 " Segolene Royal, the President of the French region of Poitou-Charantes, has launched a regional plan for solar energy with the European Investment Bank and Credit Agricole. The plans include an investment of 400 million euros, an unprecedented sum in Europe. Work on the project will continue until 2012, allowing for the installation of 650 thousand square metres of solar panels, the consolidation of the territories energy self-sufficiency, the creation of one thousand new jobs across the region, and the realisation of a full solar energy distribution chain in Poitou-Charentes. oeThis is a unique experience in Europe, emphasises a note from the European Investment Bank which guarantees a total of 200 million euros of financing for the public bodies, businesses, associations, professionals and farmers involved. The aim is to realise a production of 73 gigawatt hours of solar energy by 2012, which would be 150% of that which was produced in the entire country in 2007 for just 2.8% of the French population. (ANSAMed).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

Film: Catalonia Forces 50% Films to be Dubbed in Catalan

(ANSAMed) " Madrid, MARCH 4 " The government of the Generalitat of Catalonia wants 50% of all films shown in the region to be dubbed into Catalan, the same number that must be dubbed into Spanish. Currently only 3% of films distributed in Catalonia are dubbed into Catalan. The decision " which is likely to create further problems in the relationship between the [Comunitat] and the mainly American film industry " was announced by councillor in charge of Culture Joan Manuel Tresserras. Reports in todays media show that the councillor explained that the measure was already part of the Law on language normalisation from 1982, which has never been implemented. The initiative, which will be made part of the new film law being worked on by the regional government, means the resumption of one of the hardest battles in defence of the Catalan language, in which the Generalitat has been beaten various times in the past. As Tresserras underlined, oethe market has not worked in Catalonia due to the dominance of the Spanish language oewhich has frozen the situation to the time of Francoism, when the regime forbade the speaking of the Basque and Catalan languages. Councillor Tresserras called this situation oea deficit of democracy and oean anomaly of the cultural system. The new film law should be passed this summer. It may not be enough though to obtain parity between Catalan and Spanish due to the fact that the big distribution companies will probably refuse to obey the law. In the past the former Catalan president Jordi Pujiol applied a system of subsidies for films screened in Catalan but he was unable to convince big distributors like Disney, which refused to increase its quota of one film in Catalan per year. Big players like Warner, Fox, Columbia, United Artist and Disney itself even appealed against the decree. The climax of the battle for the Catalan language was reached on the occasion of the first Harry Potter film, distributed by Warner, which refused to dub it into Catalan. (ANSAMed).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

Finland: Interior Ministry Plans Tighter Screening of Gun Licence Applicants

Finlands Ministry of the Interior said on Wednesday that it is putting forward changes to the countrys gun law that would tighten especially the availability of handguns.

The planned changes would further define the governments policy draft from last autumn. The basic idea is that for every gun there has to be an appropriate use, and any person granted a licence has to be suited to carry a weapon. In order to obtain a gun, the applicant would have to be able to prove that it will be used for a serious and active shooting hobby. oeThe idea is to do away with the practice of shooting in the woods or behind the sauna, says Interior Minister Anne Holmlund (Nat. Coalition Party). The suitability of those filing an application for a gun licence is to be examined more closely. The ministry is recommending an aptitude test.

A test will be developed based on a Defence Forces aptitude test called the oep2 personality test. With the P2 test the military rates the conscripts mental stability and their leadership qualities. Together with the police the National Defence University will develop a new version of the test, into which questions measuring propensity to violence and mental problems will be added. Certain segments weighing leadership skills, in turn, will be left out. The aim of the test is not to produce a complete psychological profile of the applicant, but merely a result founded on a classification system, based on which questionable cases can be directed to a more detailed screening.

The authorities also want to grant the police permission to access military evaluations regarding the applicants fitness for service. Persons liable to military service would have to present their military identity papers or a decision regarding the postponement or the discontinuing of their service. Furthermore, the government recommends that the police be given the right to ask the applicant for permission to see the applicants medical certificate. Refusing access to medical records would lead to rejection of the firearm licence application. Another proposal is to give doctors the right to inform the police of people who may be unsuited to carry a weapon for health reasons. A doctors certificate is already required for nearly every handgun licence. The practice was adopted after last autumns school shooting in Kauhajoki.

The government initiatives are meant to enter a round of comments next week. The government bill is scheduled to be presented to the Parliament in June. The law could come into force from the beginning of 2010. Later on, the gun law articles that deal with, for example, shooting ranges, bow weapons, and spray weapons are also meant to be amended.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Finland: Dispute Over Female Clergy Leads to First Sackings of Church Employees

The long-standing dispute within the Finnish Evangelical Lutheran Church over the ordination of women has led to the first cases in which church employees have been sacked for their opposition to female pastors. Previously church workers have only been suspended for a given term. The Langinkoski parish in the southeast of Finland has now terminated the contracts of two youth workers for their refusal to cooperate with clergywomen. According to the Kotka-based newspaper Kymen Sanomat, the Parish Council decided on the dismissal of the employees on Tuesday evening.

The reason given for the sackings was that in spite of warnings, the youth workers had refused to take part in services in which a woman pastor delivered the sermon, served communion, or was involved in the liturgy. The paper writes that in spite of being told not to, the workers in question had used material that they had drawn up themselves in their work with young people in their early teens. Langinkoski vicar Jukka Lopperi told Kymen Sanomat that the grounds for dismissal were discrimination and that the decision was the product of a conflict that had lasted years.

The Lutheran Church and organisations within the church that are opposed to the ordination of women issued a joint expression of a desire for cooperation last week. According to the statement the oeparties want to work together so that nobody in the church will suffer discrimination on the basis of their gender, conviction, or view of who should be entitled to ordination.

In 2007 a female pastor in Hyvink%%o desisted from taking part in a service when a visiting clergyman from a conservative faction of the Lutheran Church refused to work at the altar with her. The issue went to court, and led to a fine for discrimination. The Finnish Evangelical-Lutheran Church approved the ordination of women in 1986.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Finland: Shooting Clubs: New Age Limits Kill Shooting Hobby

Governments proposal to tighten gun laws has been met with a mixed response by gun clubs. The new, higher minimum age limits for gun ownership will render competitive shooting hobbies for youth obsolete, says the Finnish Shooting Sport Federation, SAL.

SAL says it fears that the Interior Ministrys proposal, if enacted, could mean an end to competitive shooting at the junior level. SAL says it wants government to revise the proposed 20-year-old minimum age limit for handguns.

The suggested changes would make it impossible for under 20-year-olds to compete in European and World Championship games, says Risto Aarrekiivi of SAL.

Aarrekiivi, however, says the proposals stipulation that firearm license applicants have to be shooting club members for two years prior to applying for a permit could bring firearm clubs new members.

Hunting Not Affected

Meanwhile, the Finnish Hunting Association says its in favour of strict and clear-cut gun laws.

Hand guns are rarely used in hunting, and hunting permits are granted under strict supervision, says Lauri Kontro of the Finnish Hunting Association.

Kontro reiterated that the school shooting tragedies in Kauhajoki and Jokela had no connection to sports hunting hobbies.

Hunting is growing in popularity in Finland. Some 300,000 new hunting permits are applied for yearly.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Finland: Indian Film-Maker Convicted of Human Trafficking

The Vantaa District Court handed down a prison sentence to an Indian man who by posing as a movie producer in the summer of 2006 illicitly brought young Indians into Finland under the auspice of acting in movies.

The court found the man guilty of aggravated fraud and human smuggling charges and ordered him to serve an unconditional three-year prison sentence. He was also ordered to pay the Finnish state 539,000 euros in damages. This sum is based on information that those who were smuggled into Finland paid the bogus movie-maker some 15,000 euros each.

This was the largest-ever human smuggling case to come before the courts in Finland.

The defendant was part of an international criminal organisation, which managed to arrange visas for 117 people, who were said to be coming to Finland to film movies and music videos. The group had struck a deal worth hundreds of thousands of euros with a Finnish cinema production company to shoot films here.

Most of those smuggled in have been sent back to India. Three young Indians applied for asylum and have been granted residence permits.

The defendant says he plans to appeal the courts decision.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Greece: Stop to New Bar and Restaurant Licences in Athens

(ANSAmEd) " ATHENS, FEBRUARY 25 " Athens city council decided to suspend the granting of new licences for bars and restaurants in some areas of the city that have been deemed saturated and in which the quality of life for residents has been negatively influenced by the establishments. Moreover, the city council decided to start a control committee to protect areas considered to be worthy and to make sure that the restaurants dont illegally occupy the sidewalks with tables and seats. Offenders will have to pay a fine of 1,100 euro a day for every square metre they occupy illegally. (ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Greece: Hundreds of Public Officials Accused of Corruption

(ANSAmEd) " ATHENS, MARCH 11 " Hundreds of Greek public officials risk being tried and suspended from office for corruption following the conclusions of an investigation conducted by the ombudsman for public administration. The head of the Public Administration Inspectorate, Leandros Raditzis, has announced that he would be requesting trials for 354 tax officials and local public officials for granting building permits, who were not able to explain the origin of money or goods in their possession, in accordance with Greek law. Raditzis has been quoted by the media as saying that he is investigating another 200 state workers that might be suspended from office. In addition, the bank accounts of another 30 officials will be investigated since their wealth does not seem to be justified by their salaries. This is the first time that the investigations by the ombudsman have led to the indictment of so many public officials. The corruption scandals have come during a time of widespread preoccupation in Greece due to the economic crisis. Both have contributed to a collapse in approval ratings for the party of Premier Costas Karamanlis.(ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Netherlands: Bus Drivers Walk Out in Protest at Aggression

Buses are at a standstill due to a walkout by drivers in the town of Ede near Arnhem, in the province of Gelderland. The trade union FNV Bondgenoten says the strike is in protest at aggressive behaviour by some passengers. In the past two weeks, two drivers have been threatened by youths.

FNV Bondgenoten says that in one of the incidents, when a female driver was threatened, police took half an hour to arrive at the scene. The union also claims bus company Veolia has failed to respond to the problem adequately. Veolia said on Monday that youth workers were travelling on its buses to assess the extent of the problem. The Ede drivers say they will only return to work if more action is taken to deal with the aggression.

On Monday, in the city of Tilburg in the southern province of North Brabant, a 17-year-old youth was arrested for an assault on a bus driver in late January. Nevertheless, figures released by bus companies Arriva and Veolia on Tuesday actually show a major decrease in incidents of aggression towards bus drivers in the province over the past year.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Netherlands: White Male Candidate Nominated After All

Interior Minister Guusje ter Horst has nominated Teun Visscher as new chief of police in the region of Zuid-Holland Zuid after all. She initially refused to nominate him because she wanted a woman or a person from an ethnic minority to be appointed to the post.

The minister said she had a clear understanding with the police leadership that more women and candidates from ethnic minorities would be appointed to senior positions, but noted that most of the candidates are still white men.

In the past few days, Minister Ter Horst has met with the chairman of the council of police commanders. During the meeting, the earlier agreement on appointing more women and candidates from ethnic minorities to senior positions was tightened even further.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Netherlands First Choice for Somalians

The number of asylum requests filed by Somalians in 2008 was double the figure for the previous year " going from about 2000 to 4000.

The situation in Somalia is deteriorating. Apart from hunger, drought and a constantly unsafe situation, the increase in violence in 2007 has led since to a sharp increase in the number of refugees. About a million people have left their homes, almost half of them coming from the capital, Mogadishu.

Ismael is a typical Somali newcomer. He fled Mogadishu and came to the Netherlands in September 2006. His journey to Amsterdams Schiphol airport was oearranged for a few thousand dollars. Since then, his wife and four children have joined him in the Netherlands. Theyre staying in an centre for asylum seekers in the middle of the country. Ismael says:

oeI had a good life in Somalia. I ran an import and export business for medicines. I had a better life in Somalia than I have here now, but it was too unsafe. As a businessman, its not easy to survive in that city [Mogadishu].

Good reputation

It was obvious choice for him to come to the Netherlands. Friends and family who had come here around 1992 in the first wave of Somali refugees told him of the possibilities for seeking asylum and reuniting families. On top of that, he already had a fondness for the Netherlands: as a football fan he had been a supporter of the Dutch national team for years.

However, Ismael " who can scarcely speak Dutch " has difficulty finding his way here in the Netherlands. Also, the support he receives from Somalians who have been here for longer leaves something to be desired.

oeThere are different groups of Somalians. The newcomers have contact with each other, but only have a limited amount of information about the Netherlands to share with one another. The Somalians who have been here longer live in the cities and have little contact with the newcomers, unless they are family members.

Mutual help and solidarity is made difficult by the fact that the Somali diaspora is divided along tribal lines. The animosity between tribes and sub-tribes in the Netherlands has its roots in the conflict in Somalia.

Newcomers Although the first Somali refugees were highly educated, the more recent ones are less so. Shukri Said, who himself came to the Netherlands ten years ago and has been working with other Somali refugees for a number of years, characterises the newcomers:

oeI cant give an overview of the whole group, but you can see that most newcomers have had to cope with 20 years of war. In that period there was no government, and no schools. Most refugees have only attended primary school. Therefore they need a lot of guidance and support here. Theyre not as self-supporting as the first group, and they have a lot more worries and problems.

In 2002 nearly half the Somalians in the Netherlands had, at the most, five years of primary education, and only 20 percent had a secondary school diploma. As a result of the low level of education and poor command of the Dutch language, only one in three Somalians has a job. Whats more, Somalians tend to end up coming into contact with the law (i.e. the police) more often than the average resident of the Netherlands.

United Kingdom At the moment, there are about 20,000 Somalians in the Netherlands. In 2001, the number was almost twice that. So, many Somalians have clearly left the country as others have arrived; the largest group has gone to the United Kingdom.

According to estimates, about 10,000 moved to the UK in the period from 1998 to 2003. The UK is attractive because the language barrier, which is a problem even for the better-educated, is not so great there, and so they can get on their feet more quickly in Britain.

And what about Somalian newcomer Ismael " is he thinking of moving on to the UK?

oeI didnt have the chance to get a good education in Somalia. But I want to give my children the chances that I have missed. Therefore I want my children to get a good education in the Netherlands. So I wont be transferring to another country.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Netherlands: Council of Europe Criticises Dutch Human Rights

The Council of Europe has published a critical report on the human rights situation in the Netherlands. The report criticises policy on migrants and asylum seekers.

Thomas Hammarberg, the European Commissioner for Human Rights, writes that in particular the conditions in centres for asylum seekers should be improved. For example, no separate shower facilities are available for men and women, and young asylum seekers are not properly informed of the legal proceedings in their cases.

Hammarberg also raises concerns about childrens rights in the Netherlands, particularly criticising the low age of 12 years at which children are subject to adult criminal law. In most countries the age of criminal responsibility is 14.

The commissioner also said there were serious concerns about oeracist and intolerant tendencies in the Netherlands. He called for careful use of language in the debate on integration.

The human rights commissioner carried out an inspection in the Netherlands in September. All 47 Council of Europe member states are subject to such inspections. The report makes no comparisons with other countries.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Netherlands: Cabinet Ignores Motion to Protest Wilders Ban in EU

THE HAGUE, 12/03/09 " The cabinet has ignored a motion in which the Lower House almost unanimously called upon it to complain in the European Union about the United Kingdoms refusal to admit MP Geert Wilders. At the same time, however, the House is accepting that its motion is disregarded.

A month ago, Party for Freedom (PVV) leader Geert Wilders could not enter the UK because the British government decided that his criticisms of Islam made him a threat to public safety. The Dutch government expressed its objections, though modestly, calling Wilders refusal every regrettable rather than unacceptable. It but did not resort to serious diplomatic steps, such as summoning the British ambassador, either.

The conservatives (VVD) thereupon appealed to the cabinet to condemn the UKs treatment of Wilders within the EU. All parties with the exception of the Christian democrats (CDA) voted in favour of this VVD motion. But in a debate in the Lower House, Prime Minister Jan Peter Balkenende and Foreign Minister Maxime Verhagen said the cabinet would not accept the motion.

In protest, VVD handed in a second motion demanding that the initial motion be carried out after all. This time however, the broad majority support had evaporated. Labour (PvdA) and ChristenUnie voted against it, in a clear demonstration of the inflexibility of their coalition with CDA.

Lower House Speaker Verbeet, who is also an MP on behalf of PvdA, did support the motion. It is highly unusual in the Netherlands for MPs to vote independently instead of as a party as a whole.

PvdA MP Martijn van Dam made attempts to defend his partys backing out by stating that the momentum had been lost. oeA diplomatic signal needs to be made at once. There is no point in doing so three weeks later.

VVD leader Mark Rutte sharply criticised the coalitions attitude. oeThis cabinet is a friend to freedom of religion but is not interested in freedom of speech. Socialist Party (SP) MP Harry van Bommel went even further by stating that the cabinet was conducting oemiddle finger politics towards the House.

Wilders himself handed in a motion demanding the resignation of both Balkenende and Verhagen. oeWe already knew that the Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister are prepared to slaughter our most precious fundamental law " freedom of speech " at the altar of Islam, in order to thus please angry Muslims. But we now also know that this cabinet is flouting democracy, he declared. The PVV motion was not supported by any party though.

PvdA MP Van Dam stated that oethe most important step now is to ensure that a member of parliament is not refused entry abroad again. More will be revealed soon, since Wilders will try to enter the UK again this spring, this time to campaign for the European Parliament elections in June.

According to Balkenende, UK Prime Minister Gordon Brown is considering whether to allow the PVV leader admittance next time. The Dutch Prime Minister is to see his British counterpart during an EU summit in Brussels next week and will then ask him if he has come to a decision yet, said Balkenende.

It is in Balkenendes best interest that Brown is accommodating, since the British refusal led to the PVV becoming the largest Dutch party in a leading poll. His own CDA party especially suffered, with many supporters switching to Wilders during the past weeks.

" Hat tip: TB

[Return to headlines]

Netherlands: Shops in Amsterdam Evacuated After Bomb Threat

The area around Amsterdam Ikea store and shops in the Arena shopping mall remain close as police investigate what they described as oea serious threat involving explosives.

Shops in Amsterdam Arena shopping mall and the Ikea furniture store in southeast Amsterdam remained closed on Thursday following a bomb threat in the morning.

The area around the Ikea furniture store along A9 highway and shops in the Arena shopping mall have been evacuated and cordoned off after the threat was made at 09:00 on Thursday.

Police are currently investigating what they described as a serious threat involving explosives.

According to media reports, the Ikea store received a warning call targeting furniture stores. An Ikea spokesperson said the threat was not targeted specifically at the Swedish furniture chain.

In December 2002, explosives were found in Ikea stores in Amsterdam and the town of Sliedrecht, to the southeast of Rotterdam. This led to all Ikea stores in the country being closed for two days.

" Hat tip: <http://snaphanen.dk/>Steen

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Netherlands: Police Arrest Seven in Amsterdam Terror Threat

The police have arrested seven suspects in connection with a threat to stores in the southeast of Amsterdam. The suspects are all Dutchmen of Moroccan descent. One of them allegedly has ties with a person involved in the 2004 Madrid terror attacks on commuter trains in which 191 people were killed.

The police say they received a phone call from Brussels just before midnight on Wednesday that three men intended to plant explosives in the Amsterdam stores. The caller gave the names and addresses of the men in question and the stores they intended to attack.

The police picked up the seven suspects after consultation with the national security service. The homes of the seven suspects, who are accused of preparing terrorist attacks, have been searched.

The IKEA home furnishings store and several other stores on the Arena Boulevard have been closed all day in connection with the threats. The Heineken Music Hall has also been closed, forcing the cancellation of Thursday nights concert by US band The Killers.

" Hat tip: <http://snaphanen.dk/>Steen

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Row After French Director Compares Illegals to War-Time Jews

PARIS (AFP) " A French film-maker, whose new movie depicts a Kurdish refugee hoping to swim the Channel to Britain, has angered the government by comparing its policies on illegal immigrants to Nazi-occupied France's repression of Jews.

To suggest that the French police are like the police of Vichy (the wartime French collaborationist regime), and that Afghans are hunted down, are the target of roundups " is intolerable, said Immigration Minister Eric Besson. Film-maker Philippe Lioret more than overstepped the mark when he says that the illegals in Calais are the equivalent of Jews in 1943. That sort of thing is completely intolerable, he told RTL radio last weekend.

Lioret made the comparison in an interview he gave about the new film titled "Welcome to La Voix du Nord, a newspaper based in a northern French region in which lies the port of Calais.

Calais became a destination for migrants from across the world in the late 1990s with the opening of the Sangatte refugee camp, right next to the entrance to the Channel Tunnel linking France and Britain.

The camp was finally closed in 2002 but migrants still come to Calais in their attempts to get to Britain. Every night, some try to hide in trucks and trains using the tunnel or in cross-Channel ferries.

oeIf tomorrow you help a bloke who has no papers, youre guilty under the offence of [x2dc]helping a person whose papers are not in order, Lioret told the paper.

oeWhat country are we living in? I have the impression that were in 1943 and that weve hidden a Jew in the cellar, he said.

French officials helped round up around 75,000 Jews who were deported during the Nazi occupation of France between 1940 and 1944. Most of these Jews died in extermination camps. Only 2,500 returned to France after the war.

In Liorets film, which opens in French cinemas on Wednesday, he denounces a law here that punishes anyone who has helped an illegal immigrant with up to five years in jail.

oeWelcome tells the story of Simon, a just-divorced swimming instructor and former swimming champion, who becomes involved in the lives of illegal immigrants.

He meets a Kurd from northern Iraq called Bilal, played by Firat Ayverdi, whose previous attempt to cross the Channel in the back of a lorry has failed.

Bilal now wants to try to swim to Britain, which like many of his counterparts in Calais he perceives as being a better bet for a bright future than France.

Simon tries to dissuade him. But he is touched by Bilals determination and agrees to give him swimming lessons.

The Frenchmans eyes are slowly opened to the grim realities of life for illegals in his country, and to the racism to which they are subjected.

The film also probes the ambiguous attitude of the French authorities, who allow charity groups to help illegals, but who also enforce legislation that punishes citizens who accommodate undocumented migrants.

Vincent Lindon, the actor who plays Simon, has also condemned a situation in which oeillegals are sometimes treated worse than dogs.

He told Le Parisien newspaper that when he went to Calais, he found oea town in a state of siege, dotted with giant barbed wire fences.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Sweden: Criminal Gangs Show No Signs of Leaving Sweden

More than a year after a bomb ripped through the home of a prosecutor, Sweden carries on its struggle to curb the spread of criminal gangs, AFPs Nina Larson reports.

Prosecutor Barbro Jnsson was driving to work when a bomb exploded at the front door of her house, rocking her whole neighbourhood and sending shockwaves through traditionally serene Sweden.

It is very hard to describe how I felt when I heard what happened. I think I still haven't grasped how serious it was, Jansson, 53, told AFP more than a year after the attack.

She was prosecuting a high-profile case against a violent criminal gang called the Wolfpack Brotherhood and had just left her home in the southwestern town of Trollhättan on November 20, 2007, when the blast ripped off the front door and shattered the hallway.

Two young gang members were remanded in custody just over a month ago on suspicion they planted the bomb, which could have killed Jansson had she been at home.

The bombing "one of the first overt attacks on a Swedish prosecutor" prompted calls to root out the swelling criminal gangs that have smashed the country's tranquil image.

The gangs have caused a spike in a number of crimes, including extortion and loan-sharking "a gang specialty" which have jumped from 740 cases reported in 2003 to 1,715 last year, according to preliminary statistics from the Swedish National Council for Crime Prevention.

Police say it is difficult to estimate the number and size of criminal gangs in Sweden since membership can vary from day to day, but media reports indicate around 1,000 people are actively involved in at least six large criminal gangs with numerous branches across the country.

Gangs make headlines almost daily with stories of drug busts, brutal attacks on business owners unable to pay off debts, and bloody gang wars.

This is a serious problem that has grown in recent years, Swedish Justice Minister Beatrice Ask told AFP.

We used to be fairly sheltered in the Nordic countries, but unfortunately this problem has surfaced and we must react very forcefully now or else this could be extremely serious in say 10 years, she cautioned.

Police also think that attacks like the one on Jansson constitute a novel and dangerous twist in Swedish gang activity.

Attacks on the judiciary are a rather new and very serious phenomenon, said Klas Friberg, the police chief in the Västra Götaland region that comprises Trollhättan and Gothenburg.

Jansson, who moved after the attack on her home and joined a police unit in Gothenburg working to fight gang crime, agreed.

We risk having judges who don't dare to judge, prosecutors who are afraid to prosecute and police who refrain from making arrests, she said, adding that if that happens, the first bastion against these groups will fall.

Just four months after the Trollhättan bombing, shots were fired at the home of another prosecutor in the region, Mats Mattsson, who had worked extensively on cases involving criminal motorcycle gangs like Bandidos.

While no one was hurt in that attack either, it prompted more calls for action and sent the government and police scurrying to come up with new measures to combat the scourge.

Special police and intelligence units were created along with a Knowledge Centre on gang activity as part of a national strategy aimed at cracking down on gangs and blocking recruitment of new members.

Local police have to be on their case all the time, making it uncomfortable for anyone who has not yet been fully recruited to hang around these people, said Justice Ask.

Despite heightened police efforts, around 10 new clubhouses belonging to gangs like Hells Angels, Bandidos, Wolfpack Brotherhood, and Original Gangsters reportedly sprouted up across Sweden last year alone.

The highest concentration of gang units is centred around the southern towns of Malm[^] and Gothenburg, largely due to their proximity to Denmark, where the gangs also constitute a major problem.

A few years ago, Denmark carried out very forceful measures against these gangs and a number of these people moved over to Sweden. Now, we hope they will move back, or rather further, Ask said.

Erik Lannerb%ock, a former member of several gangs including the Wolfpack Brotherhood and Bandidos, meanwhile told AFP that simply cracking down on the gangs would accomplish little.

The main focus should be on getting members to leave the gangs, and to do that you cant just lock people up and hope theyll be better when they get out, said Lannerb%ock, who after a decade in criminal gangs began working as a counselor for troubled youths in Stockholm in 2004.

Gang members trying to get out often need protection and help paying off debts and finding a job, but most of all oethey need support from people who understand them and can help them see the value in being normal, and to create a new identity, he insisted.

Lannerb%ock said he himself repeatedly tried to leave his life of crime only to be drawn back in by the promise of wads of cash or the desire to once again be feared and respected instead of stepped upon in a menial job.

It was like a drug, he said, adding that landing a good job where he was appreciated was what made it possible to get out for good.

It is very important that people can leave, Ask agreed, adding that a project to help people get out of the gangs would likely be funded soon.

Huge efforts are needed and we need a lot of people to push in the same direction, but I think we can bring this problem under control, she said.

If I didnt think (so), I wouldnt be working in this field.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

UK: Muslim Protester Who Works as Baggage Handler at Luton Airport Has Security Pass Suspended After Hurling Abuse at Troops

Muslim extremist who works as a baggage handler at Luton Airport had his security pass suspended today after it was revealed he took part in a protest hurling abuse at British troops.

Jalal Ahmed was among the 20-strong group of extremists protesting when the Royal Anglian Regiment returned home from Iraq earlier this week. During their homecoming parade, he was spotted clutching a banner proclaiming: [x2dc]Anglian soldiers: Butchers of Basra. After he was revealed to be part of the hate-filled demonstration, his pass allowing him to go airside and work at the airport was revoked.

Ahmed, who is in his twenties and lives in Luton, works on a casual basis for Menzies Aviation, which provides baggage handling at the airport for easyJet and other airlines. He is believed to have worked there during peak periods over the past two years and would have had access to secure areas of the site.

The Muslim, who is in his early 20s, is said to have once joked he was the nephew of Osama bin Laden and was also allegedly questioned over pictures of passenger jets. He told officers he was interested in planes and no further action was taken.

John Menzies plc said he had passed all criminal and security checks but that his job would now be reviewed in light of his involvement in the protest on Tuesday. [x2dc]All employees are subject to a five year criminal record check and airport authority checks before they can be given an airside pass to work on the airport, [x2dc] a spokesman said. [x2dc]Jalal Ahmed passed these checks. We are now working with the airport authority to review the current position. The company insisted Ahmed would have been supervised at all times as he worked at the airport, where he is not a full-time employee. Luton Borough Council, which owns the airport, said: [x2dc]The Council has been assured that all employees at the Airport receive criminal record and security checks. We are unable to comment on individuals. [x2dc]The issue of security is taken very seriously by the Council and the Airport Company.

Budget airline easyJet, which is the main operator at Luton, made it clear Ahmed was not employed directly by them. A spokesman said: [x2dc]We are obviously working with his employers. We are working with Special Branch and we are aware his airside pass has been temporarily suspended.

The Royal Anglian soldiers return home from Iraq on Tuesday was ruined by the Muslim protest, which ended in clashes with people who had turned out to support the troops. Islamic extremists waved offensive placards branding the soldiers [x2dc]killers as they marched through the streets of Luton, provoking shock and condemnation.

Firebrand preacher Anjem Choudary added insult to injury yesterday by taunting the grieving families of three Royal Anglian regiment members killed by [x2dc]friendly fire. He said troops in Iraq and Afghanistan were [x2dc]not heroes but closer to cowards who cannot fight, as their uncanny knack for death by friendly fire illustrates. The three soldiers to whom he was referring " Privates Robert Foster, 19, John Thrumble, 21, and Aaron McClure, 19 " were killed in Afghanistan in August 2007 when an American F-15 jet dropped a 500lb bomb on their position.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

UK: Stop Pandering to Enemies of Our Way of Life

Radical Muslims get special treatment, says Ruth Dudley Edwards

The Governments neurotic placating of Islamists has not yet led to the censorship of tabloids for giving vent to occasional outrage. oeHate for Heroes: Muslims in vile demo, declared yesterdays Sun, rightly furious that in Luton 15 or so youths had screamed oeterrorists at a homecoming parade of the Royal Anglias 2nd Battalion and waved banners calling the soldiers baby-killers and butchers. Other newspapers showed a group of watching women enveloped in abayas and niqabs.

In some ways the silent women were the more potent image of what disturbs readers of broadsheets as well as tabloids, their dress providing an in-your-face statement that they consider themselves proudly separate from the rest of us.

That the police arrested only counter-demonstrators will increase the average Joes belief that radical Muslims have reason to think of themselves as not only separate but privileged. oeI am worried at how Bedfordshire police allowed this type of protest with offensive banners to take place, said Margaret Moran, the Labour MP for Luton South. oeIt seems to me that this amounted to huge provocation and was potentially racially divisive.

Shes right, of course, but she must know that in agreeing in advance to what was bound to be an offensive protest, the police were only following what they believe to be government policy: dont upset radical Muslims in case they blow us up. Luton has around 20,000 Muslims and is a black spot for jihadism. The police conciliate the vociferous in the hope they wont get so cross that they bomb the airport.

Fear is the only reason that Muslim groups receive special treatment. Why else would the representatives of around two million people have money and time lavished on them in such an obscenely disproportionate way, while no one much bothers about the peaceable Hindus? And why else would the Government throw £90 million at PVE (Preventing Violent Extremism) " an unaccountable, contradictory, bureaucratically convoluted counter-terrorism initiative that has the authorities snuggle up to homophobic, misogynistic West-haters, just so long as they dont actually use violence?

The whole mess was highlighted this week in the Policy Exchange report Choosing Our Friends Wisely, which catalogues how the Government has empowered reactionaries, marginalised moderates and driven councils and police into bed with enemies of our way of life. Due diligence has been even more lacking here than for Lloyds TSB and HBOS.

oeA new generation is being radicalised, sometimes with the very funds that are supposed to be countering radicalisation, say the reports authors, Shiraz Maher, himself a former radical, and Martyn Frampton. For example, Tower Hamlets council awarded a substantial grant to the Cordoba Foundation, an Islamist pressure group, which in turn offered a platform to the radical Islamic group Hizb ut-Tahrir, which promotes the message that democracy is forbidden in Islam.

As Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government, Ruth Kelly came to realise that government policy towards Muslims was counter-productive. What is necessary, she says in the foreword to this report, is to stop pandering, to give incentives for good behaviour and disincentives for bad, and to defend the Western values shared by many British Muslims. She has a special commendation for Hazel Blears, who almost alone in the Cabinet is standing up to Jack Straw in the interests of national unity, common sense and morality. Moderate Muslims, embarrassed daily by their so-called community leaders, deserve a total change of direction in government policy.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Serbia: Minister, 7.9% of Population Under Line of Poverty

(ANSAMed) " BELGRADE, MARCH 6 " The rebalance of the budget will provide RDS 2 billion (around 21 million euro) to RSD 5 billion dinars (around 52 million euro) for combating poverty in Serbia, Deputy Prime Minister Bozidar Djelic said, reports VIP Daily News Report. oeThe government will secure the additional few billion dinars for combating poverty, but there is not a lot of manouevring space since difficult negotiations with the International Monetary Fund (IMF) which demand saving are to follow, and a redistribution of funds in the public sector will have to be undertaken, Djelic said during the opening of the forth National convention on reducing poverty in Belgrade. Djelic said that in 2008 He said that the number of poor was 50% lesser in Belgrade then in other parts of the country. In Serbia, 7,9% of population lived under the line of poverty, which is RSD 7,937 (around 83 euro) per person. (ANSAMed).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

Serbia: One in Four Citizens Works in Grey Zone

(ANSAMed) " BELGRADE, MARCH 10 " Serbia PMs economic advisor Jurij Bajec said that about 600,000 people out of 2 million employees worked in the grey zone, not paying taxes to the state, reports daily Politika. On the other hand, according to data from the National Employment Office, there are 200,000-300,000 such workers. Bajec stressed that the numbers differ mainly due to the methodology of collecting data, adding that the 600,000 cipher was reached by way of surveys. Economist Danilo Sukovic stated that the state needs to take into consideration that such employment is to a certain extent a social valve, because people have to find ways to survive in a situation when jobs are lost on a daily basis. oeUntil the state finds a way to stimulate small businesses, this problem will be part of our daily lives, underlined Sukovic.(ANSAMed).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

Serbia-Spain: Accord on Avoiding Double Taxation Signed

(ANSAMed) " BELGRADE, MARCH 10 " Serbia and Spain have signed in Madrid an agreement to avoid double taxation, which should boost Spanish investment in Serbia. So reported BETA news agency quoting Trade and Services Minister Slobodan Milosavljevic. "This agreement will provide a stimulus for Spanish investors to come to Serbia, it will make it easier for Spanish companies to operate in the Serbian market, as well as for Serbian companies in Spain. According to the minister, the accord will also benefit all Serbian and Spanish citizens, including athletes and cultural workers who cooperate at a national level for the two countries. Milosavljevic announced that a meeting will be held today with business people at which specific investments and improving economic cooperation and trade between the two countries will be discussed. "Foreign trade between the two countries was around USD 300 million last year, said Milosavljevic, adding that there is a large deficit on the Serbian side. (ANSAMed).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Energy: EU Commission, Integrated Med Market Needed

(ANSAMed) " BRUSSELS, MARCH 11 " "The development of an integrated and interconnected energy market in the Mediterranean area is a priority for the European Commission, said Commissioner Benita Ferrero Waldner today at the fourth Euro-Mediterranean Energy Forum in Barcelona. According to Waldner [x2dc]the regional harmonisation of regulations will increase energy security, by promoting industrial and technological cooperation. "The development of a stable framework of regulations for energy production in the Euro-Mediterranean area, is needed to achieve this, she added. With regard to the climate emergency and the need to diversify energy sources the EU Commission says that "it is important to explore the potential for green energy in the Mediterranean, from wind to solar power, to the capture and storage of carbon. Ferrero Waldner highlighted in particular the solar power plan promoted by the Mediterranean Union. Another area of interest for the two shores is the "development of common interest energy infrastructures said the Commissioner, who is also relying on the increase "in energy relationships between the European Union, the Mediterranean and the Gulf states. (ANSAMed).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Mediterranean: First Western Area Country Talks in Genoa

(ANSAMed) " GENOA, MARCH 11 " On Friday and Saturday European and African citizens from countries on the Western shore of the Mediterranean Sea will meet and exchange ideas in Genoa. The initiative, organised by the EU and the Liguria Region, in support of the creation of the Mediterranean Union (UpM), will bring together around 150 people including some Arab representatives like Ouidad Cadi Ayyad, of the University of Marrakech, and Mehla Mint Ahmed, former minister from Mauritania. The objective of the event, explained the director of the European Commissions representation in Italy, Pier Virgilio Dastoli, the president of the Regional Council of Liguria Mino Ronzitti, and the vice president of the town council Massimiliano Costa, is to promote dialogue between regions and societies to improve decentralised cooperation and participatory democracy. Political tensions in some of the Arab countries with which the organisation had hoped to start a dialogue, like Libya and Mauritania, have made participation of members of local institutions difficult. Members of the Italian government and the president of Catalonia, Ernest Benach, are expected to be there however. (ANSAMed).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Al Azhar Says Yes to Organs Explant From Sentenced to Death

(ANSAmEd) " CAIRO, MARCH 11 " The Grand Imam of Al-Azhar and head of the Islamic Research Academy Sheikh, Mohamed Sayyed Tantawi, has said that Islam allows the explant of organs from pepole sentenced to death in premeditated murder and rape cases without their approval. In press statements on the sidelines of an academy conference, the Grand Imam said those sentenced to death, according to the Islamic Sharia, have no legal say as to the fate of their bodies after being executed for crimes they had committed. He said the transplant process, according to the Sharia, must be unprofitable. Yesterday, the grand Imam said all members of the academy from Egypt and other Islamic countries unanimously agreed that the sale of any part of the body is prohibited by Islam. He said it is possible, according to the Islamic Sharia, to transplant the organs as long as the operation serves public interest and saves the patients life on condition it is not done for profit.(ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Algeria: Newspaper Seized for Article on Bouteflika

(ANSAmEd)- ALGIERS, MARCH 11 " Algerian authorities have banned the distribution of the latest issue of monthly Afrique Magazine (AM), which dedicated ample space to a story on President Abdelaziz Bouteflikas ties to the military. The most recent issue of the magazine oehas been seized due to oean attack on national values in compliance with oeArticle 7/90 of the Information Code, explained an official of the Secretary of State in charge of communication cited by the local press. The controversial article entitled oeAlgeria, Dawn of the Generals, talks about the relationship between the head of state and the top-ranked generals of the Algerian army, as well as the role played by the military in Bouteflikas ascent to power in 1999 and 2004. After a change to the Constitution, which cancelled the two-term limit for the presidency, Bouteflika is running for president for a third time in elections to be held on April 9. (ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Darfur: Algeria Rejects Arrest Warrant for Bashir

(ANSAmEd) " ALGIERS, MARCH 11 " Algerian Minister for Foreign Affairs Mourad Medelci has been quoted by APS as saying that oeAlgeria categorically rejects the arrest warrant issued by the International Criminal Court (ICC) for Sudanese president Omar al-Bashir. The decision is oea true threat to peace, security and stability, added Medelci in stressing that Algiers oecategorically rejects politics making use of double standards to deal with the crisis, and that oeAlgeria supports Arab and Muslim states and foreign ones which reject the arrest warrant issued by the ICC against the Sudanese president. oelt is necessary to find an urgent and permanent solution to the crisis (in Darfur, ed.), he said, but the ICC decision oeis unfair and will not lead to peace in the region. (ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Economy: Tunisian Minister Says Trade Balance is Improving

(ANSAmEd) " TUNIS, MARCH 6 " Tunisias balance of trade is showing positive results for the first two months of the year, according to the Minster for Trade and Crafts, Ridha Touiti. The minister was speaking at a periodic meeting with the press, where he emphasised how, above all, inflation dropped in February from 5.7% to 3.3% compared to the same month in 2007, thanks partly to controls on prices " which can now be said to be stable. Both imports and exports have recorded contractions, however. Mr Touiti underscored the improvement in the balance of trade in January and February 2009 compared to the same period of 2008, which has caused the deficit to decline from 793.9 to 650.4 million dinars (roughly 410 to 336 million euro) " a drop of 18%. Such a fall, he noted, is due to the improvement in trade balance in both the food and energy sectors. Looking at imports, the only increase was seen in machinery, which in the ministers opinion, emphasises the importance of foreign investment in Tunisia. (ANSAMED).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

ENI: it Will Take Months to Purchase Stake, Libyan Ambassador

(ANSAMED) " ROME, MARCH 12 " It will take months, or even longer than a year for Libyas stake in ENI to reach the 10% mark, according to the schedule the African state announced in December. In an interview given to the Financial Times, the Libyan ambassador in Rome, Hafed Gaddur, explains that oethe right moment for the acquisition will be chosen in view of price. Following which, purchase options will be exercised gradually. (ANSAMED).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

Israel: Shalit, Family Fears Forthcoming Netanyahu Govt

(ANSAMED) " TEL AVIV, MARCH 11 " The parents of Ghilad Shalit, the young Israeli soldier who has been held prisoner in the Gaza Strip by radical Islamic movement Hamas for almost a thousand days, said today that they fear that the expected coming of a right-wing government in Israel could make an agreement for the release of their son less likely. So said Shalits mother Aviva. She has been camping out with her husband Noam in front of outgoing centrist Premier Ehud Olmerts residence in Jerusalem, to ask for a rapid exchange of prisoners with Hamas to guarantee the release of Ghilad. oeWe dont trust a right-wing government which probably will take their time to examine the issue, letting days and months go by, which is an eternity for Ghilad said the woman. She added that she hopes the issue will be resolved before the formation of the new government which Likud leader (nationalist right-wing) Benyamin Netanyahu, expects to complete within a week, or soon after. This morning outgoing Infrastructure Minister Benyamin Ben Eliezer (Labour) visited the Shalits in their tent. He sympathises with the couple and has invited Olmert to soon propose an exchange of prisoners with Hamas (which is asking for the release of hundreds of Palestinian prisoners in exchange for Shalit) in cabinet, in order to oebring the boy home before the end of the outgoing governments tenure. After several days of deadlock people are trying to revive this hope in a new round of talks in Cairo with Egypt as mediator. Noam Shalit has advised Hams to oeclse a deal soon and to oeunderstand that no better conditions can be obtained from the next Israeli government. oeThe window of opportunity, he fears, oeis closing rapidly. (ANSAMED).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

Oil: OPEC Considering More Production Cuts, Khelil Says

(ANSAMED) " ALGIERS, MARCH 11 " The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) oewill discuss the opportunity to reduce production during its meeting on Sunday in Vienna, said Algerian Energy Minister Chakib Khelil during a forum organised by daily El Moudjahid. oeThe consensus that will be reached, said Khelil, oewill guarantee market stability and will be able to bring crude oil prices to 74 dollars per barrel. During 2008 OPEC decided to cut production by 4.2 million barrels per day. (ANSAMED).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Tunisia: Leather-Footwear Export Triples in 10 Years

(ANSAmEd) " MILAN, MARCH 6 " Tunisian exports in the footwear and leather sector have more than tripled in the last ten years, passing from a value of 162 million euros in 1997 to 494 million in 2008. Of these exports, footwear and uppers represent 85% of the total. The EU is the primary market, in particular Italy, France and Germany. In presenting this growing market, Promos, the company that works for the internationalisation of the Milan Chamber of Commerce, organised this morning a business meeting at the sectors expo currently taking place at Fieramilano, Milans convention centre, in collaboration with AICE (Italian Association for Foreign Trade) and CEPEX (Tunisian Centre for the Promotion of Foreign Trade). The objective is to illustrate the opportunities in the North African country, where over 60 Italian companies operate in the sector are present, and to allow for the meeting of a Tunisian delegation with Italian and international entrepreneurs. The footwear and leather products sector in Tunisia is composed of 302 companies, of which over half are export-only. The sector employs a total of 30,000 workers. (ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

[#x2dc]Deep Concern Obama Ready to Talk to Hamas

Terrorist group calls for murder of Jews, destruction of Israel

There is deep concern among Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas Fatah organization that the U.S. government has changed its attitude toward Hamas and may be ready to end the terrorist groups isolation, a senior PA negotiator told WND.

oeThree years of the siege against Hamas is ending, said the PA negotiator, speaking from Ramallah on condition his name be withheld. oeThere is a new policy in the Obama administration regarding Hamas. We are concerned Hamas is starting to be a legitimate player in the equation of the Mideast and the PA.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

EU Concerned on Demolition in East Jerusalem

(ANSAmEd) " BRUSSELS, MARCH 11 " The EU is oedeeply concerned about the threat of demolition to approximately 90 houses in the Al-Bustan-Silwan area adjacent to the Old City in East Jerusalem. As stated in a EU press release, oeif implemented, the demolition would deprive more than 1000 Palestinians of their homes and would be the largest destruction of Palestinian houses in East Jerusalem since 1967. oeThe EU reminds Israel of its obligations under the Roadmap and international law. Demolition of houses in this sensitive area threatens the viability of a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement, in conformity with international law. The EU urges the Israeli authorities oeto prevent the demolition of Palestinian houses in East Jerusalem.(ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Israel: Street Named in Honour of Egyptian Singer

(ANSAm) " JERUSALEM, MARCH 11 " An Israeli village has decided to honour one of the greatest Egyptian singers ever, Umm Khaltoum, by naming a street after one of her most famous songs, [Anta Omri (You Are My Life)]. The unanimous decision to pay homage to the singer " despite her hostility to Israel, she has a large number of fans in the country " was made by the inhabitants a small village near Jerusalem, Neve Ilan, on the proposal of an Arab from the nearby village Abu Gush. The Arab, Jawdat Ibrahim, is building his house in Neve Ilan. I proposed this song, said Jawdat to the local press, to bring together the hearts of Arabs and Jews, and I explained to the committee members that it is a song loved by all. After initial surprise my proposal was approved by unanimous decision. Umm Khaltoum, considered the Star of the East by her fans, was most likely the best known and loved singer in the Arab world in the twentieth century. On her death in Cairo in 1975, millions of Egyptians attended her funeral in tears, wanting to carry her coffin on their shoulders to the cemetery while the entire Arab world grieved. (ANSAm).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[Return to headlines]

Iraq: Saddam Aide Gets 15-Year Jail Term for Murders

Baghdad, 11 March (AKI) " An Iraqi court has sentenced the countrys former foreign minister, Tariq Aziz, to 15 years in prison for his role in the execution of 42 merchants in 1992. Another senior official from late president Saddam Husseins regime, Ali Hassan al-Majid, commonly known as Chemical Ali, also received a 15-year jail term for signing the flour traders death warrants.

Azizs lawyer, Badye Arif, told Adnkronos International (AKI) his clients conviction was a political move with no basis in law.

The Iraqi government wants to put pressure on Aziz and force former Baathists to come to terms with it in order to bring about national reconciliation, Arif told AKI.

He should be released immediately, as he is an elderly man suffering from various health problems.

Aziz, 72, has been in US custody in Iraq since US-led forces ousted former dictator Saddam Hussein in 2003. He is said to suffer from a heart condition and was treated last year at a US military hospital in Balad, north of Baghdad.

It was Azizs first conviction in the controversial Iraqi High Tribunal process, which has drawn criticism from human rights groups.

Aziz (photo) could have been sentenced to death over the executions of the flour traders who were accused in summary trials in 1992 of profiteering during international economic sanctions imposed after Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990.

The court issued death sentences to two top Saddam aides over the case, in which there are eight defendants. Two of Saddams half-brothers " former presidential adviser Watban Ibrahim and former intelligence chief Sabawi Ibrahim " were sentenced to death by hanging.

Details of all of the defendants sentences were not announced immediately.

Al-Majid had already received death sentences for his role in the notorious al-Anfal gas campaign against the Kurds in northern Iraq in the 1980s, the crushing of a Shia uprising in 1991 and the 1999 killings of Shia protesters.

Aziz was acquitted last week in a separate trial of the killings of Shia Muslim protesters in 1999.

A Chaldean Christian, Aziz also served as deputy prime minister, was considered by many as the international face of Saddams regime. He was the Eight of Spades in the United States playing card pack depicting the toppled regimes most wanted officials.

He surrendered into US custody on 24 April 2003, days after the invasion of Iraq.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Iraq: Suspected Iranian Bombing Kills Child

Baghdad, 11 March (AKI) " Suspected Iranian artillery killed a two-year-old child and injured his parents in the northern Iraqi village of Zarawa close to the Iranian border, Iraqi radio reported on Wednesday.

Iranian forces fired artillery rounds for two hours into the village late on Tuesday, a police official told the Voices of Iraq news agency.

The child's mother is in a stable condition, but the father's health is critical, the police official added.

Northern Kurdish villages in Iraq are regularly exposed to Turkish air bombings and Iranian artillery targeting the separatist Kurdistan Workers Party and the Party For a Free Life in Kurdistan, which oppose the Turkish and Iranian governments.

Zarawa is more than 500 kilometres north of Baghdad.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Iraq: Shoe Thrower Sentenced to 3 Years

Baghdad, 12 March (AKI) " An Iraqi court on Thursday sentenced Iraqi journalist Montazer al-Zaidi to three years in jail for throwing his shoes at former US president George W. Bush at his farewell press conference in Baghdad last December. Al-Zaidi pleaded not guilty to the charge of assaulting a foreign leader on an official visit.

oeMy reaction was natural, just like any Iraqi, he told the judge. His lawyers had asked for his release.

Bush managed to miss both shoes, but al-Zaidi's gesture made international headlines and turned him into a hero in the Arab world.

As he hurled the shoes, al-Zaidi called Bush a oedog and said they were a oefarewell kiss from those who had been killed, orphaned and widowed in Iraq.

His lawyers said al-Zaidi was just reflecting the sentiment of a war-torn country still inflamed by the US-led invasion and its aftermath.

Al-Zaidi, who was arrested and has been held in custody ever since, could have been jailed for 15 years.

His actions were condemned by the Iraqi government as oeshameful although Bush shrugged off the incident.

Al-Zaidi has claimed he has been mistreated in jail.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Saudi Arabia: Prison, Whipping for 75-Year-Old Widow: Her Nephew Brought Her Bread

The poor woman is suspected of seducing two young men. She even risks being kicked out of the country. There are criticisms of abuse of power on the part of the religious police, who watch over the morality and behavior of citizens, gravely interfering in individuals private lives.

Jeddah (AsiaNews/Agencies) " There is great distress in the country over the sentence against a 75-year-old widow who has been condemned to 40 lashes and 4 months in prison for being with two young men, one of whom was her nephew, who were bringing her bread at her request. The religious police (muttawa) who watch over morality and behavior have been criticized for blindly applying sharia, partly for the sake of their own power.

Kamisa Sawadi is a Syrian woman formerly married to a Saudi. Last week, she was found guilty of meeting with two young men who were not her immediate relatives. One of them, Fahd Al-Anzi, is a nephew of her deceased husband; the other is his coworker, Hadiyan bin Zein. The two men, at the old womans request, had brought her five loaves of bread, but when they left her home they encountered the religious police, who arrested them and sentenced them as well to whipping. According to sharia, the woman is guilty. But her lawyers want to appeal above all by emphasizing that the woman breastfed the nephew when he was a baby, giving her a quasi-maternal relationship with him. In this case, the accusation should be withdrawn.

A few of the newspapers in the Middle East are criticizing the sentence and accusing the muttawa of interfering too much in peoples private lives. Some of them suspect that behind the sentence is a vendetta on the part of Fahd Al-Anzis father, the widows brother-in-law, who notified the religious police and urged them to intervene against oethe scandal, accusing the widow of oecorruption.

The poor Kamisa Sawadi has been accused twice before of meeting with men, always in connection with bread deliveries. If the sentence is upheld under appeal, she could even be expelled from Saudi Arabia and be forced to return to Syria, her country of origin.

The lawyer Ibrahim Zamzami notes that a 75-year-old woman cannot be considered a oeseductress, but sharia does not distinguish between old and young women.

Laila Ahmed al-Ahdab, who writes for the newspaper Al-Watan, is criticizing the muttawa because it bases all of its accusations on suspicions that are not confirmed by any evidence. She accuses the oeCommission for the Promotion of Virtue and Prevention of Vice of oemisusing religion to serve their own interests.

Last month, King Abdallah fired the chief of the religious police and an imam who had called for the killing of owners of television stations that broadcast immoral content. Many saw the action as an attempt by the king to weaken the police and its fundamentalist inspiration from Sunnism.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[Return to headlines]

Turkey, Egypt Under Fire for Textile Duties

(ANSAmEd) " CAIRO, MARCH 10 " New Delhi has approached Turkey and Egypt asking them to remove the additional duties they have imposed on Indian cotton textile imports or pay suitable compensation. According to an Egyptian senior government official, the moves by Ankara and Cairo are actionable at the World Trade Organization (WTO), and if the discussions do not lead to a mutually-satisfactory solution, India can drag them to WTO. With the global downturn reducing the demand for most goods, countries are resorting to various protectionist measures to check imports. Egypt has hiked the import duty on cotton textile from India to 30% against the 15% bound rate at WTO. Egypt ranks fifth with exports worth $100 million. According to the government official, action can be taken against the two countries if the discussions prove that the higher duties were imposed just to reduce competition from the domestic industry without suitable provocation. However, if the two countries can prove that it was a measure against a surge in imports taken to protect the domestic industry from injury, it will be valid at WTO as it allows such safeguard measures.(ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Turkeys Arab-Bound Trade Shows Sharp Rise

(ANSAmEd) " ANKARA, MARCH 9 " Turkeys exports to Egypt, Iraq and Syria have increased significantly recently, as the country focuses on nearby economies less affected by the crisis, in an attempt not to lose income from exports, as Hurriyet daily reports. Exports to Egypt rose 165% on last year, while they rose by 75% to Iraq and by 27% to Syria, according to January and February data from the Turkish Statistical Institute, or TUIK. This trend has been visible since October-November, with the emergence of the effects of the crisis, Undersecretariat of Foreign Trade authorities said, also suggesting some political developments. The outburst of Prime Minister Tayyip Erdogan in Davos over Israels attacks on Gaza, as well as the decline of terrorist acts and the ameliorations at Habur Border Gate are among the factors that have increased exports to these countries. Turkeys exports to Egypt rose in value from $179 million to $474 million within the first two months of the year. Turkeys export to Iraq, which was $4 billion according to official figures and $7 billion according to unofficial figures, is expected to surpass $10 billion this year. The export to the country within the first two months of the year rose by 75.5% from $473 million to $830 million. (ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Turkey Opens Education Center in Lebanon

(ANSAmEd) " BEIRUT, MARCH 9 " A womens education center constructed by the Turkish Corps of Engineers carrying out activities under the command of United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon was inaugurated Saturday, as Turkish Hurriet daily website reports from the Lebanese capital. Turkish Corps of Engineers deployed in Lebanon transformed a ruined two-story school building into an education center in the Lebanese city of Tire. Turkey had completed the construction of 37 schools in Lebanon. (ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Estonia: Kremlin Loyalist Says Launched Estonia Cyber-Attack

MOSCOW (Reuters) " An activist with a pro-Kremlin youth group said Thursday he and his friends were behind an electronic attack on Estonia two years ago that paralyzed the NATO states Internet network.

Ex-Soviet Estonia blamed the Russian government for the attack at the time, though Moscow denied involvement. The incident prompted the NATO military alliance to review its readiness to defend against oecyber-warfare.

Konstantin Goloskokov, an activist with Russias Nashi youth group and aide to a pro-Kremlin member of parliament, said he had organized a network of sympathizers who bombarded Estonian Internet sites with electronic requests, causing them to crash.

He said the action was a protest against the dismantling in 2007 of a Soviet-era monument to the Red Army from a square in the center of Estonias capital Tallinn. The removal prompted two nights of rioting by mainly Russian-speaking protesters.

oeI was not involved in any cyber-attack. What I did and what my friends did was no kind of attack, it was an act of civil disobedience, absolutely legal, 22-year-old Goloskokov told Reuters in a telephone interview.

oeIts aim was to express our protest against the policy of soft apartheid which has been conducted by the leadership of Estonia for many years and the climax of which was the dismantling of the ¶ soldiers (monument) in Tallinn.

OVERLOADED WEBSITES

oeWe made multiple requests to these sites, he said. oeThe fact that they could not withstand this is, strictly speaking, the fault of those people who from a technical point of view did not equip them properly.

He said his action " known as a distributed denial-of-service attack " was his own initiative and he received no help either from Nashi or from Russian officials.

The creation of the youth group was masterminded by Kremlin officials and its activists have had audiences with former President Vladimir Putin, who is now prime minister. Nashis former leader is now the head of a government agency.

Nashi stages regular protests outside the embassies of Western states with which the Kremlin has disagreements, and its activists picket meetings of opposition parties.

Kristina Potupchik, a spokeswoman for the organization, said it had nothing to do with jamming Estonian Internet sites. oeIf anything did happen, it was the personal initiative of Konstantin Goloskokov, she said.

Russian officials allege that Estonia routinely discriminates against its Russian-speaking minority and accuse European institutions of turning a blind eye.

The decision to move the Red Army monument in Tallinn was seen in Moscow as a deliberate snub to the sacrifices the Soviet Union made to liberate eastern Europe from German occupation during World War Two.

But Estonians, like many eastern Europeans, say Nazi rule was replaced by decades of brutal Soviet repression which only ended with the fall of the Berlin Wall.

Estonias government denies discriminating against Russian-speakers. It said the presence of the Red Army monument in the center of the capital was causing public order problems, and moved it instead to a military cemetery.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Malaysia: Visas for 70,000 Bangladeshi Immigrants Revoked

The immigrants were expected to work in manufacturing, farming and construction. Permits were revoked by Malaysias government amid accusations that foreigners were taking Malaysian jobs. Some 3,000,000 foreigners work in Malaysia, fleeing poverty in their own countries for low-paying jobs.

Kuala Lumpur (AsiaNews/Agencies) " Malaysia has revoked work visas for 70,000 Bangladeshis who were to begin arriving this week in response to a public outcry about migrants taking Malaysian jobs.

The would-be immigrants were to be employed in manufacturing, agriculture and construction, and would have joined an estimated 500,000 Bangladeshi already in the country, out of an estimated three million Asian migrant workers in the whole country.

These oeworkers are from poverty-stricken families and had to raise about 200,000 Bangladeshi taka [or about US$ 2,500] to send their son to Malaysia in the hope of escaping poverty, said Irene Fernandez, executive director of Tena-ganita, an NGO that helps migrant workers in distress. For purpose of comparison she noted that a primary school teacher in Bangladesh earned only about 800 taka (US$ 13) a month.

Malaysias about-face on the 70,000 visas is the direct result of the global economic crisis which is having major impact on the local labour market.

oeBecause of the downturn, factory owners are cutting costs by letting locals go and keeping foreigners because they are cheaper, said Govindasamy Rajasegaran, secretary general of the Malaysian Trades Union Congress. oeIf this trend continues, by June we expect 400,000 local workers to be laid off.

But foreign workers are also affected by cuts in jobs and lay-offs. Most are repatriated but many choose to go under-ground and take underpaid jobs just to avoid going home.

Under current rules, migrant workers are given 30 days to secure work after arriving in Malaysia or they are forced to leave the country.

oeIn theory, if there are no jobs they are repatriated, but in practice they . . . easily find extremely low-paid jobs that are shunned by locals, Ms Fernandez said.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[Return to headlines]

More Troops in Thai South

BANGKOK " THAI Prime Minister Abhisit Vejjajiva said on Thursday he would send a further 4,000 troops to the kingdoms troubled south where a bloody five-year insurgency continues to claim lives almost daily. Mr Abhisit told reporters the extra rangers would help improve relations between authorities and the Muslim-majority population, despite vowing in January to end emergency rule following allegations of military abuses.

[#x2dc]I have authorised an additional 4,000 rangers. Their mission is non-combat. They will work towards a better understanding with residents, Mr Abhisit said after meeting with top military officials.

[#x2dc]The government can currently only maintain the status quo and¶ its not enough because there are still violent militants who have succeeded in creating a climate of fear in the area, he said.

More than 3,600 people have been killed since unrest erupted in the deep south in January 2004, with separatist militants employing increasingly brutal tactics including frequent roadside bombings, shootings and beheadings.

Tensions have simmered since predominantly Buddhist Thailand annexed the mainly Malay sultanate in 1902.

The increased troop levels follow the approval by the cabinet on Tuesday of a 1.2 billion baht ($50S.6 million) budget to fund an increase in the hardship allowance of soldiers, police and civilians battling the insurgency.

The allowance is to be raised from 1,500 to 2,500 baht monthly for the 60,000 personnel deployed in the three troubled southern provinces of Pattani, Yala and Narathiwat.

Mr Abhisit said the government would reassess troop levels again in April when the cabinet decides on a further three-month extension of emergency rule " which would be the 15th since it was first imposed in mid-2005.

The premier has charged a special commission of ministers with drafting a new law to replace the emergency decree. " AFP

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Pakistan: Islam Has No Link With Terrorism, Says PM

Islamabad, 11 March (AKI/Asian Age) " Islam had no links with sectarianism or terrorism, Pakistani prime minister Yousaf Raza Gillani said on Tuesday. Addressing the National Seerat Conference in the capital Islamabad, Gillani called for the introduction of Islamic universal teachings to the world.

oeMuslims around the world are victims of educational, economic and political backwardness. All negative tendencies like sectarianism, terrorism and extremism are being attributed to the Muslims. This is not right, Gillani said.

oeMuslims have to prove with practice that Islam is the religion of peace and harmony, he added.

Gillani said that Pakistan wanted the Muslim world to adopt concerted action to formulate a comprehensive strategy to counter terrorism in all its forms.

The prime minister said it was also vital to address the root causes of terrorism. oeThese include injustice, sense of helplessness and economic and political deprivation, he said.

oeAs the world has become a global village, we have to propagate the true message of Islam which stands for universal peace and brotherhood, said Gillani.

The prime minister regretted that faith has come under increasing attacks in the Western world resulting in recent incidents of what he called Islamophobia.

oeThis is mainly due to a handful of misguided people who have by their interpretation of Islam made the religion target of our detractors, he said.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[Return to headlines]

Pakistan: Swat Valley: Sharia Implemented on 16 March

Only President Zardari's signature is needed to implement the law. Two Shariatic courts will administer justice in Malakand district and Taliban militias will run the region. Women will be the first to suffer and some 400 girls schools could be closed.

Peshawar (AsiaNews) " The government of the North-West Frontier Province (NWFP) announced that Sharia will come into effect next Monday in Malakand district after President Zardari signs into law the Nizam-e-Adl Regulations 2009. Henceforth two appellate Shariatic courts, the Darul Qaza and Darul-Darul Qaza, will administer justice in the area. Judges will be appointed to these Qazi courts by the High Court, and it will be possible to challenge verdicts delivered by the Darul Qaza court in the Darul-Darul Qaza court.

The agreement that opened the door to the introduction of Quranic law in the area also requires that local Taliban militias, the Tehreek-i-Nafaz-i-Shariat-i-Muhammadi, rein in violence in the Swat Valley.

Religious minorities, including Christians, and human rights groups are very concerned about the governments decision which effectively places the whole region in the hands of militias.

Women, who are already victims of discrimination and exclusion in society, will be the first to suffer from the application of Sharia.

Girls and young women are likely to lose the right to go to schools. Since the start of the year many have been targeted by armed groups.

Since the start of the Taliban military campaign in 2007 168 schools have been attacked, including 104 girls schools. An additional 400 private schools could also be shut down.

Altogether some 80,000 female students could have their education put at risk whilst about 8,000 female teachers could lose their job.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[Return to headlines]

Singapore: 2 Ji Detainees Released

TWO Singaporean members of the Jemaah Islamiah terror network who were detained under the Internal Security Act have been released.

A Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA) statement on Thursday said both men have been cooperative in investigations and shown significant progress in their rehabilitation since they were detained in January 2002.

The two, Mohamed Ellias Mohamed Khan and Jaafar Mistooki, were arrested in December 2001 for their involvement in the JIs plans to mount attacks against several targets in Singapore. They were released on Jan 5.

MHA said on Thursday they were assessed to no longer pose a security threat that required preventive detention. Both have been released on Suspension Directions, it added.

This means their detention orders have been suspended, and they must abide by certain conditions and restrictions after their release.

Should a person fail to comply, he may be detained again.

The ISA allows for detention without trial for up to two years at a time, but detentions are extended when detainees are assessed to remain a security threat.

When they were detained, Mohamed Ellias was 29 and a manager, while Jaafar was 40 and a freelance despatch driver.

MHA also announced the lapse of a Restriction Order (RO) for Faisal Abdullah Abdat, which expired on Feb 8 and was not renewed.

Faisal was detained in February 2003 for providing material support to an Al-Qaeda collaborator, and released on a Suspension Direction in October 2003. When this lapsed in February 2005, he was first issued with a two-year RO.

As he had been cooperative in investigations and responded to rehabilitation, he was assessed to no longer require supervision under an RO regime, MHA said.

It added that there are now 20 men in detention for terror activities, while another 42 are out on ROs, which regulate their movements and activities.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Thai Bloggers Face Jail Without Bail for Discussing Monarchy

By Daniel Ten Kate

Suwicha Thakhor has spent two months in a Thai prison, accused by police of insulting the royal family. He says he should be allowed to express an opinion.

Arrested Jan. 14 and charged in connection with material posted on the Internet, the 34-year-old oil engineer spends his days missing his wife and three children.

oeWe have to be able to think freely, Suwicha said on March 4 at Klong Prem Central Prison, his eyes red with tears. oeThey cannot stop ideas by sending people to jail.

More than a dozen similar cases are pending under Thai law as a widening political divide prompts discussion on the future role of the monarchy. King Bhumibol Adulyadej, 81, has ruled for six decades, making him an enduring force in a country that has seen 10 coups since absolute monarchy was abolished in 1932.

Succession oeis the single biggest variable that shapes Thai risk, said Robert Broadfoot, managing director of Hong Kong-based Political & Economic Risk Consultancy Ltd. Equating King Bhumibols integrity with that of the monarchy as an institution oeis an assumption that will be tested by the transition.

Thailands constitution says the king oeshall be enthroned in a position of revered worship and shall not be violated. The law, called lese-majeste " it means injury to majesty in French " makes it a criminal offense to defame, insult or threaten the king, queen, heir apparent or regent. Offenders face as many as 15 years in prison.

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Philippines: Cardinals Rosales and Vidal Pressure Arroyo for Agrarian Reform

The Catholic Church calls for oemoral pressure on members of parliament, so that the norm may benefit poor farmers in the country. Doubts concerning members of the presidents family, whose land is not included in the CARP.

Manila (AsiaNews) " The Filipino Catholic Church is supporting the poor farmers in the country, and asking for the extension of the law on agrarian reform (CARP). Last March 6, two cardinals, Gaudencio Rosales of Manila and Ricardo Vidal of Cebu, met with President Gloria Macapagal-Arroyo to discuss the law under consideration in parliament. The cardinals express the hope that this may benefit oepoor farmers and call on politicians to oegive the CARP additional five years.

According to Fr. Anton Pascual, executive director of Caritas Manila, the president promised the two cardinals that her administration is oeone with the Church in the fight for approval of the CARP. oeMalacanang [the presidential palace] is not the problem. The Church has the full support of the president.

Arroyos full support is an important point for the Church, but it is the parliament that must decide whether or not to extend the law. Fr. Pascual is asking for oemoral pressure on the countrys politicians, and is inviting the bishops to oepersonally call on their respective legislators in order to convince them oeto pass CARP. We have three months to turn the tide to CARPs favor.

The effects of the law on agrarian reform " promulgated in 1988, and extended ten years later " expired in December of 2008. The authors of the CARP and farmers in the country have criticized the manner in which the law was extended to June of 2009, because it does not include a provision on oecompulsory land acquisition and distribution on behalf of poor farmers. This, he stresses, oeis the heart and soul of the CARP.

Finally, Arroyo has asked both of her sons, members of the House of Representatives, to vote in favor of the reform, and not oeto break the legacy of the Macapagal family in this matter. The presidents family has vast land holdings; there are rumors from various directions that Arroyo is more interested in oeprotecting property than in the well-being of the country.

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

From Chile, Appeal to End Embargo Against Cuba

oeIn order for the USA to have good relations with South America it is essential that they change their policy toward Cuba. Speaking in Santiago del Chile, where the South American Defense Council (CDS) was formally constituted, the Brazilian defense minister Nelson Jobim stressed the need for an immediate repeal of the embargo imposed against Cuba since 1962. oeWe see that today, with the new president in the USA, there are favorable conditions such that and end can be brought to this unjust and discriminatory situation echoed his Argentinean counterpart Nilda GarrÈ, noting that Cuba has also been excluded from OAS, from which it was expelled in 1962. oeChile says that the American community must be integrated by all members said the Chilean minister of defense, JosÈ GoÒi, adding that oeit is a common opinion that Cuba should be readmitted to OAS. As for the Uruguayan JosÈ Bayardi, oea change of vision and relationship is incumbent upon the USA toward Cuba. Today, Cuba does not represent any security problem for the USA and their policies are dictated more by the internal Cuban migrant lobbies than a cold and rational analysis of the realities. [AB]

" Hat tip: C. Cantoni

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

The Americas Report: Nicole Ferrand on Islamic Terrorism in Latin America

Over the years, there has been disturbing information about the presence of radical Islamic terrorist groups in Latin America. The Americas Report has published several articles regarding this subject including a recent article on how terrorists have and could use fake or doctored passports to enter the United States to carry out attacks. In light of this information, it is important to know which Islamic terror groups are present in the region and the threat they could pose to regional security¶

" Hat tip: CSP

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Venezuela: Israel Lobbies Chavez to Curb Anti-Semitism in Venezuela

Israel has embarked on an intensive diplomatic campaign to persuade Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez to rein in a recent wave of anti-Semitic attacks against Venezuelas Jews.

Over the last week, the Foreign Ministry has asked 15 different countries that maintain ties with both Israel and Venezuela to take high-level action on this issue. The use of international intermediaries is necessary because Venezuela severed diplomatic ties with Israel and expelled all its diplomats about a month ago, in response to Operation Cast Lead in the Gaza Strip.

oeThere has been a significant outbreak of anti-Semitism there, and we wanted to send messages to Venezuelas president through several different channels in order to clarify the gravity with which we view the situation, a senior government source said. oeWe wanted them to know that in Israels view, Chavez is responsible for the Jewish communitys welfare. Advertisement

Two of the countries whose assistance Israel requested are Argentina and Brazil, both of whose presidents subsequently called Chavez and relayed Israels message. Another is Russia, and a fourth is Spain, whose foreign minister, Miguel Moratinos, is due to visit the Venezuelan capital of Caracas soon. In addition to passing on Israels message, Moratinos has agreed to meet with leaders of the local Jewish community.

Israeli officials believe that the strong messages have begun to have an impact on Chavezs government: Venezuelan police recently arrested several suspects in the recent anti-Semitic attacks. However, there is still great fear among Venezuelas Jewish community, which numbers some 15,000 people.

Members of the Caracas Jewish community, who asked not to be identified for fear of reprisals, told Haaretz that Chavez has thus far given tacit backing to the growing anti-Semitism, and he could also stop it if he so desired, by giving the necessary orders to his security services. oeTheres an atmosphere of intimidation against the Jews, said one.

During Operation Cast Lead, the largest synagogue in Caracas was vandalized by unknown assailants, and several Jews were physically attacked. Two weeks ago, a bomb was thrown at the Jewish community center in Caracas. In response to growing public criticism of such incidents within his own country, Venezuelan Foreign Minister Nicolas Maduro made a well-publicized visit last month to the synagogue that was attacked.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Denmark: Immigration Service to Reopen Old Residency Cases

Some spouses of Danish citizens who have had their application for residence rejected will have their cases reopened

The Immigration Service is set to reopen 50 applications for residency for spouses of Danish citizens that have been rejected since 2002.

Birthe R̄nn Hornbech, the immigration minister, announced the about face on Wednesday, stating that immigration authorities would look into rejected applications that could be contested using the precedent-setting European Court of Justice decision in the Metock case.

Until now, Hornbech had been unwilling to order reviews of applications that had been rejected. She took the position that the countrys immigration laws took precedence over the 2007 Metock ruling, which states that non-EU spouses of EU citizens may obtain residence permits without having previously lived in an EU country. As recently as late February Hornbech had indicated that Denmark would continue to fight against any changes to its immigration laws, saying [x2dc]If you ram your head against a wall you may as well keep doing it until theres a hole.

Hornbech denied that pressure from the EU had forced her to ordering the reopening.

The decision applies only to applications involving the spouse of a Danish citizen " not those of citizens of other EU countries living in Denmark.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[Return to headlines]

Justice Dept. Investigates Arizona Sheriff for Enforcing Immigration Law

By Penny Starr

The Department of Justice (DOJ) has launched an investigation of the Maricopa County Sheriffs Office in Arizona following requests by congressional Democrats and allegations by liberal activists that the department has violated the civil rights of illegal aliens.

Reps. John Conyers (D-Mich.), Jerrold Nadler (D-N.Y.), Zoe Lofgren (D-Calif.), and Robert Scott (D-Va.) requested the investigation, and activists groups such as National Day Laborer Organizer Network and ACORN launched petition drives and rallies in support of the probe.

The investigation focuses on Sheriff Joe Arpaio and dozens of officers under his command who were trained through the Department of Homeland Securitys Immigration and Customs Enforcements Agreements of Cooperation in Communities to Enhance Safety and Security (ACCESS), which partners federal and local law enforcement to enforce immigration laws. (The Homeland Securitys Immigration and Customs Enforcement division is known popularly as ICE.)

[story continued at URL]

[Return to headlines]

Spain: Government [#x2dc]Wont Prosecute if Illegals Taken in (ANSAmEd) " MADRID, MARCH 11 " The Spanish secretary of state for immigration, Consuelo Rumi, said today that the socialist government oewill not prosecute NGOs, religious congregations and people who decide to take in irregular immigrants, saying that oeincorrect information has been spread regarding the matter: the news was reported on the online edition of El Mundo. Rumis statements follow the debate sparked in Spain over the presentation of the immigration bill in December. Article 53.2c sets fines of up to 10,000 euros for anyone who oepromotes the irregular stay of a foreigner in Spain. Some 4 thousand signatures in protest at the oeBerlusconian tones of the article have already been collected by the Platform lets save the receptions, says El Mundo. Rumİ confirmed that the new immigration law would include a register of entries and exits from the country which would allow the movements of people arriving in Spain to be checked for a set period only.(ANSAmEd).

(ANSAmEd) " MADRID, MARCH 11 " The Spanish secretary of state for immigration, Consuelo Rumi, said today that the socialist government oewill not prosecute NGOs, religious congregations and people who decide to take in irregular immigrants, saying that oeincorrect information has been spread regarding the matter: the news was reported on the online edition of El Mundo. Rumis statements follow the debate sparked in Spain over the presentation of the immigration bill in December. Article 53.2c sets fines of up to 10,000 euros for anyone who oepromotes the irregular stay of a foreigner in Spain. Some 4 thousand signatures in protest at the oeBerlusconian tones of the article have already been collected by the Platform lets save the receptions, says El Mundo. Rumİ confirmed that the new immigration law would include a register of entries and exits from the country which would allow the movements of people arriving in Spain to be checked for a set period only.(ANSAmEd).

" Hat tip: Insubria

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Coed Showers Going Statewide?

Family group says gender identity bill threatens women, children

A transgender identity plan for coed showers, locker rooms and other public facilities already implemented in one suburban Maryland county could be going statewide, according to alarmed members of a pro-family organization.

Officials with Maryland Citizens for a Responsible Government say a plan is pending in the state legislature that is similar to Montgomery County's permissive ordinance and now offers one of the greatest threats to privacy, safety and security that Maryland residents have ever known.

[¶]

With the bill's vague wording, all an adult male has to do to gain legal access to facilities normally reserved for women and girls is to indicate, verbally or non-verbally, that he has a sense of being female at the moment, the organization said.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Germany: the Anti-God Squad

Atheist Bus Campaign Gets into Gear in Germany

[Comment from Tuan Jim: Good timing!]

There's probably no God. Now stop worrying and enjoy your life. The brightly colored ads were part of a provocative campaign on British buses. Spain reacted with its own string of atheist slogans, and now a German group is following suit.

Those waiting by at bus stops in Berlin, Munich or Cologne later this year may be in for a surprise. In place of ordinary commercial ads, commuters will be greeted by hard-hitting atheist slogans. That at least is the plan of a new German atheism campaign, the latest European group to use buses as a vehicle for its provocative views.

Organizers are taking a leaf out of the book of Spanish and English groups that have run similar campaigns. Right now the German organizers are trying to raise money to embellish seven buses with their ads.

Atheists pledging a euro or more to the campaign can vote on a selection of slogans, some loosely based on the British signs. Phillip Müller, one of the campaign organizers, says the German group has collected €3,500 in the first four days of fundraising. They need €16,000 euros more to fund the project.

Müller, one of the six founders, doesn't see himself as any sort of missionary. "We just want to inform people," he said. "In an enlightened society you should be able to say something like that without being punished."

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Girl Scouts Birthday " But Nothing to Celebrate

The Daisy and Brownie Journey programs begin innocently enough. The youngsters meet flowers and critters who encourage them to explore botany and the environment and introduce them to the U.N. concept of oeglobal diversity..

By the time an oeenlightened Girl Scout reaches the Seniors program, she is encouraged to become an oeagent of change for the global good and an oeambassador for causes championed by left-leaning womens advocacy groups. Partnerships have been formed with Planned Parenthood, and the Girl Scouts have stood shoulder-to-shoulder with gun control advocates and radical environmental groups.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Judge Orders Homeschoolers Into Public District Classrooms

Decides children need more [#x2dc]focus despite testing above grade levels

A North Carolina judge has ordered three children to attend public schools this fall because the homeschooling their mother has provided over the last four years needs to be oechallenged.

The children, however, have tested above their grade levels " by as much as two years.

The decision is raising eyebrows among homeschooling families, and one friend of the mother has launched a website to publicize the issue.

[¶]

Williams told WND the public school order was the worst possible outcome for Ms. Mills, who had made it clear she felt it was important to her children that she continue homeschooling.

According to Williams website, the judge also ordered a mental health evaluation for the mother " but not the father " as part of the divorce proceedings, in what Williams described as an attack on the oemothers conservative Christian beliefs.

[¶]

Williams said the mother originally moved into a homeschool schedule because the children were not doing as well as she hoped at the local public schools.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Policy Discriminating Against Bible Clubs Challenged

Supreme Court asked whether Equal Access Act can be [#x2dc]circumvented

The U.S. Supreme Court is being asked to decide whether school officials at Kentridge High School near Seattle can circumvent the requirements of the Equal Access Act by denying religious student groups the rights afforded other organizations.

[¶]

The members of the Truth Bible Club wish to limit the clubs voting membership to Christians, but because of the faith-based decision, Kentridge officials repeatedly have rejected the application, citing the schools oenondiscrimination policy.

Officials also said the name of the club is oeooffensive.

" Hat tip: JD

[Return to headlines]

UK: Labour [x2dc]Double Standards as Smoking Ban is Lifted for G20 World Leaders

Labour has been accused of double standards for amending legislation to allow world leaders to use smoking rooms during the G20 economic conference.

Dozens of heads of state, politicians and diplomats will be meeting at the Excel Exhibition Centre in Docklands, London, next month.

It is believed that laws have been changed to get around the smoking ban and provide specialist rooms that the visiting dignitaries can use.

Smoking in all enclosed public spaces and places of work was banned under the Health Act 2006, and came into force in England in 2007.

It is not clear which Government department has amended the law for the venue or whether is only a temporary measure.

But the Foreign and Common Office, who is hosting the event, said it was aware of the smoking rooms and has launched an investigation.

Local authority Newham Council is also looking into the matter as environmental health officers in charge were not aware of the amendment.

Critics say the Government is flouting the ban and should apply the same concession to struggling businesses.

Smoking campaign group Freedom2choose chairman Andy Davis said: [x2dc]This clearly demonstrates that there are alternative solutions to the current smoking ban that our government is ignoring.

[x2dc]Smoking rooms would provide welcome relief for our hospitality industry with the ban being acknowledged as one of the major factors in its current downturn.

[x2dc]Our government is accommodating the political leaders from across the globe, yet they are not prepared to accommodate millions of their own citizens.

[x2dc]This concession should now be made available to all private businesses and clubs for them to adopt if they so desire.

Conservative MP Anne Widdecombe said: [x2dc]Its one law for one, and one for another, and I think that sums up this Government.

The G20 summit, which starts on April 2, is being held under the motto [x2dc]stability, growth, jobs.

It is due to bring together leaders of the worlds advanced and emerging economies along with representatives of international financial institutions with the aim of restoring stability and stimulating global economic growth.

On Monday, it was revealed that consultants will be paid more than £6 million to help the Government host the event.

Junior Foreign Office minister Gillian Merron gave details of four contracts worth an expected £6,204,065 with external consultancy firms hired to oeadvise on the G20.

She said Feltech/MRG, an event production company, had been hired to help stage the summit at a cost of £5,941,597 excluding VAT.

The development of the summit logo and the creation of the original globe image to overcome copyright issues cost £6,000.

" Hat tip: Tuan Jim

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

An Appeal to Cultural Muslims

by Amil Imani

There are some 1.2 billion Muslims in the world, the overwhelming majority of which are Cultural Muslims who are generally called moderate Muslims. Muslims are born into Islam, where a great many never go through the process of deciding for themselves if they want to be Muslims. It is not a religion that they choose, it is a belief they inherit. For whatever reason, this great majority of Cultural Muslims are Muslims of sort without fully toeing the line of Islam. The real Muslims are the jihadists, a small minority who lives and dies by the dictates of the Quran and the Sunna, the life examples of Muhammad¶

" Hat tip: Amil Imani

[\[Return to headlines\]](#)

Regulate Armed Robots Before Its Too Late

IN THIS age of super-rapid technological advance, we do well to obey the Boy Scout injunction: oeBe prepared. That requires nimbleness of mind, given that the ever accelerating power of computers is being applied across such a wide range of applications, making it hard to keep track of everything that is happening. The danger is that we only wake up to the need for forethought when in the midst of a storm created by innovations that have already overtaken us.

We are on the brink, and perhaps to some degree already over the edge, in one hugely important area: robotics. Robot sentries patrol the borders of South Korea and Israel. Remote-controlled aircraft mount missile attacks on enemy positions. Other military robots are already in service, and not just for defusing bombs or detecting landmines: a coming generation of autonomous combat robots capable of deep penetration into enemy territory raises questions about whether they will be able to discriminate between soldiers and innocent civilians. Police forces are looking to acquire minia-ture Taser-firing robot helicopters. In South Korea and Japan the development of robots for feeding and bathing the elderly and children is already advanced. Even in a robot-backward country like the UK, some vacuum cleaners sense their autonomous way around furniture. A driverless car has already negotiated its way through Los Angeles traffic.

In the next decades, completely autonomous robots might be involved in many military, policing, transport and even caring roles. What if they malfunction? What if a programming glitch makes them kill, electrocute, demolish, drown and explode, or fail at the crucial moment? Whose insurance will pay for damage to furniture, other traffic or the baby, when things go wrong? The software company, the manufacturer, the owner?

Most thinking about the implications of robotics tends to take sci-fi forms: robots enslave humankind, or beautifully sculpted humanoid machines have sex with their owners and then post-coitally tidy the room and make coffee. But the real concern lies in the areas to which the money already flows: the military and the police.

A confused controversy arose in early 2008 over the deployment in Iraq of three SWORDS armed robotic vehicles carrying M249 machine guns. The manufacturer of these vehicles said the robots were never used in combat and that they were involved in no uncommanded or unexpected movements. Rumours nevertheless abounded about the reason why funding for the SWORDS programme abruptly stopped. This case prompts one to prick up ones ears.

Media stories about Predator drones mounting missile attacks in Afghanistan and Pakistan are now commonplace, and there are at least another dozen military robot projects in development. What are the rules governing their deployment? How reliable are they? One sees their advantages: they keep friendly troops out of harms way, and can often fight more effectively than human combatants. But what are the limits, especially when these machines become autonomous?

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Space Junk Threat Worried Space Station

The crew of the international space station had a close call with space junk.

The three astronauts took refuge for 11 minutes Thursday in a Russian escape capsule before returning inside. Officials were worried that the space station might get hit with a piece of space junk.

NASA says the debris was a small piece of an old spacecraft motor and it was passing within three miles of the station

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Why We Elect Liars as Leaders

One of the most creative uses of lying " and a key tactic for bending a population to your will " is the creation of a crisis. Now, anyone even superficially familiar with the history of the political left has heard references to the strategy of creating crises as a means of transforming society. Youve probably heard of the Hegelian dialectic, a key Marxist technique whereby an idea (oeWe need more gun control laws!) generates its opposite (oeNo, we dont need more gun laws, we just need tougher sentencing of criminals!), which leads to a reconciliation of opposites, or synthesis (oeOK, well compromise by passing new gun-control laws, but watering them down somewhat). This is how socialist progress is achieved opeacefully " through conflict or crisis " and always in the direction of greater socialism.

" Hat tip: JD

[\[\[Return to headlines\]\]](#)

Newstex ID: GATE-0001-32999825

LOAD-DATE: March 14, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2009 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2009 Gates of Vienna

397 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Cyprus Mail

Internet Edition

Cyprus Mail

March 11, 2009 Wednesday

Anti-trafficking offices to be expanded

BYLINE: Alexia Saoulli

LENGTH: 468 words

TRAFFICKING of human beings for sexual and labour exploitation is a problem that the police force wants to better curtail.

For this reason the police office responsible for handling combatting of trafficking of human beings will be extended to all districts with special training offered to the officers involved.

The idea is to better investigate trafficking cases in an effort to deal with the problem more effectively.

Although the initiative had not yet been implemented, it had the full backing of the police leadership, said Chief Superintendent Charalambos Ioannou.

Ioannou, who heads Department C at the Police HQ, said a circular had been issued recommending the office was strengthened. More details about the plan would be available over the next few days, he said.

It is thought that around 20 officers will be appointed across all districts and responsible for handling trafficking cases. They will all receive special training for this purpose. Up until now investigations have come under each district's Criminal Investigation Departments.

Each district office will be answerable to the Combatting of Trafficking of Human Beings Office in Nicosia which is headed by Rita Superman and comes under the umbrella of Department C. Superman's office will be responsible for the all over co-ordination of operations.

The scheme will greatly facilitate the office which is currently staffed by Superman and two other officers.

Meanwhile reports that Cyprus was involved in receiving thousands of trafficked women for sexual exploitation were referring to the occupied areas, said Superman.

According to press reports Tel Aviv police are searching for the suspected ringleader of Israel's biggest woman trafficking network which smuggled thousands of women from the former Soviet Union into Israel, Cyprus, Belgium and England, forcing them to work as prostitutes.

This was referring to the occupied areas, she said.

Nevertheless the US Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report has placed the Republic of Cyprus on the Tier 2 Watch List for three consecutive years.

Tier 2 is for countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards set by the Trafficking Victims Protection Act 2000 for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant effort to bring themselves in compliance. It is the only EU country in that category.

It is thought that improvements to the Combatting of Trafficking of Human Beings Office could have something to do with recent changes in US legislation that stipulate any country on Tier 2 for two consecutive years is automatically demoted to Tier 3 Watch List.

Tier 3 status is for countries that neither comply with the minimum standards nor make significant efforts to come into compliance. In 2008 Tier 3 countries included Iran, North Korea, Qatar and Fiji.

LOAD-DATE: March 11, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 70

Copyright 2009 Cyprus Mail - Cyprus Mail Co. Ltd.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

398 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Financial Mail (South Africa)

February 20, 2009
Financial Mail Edition

HUMAN TRAFFICKING. World Cup warning

BYLINE: Matebello Motloung

SECTION: CRIME, LAW & JUSTICE

LENGTH: 632 words

HUMAN TRAFFICKING

World Cup warning

As SA gears up to host the 2010 soccer World Cup, fears are mounting that the country's socioeconomic disparities and history of cheap labour will leave it more vulnerable during this period to a growing social ill - human trafficking.

According to the United Nations, SA is one of the world's hotspots for human trafficking - the third most profitable trade (about $12USbn in 2007) for crime syndicates after drugs and guns.

Reports by the UN and local and international human rights groups show how Chinese, Nigerian and local syndicates use SA as a transit point to enter Swaziland, Lesotho, Mozambique and other international markets.

Simply put, human trafficking is modern-day slavery. Often boys and girls younger than 20 become victims for commercial exploitation, in most cases by people they know, with the promise of a better life in the city.

The unsuspecting victims hail from poor provinces such as Mpumalanga, Limpopo, Northern Cape and Eastern Cape, informal settlements and rural areas. They are either recruited or abducted, and then forced into prostitution, farm labour or criminal activities. They are sold for anything between R250 and R3500, according to the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) 2008 report into human trafficking in SA. Johannesburg is the favourite destination, followed by Durban and Cape Town.

Western Cape-based children's rights NGO Molo Songololo says the World Cup poses a big challenge for SA in that during such events, there's a spike in sex tourism. "Given that part of the 2010 package will be the relaxation of visa controls, this will make trafficking in and out of SA easier," says Patric Solomon, Molo Songololo's director. The fact that schools will be closed for the duration of the World Cup leaves children vulnerable to exploitation by those seeking cheap labour.

There is already evidence of this. The IOM in East Africa says trafficking syndicates are using the World Cup to lure young men from Ethiopia to SA on the pretext of lucrative contracts in the construction industry. On arrival they are forced into crime, and because of their illegal status they don't report their captors. Home affairs is aware of the problem and is working with the intersectoral task team on human trafficking comprising the National Prosecuting Authority, the police, IOM, Molo Songololo and social welfare.

SA's perceived lenient border controls are not to blame for the increase in human trafficking, says Amanda Ledwaba, a director at home affairs. She attributes it to a high demand globally, cheap labour and muti practices.

If SA is to get it right, it needs legislation that covers all these dynamics. There's already a draft policy that human rights activists are hoping will be tabled before parliament this year.

Offenders are prosecuted under legislation such as the Children's Act and the Sexual Offences Act. However, the latter only prosecutes trafficking for sexual exploitation. There's also criticism that sentences don't correlate with the severity of the crime.

The IOM's Mia Immelback says the main ingredients that should inform the drafting of the new policy are prevention, prosecution, taking into consideration the number of people involved in the trafficking chain, and assistance and support. "You don't want to just punish the exploiter but everyone in the chain," says Immelback. "The ruthlessness of the trade also demands that victims are guaranteed safety from their captors."

Though SA has shown commitment by signing UN protocols, it hasn't done enough. In the US's Trafficking in Persons 2008 report, SA has been placed on its watch list due to its inability to meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

IOM's anti-trafficking awareness campaigns SA must do more

LOAD-DATE: February 23, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Magazine

Copyright 2009 BDFM Publishers PTY Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

399 of 404 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

February 8, 2009 Sunday

Don't make them victims twice over

BYLINE: Santha OorjithamSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 20LENGTH: 1301 words

MALAYSIA has taken big steps to tackle human trafficking. Now it needs to improve public and official awareness, open more shelters for victims and focus on cases of forced labour, experts tell SANTHA OORJITHAM.

AMU had an Indian passport with a visa when she landed in Singapore, where she had been promised a job as a tailor.

But her passport was taken away from her at the airport and she never saw it again. The agent who brought her in tried to force her into prostitution. But when she refused, despite beatings, he sent her to work in various homes in Malaysia - and held back her salary to "make arrangements" for her eventual return to Tamil Nadu.

He threatened that if she gave him any trouble, "he would kill me and throw my body somewhere, never to be found".

For her last employer, the 31-year-old not only had to clean his house and the homes of his four children, but also had to serve as a nurse to his elderly mother. When the mother was hospitalised, Amu had to stay with her.

That's when she approached a stranger - who took her to a nearby police station. The police brought her to a shelter run by Tenaganita, a non-governmental organisation (NGO) protecting the rights of women and migrant workers.

Amu has no passport and no money - but has to pay a fine of RM2,000 before she is allowed to leave Malaysia.

Her story shows how far Malaysia has come in combating human trafficking -- and how much still needs to be done, especially for victims of forced labour like Amu.

In June 2007, the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report downgraded Malaysia from Tier 2 to Tier 3 for not making a significant effort in combating human trafficking.

But in July that year, Malaysia gazetted the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007, which imposed a mandatory jail term of up to 20 years for those convicted of trafficking.

The act came into force in February last year. The following month, the Women, Family and Community Development Ministry opened two places of refuge for women and child trafficking victims.

The embassies of Indonesia and the Philippines have shelters in Kuala Lumpur for their nationals.

NGOs, such as Tenaganita, the Women's Aid Organisation and the Good Shepherd Sisters in Sabah, also manage shelters.

But these are not enough to house all the trafficking victims, says Aegile Fernandez, coordinator for Tenaganita's anti-trafficking in persons programme. She reckons there should be at least two in each state and notes there is none for men yet.

In the June 2008 TIP Report, Malaysia was upgraded to the Tier 2 Watch List but noted that it was not fully complying with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking although "it is making significant efforts to do so". A TIP interim assessment will come out at the end of this month and the next annual TIP Report will be released in June.

Over the past year, Malay-sian enforcement officers have rescued 88 human trafficking victims and assisted six who lodged reports.

In March last year, police made the first arrest under the act -- of 33-year-old Ee Chin Kai, who was charged under the act in May with living off the earnings of two Thai women lured into prostitution in Johor.

So far, seven traffickers have been charged and last December, Indian national Punitha Raja, was the first to be sentenced under the act -- to eight years in jail.

An inter-agency National Council for Anti-Trafficking in Persons has been set up, headed by the Home Ministry secretary-general and it includes representatives from NGOs.

The Royal Malaysia Police are on the council and are linking up with the NGOs.

Bukit Aman set up a special Anti-Human Trafficking Unit in July last year and plans branches in each district.

Senior Assistant Commissioner (II) Ahmad Sofian Md Yassin, principal assistant director of D7 (in the Criminal Investigation Department, tackling gangsterism, prostitution and gambling), "is very open and very much into working with us to curb trafficking", says Fernandez. "They have put this high on the agenda and are serious about it."

But although police within the Klang Valley are well informed about the act and follow the proper procedures, she says those in other states who have not yet been trained may not be able to identify trafficking victims.

"If victims go to a police station and complain about trafficking, they may be handed to the Immigration Department if they have no documents," she says. And some Immigration officers still view them as illegal immigrants.

That's what happened to 15 Thais, Vietnamese and Cambodians last year. They were subsequently repatriated to the Thai border.

"Such cases will be history in the future," promises Ahmad Sofian. "We are out to make all officers conversant with the law. We are very careful not to turn victims into the accused."

Last December, police began a series of roadshows on trafficking in persons that will visit every contingent.

They also held briefings on the act and procedures for trainers in Kedah, Perlis, Penang and Perak, as well as a seminar at the Royal Malaysia Police College with participants from Thailand, Singapore and Indonesia, and Immigration, Customs and Malaysian Maritime Enforcement Agency officials.

Meanwhile, there are about 1,000 Filipinos in Immigration detention centres in Sabah and Sarawak but fewer in the peninsula, says Melchor Lalunio, Jr, consul at the the Philippine embassy here. Although they are Immigration Act violators, the embassy doesn't know if they were trafficked.

"If we could be informed immediately when our nationals are detained, we would appreciate it," says Lalunio.

"Time is really of the essence. When they are first detained, the mode of entry is still open. But later, the recruiter and their local counterpart may have moved on.

"We are always left with the victims but the machinery is still there."

Border patrols, especially, need training on procedures to identify trafficking victims, Fernandez adds. Tenaganita claims that since the end of 2006, hundreds of refugees -- mainly from Myanmar -- have been trafficked at the Thai border.

After an ntv7 programme made similar allegations last year, Home Minister Datuk Seri Syed Hamid Albar said in a written reply to Parliament in November that a committee set up by the Immigration Department had cleared its officers of involvement.

Both activists and diplomats hope that Malaysia will now turn its attention to victims of forced labour such as Amu -- who face abuse, threats, debt bondage and withholding of pay and travel documents.

Police are already investigating the first forced labour case reported this year. "If there are cases of forced labour, we will classify them accordingly and investigate," says Ahmad Sofian, asking the public to call or SMS Rakan Cop about suspected cases.

Of the 500 reports of Filipinos trafficked into Malaysia, Lalunio estimates most are cases of forced labour.

"They were promised jobs in construction or general services but forced to do low-paying jobs without work permits.

"They could not report to the police because they had overstayed after entering as tourists and their passports were held by the agents."

Malaysia is acting to fight human trafficking, the consul stresses.

"It has the law, it has the institutional will as shown by the meetings and consultations. It has the budget for places of refuge and it is learning more from others about the procedures. We are happy and smiling, but not yet ecstatic."

But for Amu, the future looks bleak. To pay the agent before she left India, she had borrowed from her sister and brother and pawned her jewellery -- hoping to send money home later to help her ailing husband, son and daughter.

Wiping tears away with the loose end of her sari, she says: "I am tired and heartsick that after working here for more than a year, I still have no money."

LOAD-DATE: February 9, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

400 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Sun (England)

January 23, 2009 Friday
Edition 1

Boost for 'sex' girls

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 19

LENGTH: 78 words

A SCOTS charity has helped build two refuge centres in Moldova to stop teenagers being trafficked into the underground sex trade.

Peterhead-based New Hope Trust is trying to prevent girls being forced into the industry when they leave orphanages aged 16.

It helps them with their studies and aims to get them safe jobs.

The Trust's Philip Cameron said: "There are tens of thousands of these kids." Moldova is the only European country on the US human trafficking blacklist.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: SUN

401 of 404 DOCUMENTS

The Sun (England)

January 23, 2009 Friday
Edition 2

Boost for 'sex' girls

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 27

LENGTH: 78 words

A SCOTS charity has helped build two refuge centres in Moldova to stop teenagers being trafficked into the underground sex trade.

Peterhead-based New Hope Trust is trying to prevent girls being forced into the industry when they leave orphanages aged 16.

It helps them with their studies and aims to get them safe jobs.

The Trust's Philip Cameron said: "There are tens of thousands of these kids." Moldova is the only European country on the US human trafficking blacklist.

LOAD-DATE: January 23, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: SUN

402 of 404 DOCUMENTS

Public Papers of the Presidents

January 19, 2009 Monday

Proclamation 8342--To Suspend Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Foreign Government Officials Responsible for Failing To Combat Trafficking in Persons SECTION: Pg. 86LENGTH: 768 wordsHIGHLIGHT: This proclamation will be published in the Federal Register on January 22.

January 16, 2009

By the President of the United States of America

A Proclamation

In order to foster greater resolve to address trafficking in persons (TIP), specifically in punishing acts of trafficking and providing protections to the victims of these crimes, consistent with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, as amended (the "Act") (22 U.S.C. 7101 et seq.), it is in the interests of the United States to restrict the international travel and to suspend entry into the United States, as immigrants or nonimmigrants, of certain senior government officials responsible for domestic law enforcement, justice, or labor affairs who have impeded their governments' antitrafficking efforts, have failed to implement their governments' antitrafficking laws and policies, or who otherwise bear responsibility for their governments' failures to take steps recognized internationally as appropriate to combat trafficking in persons, and whose governments have been ranked more than once as Tier 3 countries, which represent the worst anti-TIP performers, in the Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, and for which I have made a determination pursuant to section 110(d)(1)-(2) or (4) of the Act. The Act reflects international antitrafficking standards that guide efforts to eradicate this modern-day form of slavery around the world.

Now, Therefore, I, George W. Bush, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the laws of the United States, including section 212(f) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 8 U.S.C. 1182(f), and section 301 of title 3, United States Code, hereby find that the unrestricted immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of persons described in section 1 of this proclamation would, except as provided for in sections 2 and 3 of this proclamation, be detrimental to the interests of the United States.

I therefore hereby proclaim that:

Section 1. The entry into the United States, as immigrants or nonimmigrants, of the following aliens is hereby suspended:

(a) Senior government officials--defined as the heads of ministries or agencies and officials occupying positions within the two bureaucratic levels below those top positions--responsible for domestic law enforcement, justice, or labor affairs who have impeded their governments' antitrafficking efforts, have failed to implement their governments' antitrafficking laws and policies, or who otherwise bear responsibility for their governments' failures to take steps recognized internationally as appropriate to combat trafficking in persons, and who are members of governments for which I have made a determination pursuant to section 110(d)(1)-(2) or (4) of the Act, in the current year and at least once in the preceding 3 years;

(b) The spouses of persons described in subsection (a) of this section.

Sec. 2. Section 1 of this proclamation shall not apply with respect to any person otherwise covered by section 1 where entry of such person would not be contrary to the interest of the United States.

Sec. 3. Persons covered by sections 1 or 2 of this proclamation shall be identified by the Secretary of State or the Secretary's designee, in his or her sole discretion, pursuant to such procedures as the Secretary may establish under section 5 of this proclamation.

Sec. 4. Nothing in this proclamation shall be construed to derogate from United States Government obligations under applicable international agreements.

Sec. 5. The Secretary of State shall implement this proclamation pursuant to such procedures as the Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security, may establish.

Sec. 6. This proclamation is effective immediately. It shall remain in effect until such time as the Secretary of State determines that it is no longer necessary and should be terminated, either in whole or in part. Any such determination by the Secretary of State shall be published in the Federal Register.

Sec. 7. This proclamation is not intended to, and does not, create any right, benefit, or privilege, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or in equity by any party against the United States, its departments, agencies, instrumentalities, or entities, its officers or employees, or any other person.

In Witness Whereof, I have hereunto set my hand this sixteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord two thousand nine, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and thirty-third.

George W. Bush

[Filed with the Office of the Federal Register, 11:15 a.m., January 21, 2009]

LOAD-DATE: January 30, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Reports

403 of 404 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

January 16, 2009 Friday

TO SUSPEND ENTRY AS IMMIGRANTS AND NONIMMIGRANTS OF FOREIGN GOVERNMENT OFFICIALS RESPONSIBLE FOR FAILING TO COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS A PROCLAMATION BY PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 754 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the White House:

In order to foster greater resolve to address trafficking in persons (TIP), specifically in punishing acts of trafficking and providing protections to the victims of these crimes, consistent with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, as amended (the "Act") (22 U.S.C. 7101 et seq.), it is in the interests of the United States to restrict the international travel and to suspend entry into the United States, as immigrants or nonimmigrants, of certain senior government officials responsible for domestic law enforcement, justice, or labor affairs who have impeded their governments' antitrafficking efforts, have failed to implement their governments' antitrafficking laws and policies, or who otherwise bear responsibility for their governments' failures to take steps recognized internationally as appropriate to combat trafficking in persons, and whose governments have been ranked more than once as Tier 3 countries, which represent the worst anti-TIP performers, in the Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, and for which I have made a determination pursuant to section 110(d)(1)-(2) or (4) of the Act. The Act reflects international antitrafficking standards that guide efforts to eradicate this modern-day form of slavery around the world.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the laws of the United States, including section 212(f) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 8 U.S.C. 1182(f), and section 301 of title 3, United States Code, hereby find that the unrestricted immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of persons described in section 1 of this proclamation would, except as provided for in sections 2 and 3 of this proclamation, be detrimental to the interests of the United States.

I therefore hereby proclaim that:

Section 1. The entry into the United States, as immigrants or nonimmigrants, of the following aliens is hereby suspended:

(a) Senior government officials -- defined as the heads of ministries or agencies and officials occupying positions within the two bureaucratic levels below those top positions -- responsible for domestic law enforcement, justice, or labor affairs who have impeded their governments' antitrafficking efforts, have failed to implement their governments' antitrafficking laws and policies, or who otherwise bear responsibility for their governments' failures to take steps recognized internationally as appropriate to combat trafficking in persons, and who are members of governments for which I have made a determination pursuant to section 110(d)(1)-(2) or (4) of the Act, in the current year and at least once in the preceding 3 years;

(b) The spouses of persons described in subsection (a) of this section.

Sec. 2. Section 1 of this proclamation shall not apply with respect to any person otherwise covered by section 1 where entry of such person would not be contrary to the interest of the United States.

Sec. 3. Persons covered by sections 1 or 2 of this proclamation shall be identified by the Secretary of State or the Secretary's designee, in his or her sole discretion, pursuant to such procedures as the Secretary may establish under section 5 of this proclamation.

Sec. 4. Nothing in this proclamation shall be construed to derogate from United States Government obligations under applicable international agreements.

Sec. 5. The Secretary of State shall implement this proclamation pursuant to such procedures as the Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security, may establish.

Sec. 6. This proclamation is effective immediately. It shall remain in effect until such time as the Secretary of State determines that it is no longer necessary and should be terminated, either in whole or in part. Any such determination by the Secretary of State shall be published in the Federal Register.

Sec. 7. This proclamation is not intended to, and does not, create any right, benefit, or privilege, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or in equity by any party against the United States, its departments, agencies, instrumentalities, or entities, its officers or employees, or any other person.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this sixteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord two thousand nine, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and thirty-third.

GEORGE W. BUSH # # #

LOAD-DATE: January 16, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

404 of 404 DOCUMENTS

White House Documents and Publications

January 16, 2009

To Suspend Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Foreign Government Officials Responsible for Failing to Combat Trafficking in Persons

SECTION: WHITE HOUSE PRESS RELEASES

LENGTH: 776 words

To Suspend Entry as Immigrants and Nonimmigrants of Foreign Government Officials Responsible for Failing to Combat Trafficking in Persons A Proclamation by the President of the United States of America

In order to foster greater resolve to address trafficking in persons (TIP), specifically in punishing acts of trafficking and providing protections to the victims of these crimes, consistent with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, as amended (the "Act") (22 U.S.C. 7101 et seq.), it is in the interests of the United States to restrict the international travel and to suspend entry into the United States, as immigrants or nonimmigrants, of certain senior government officials responsible for domestic law enforcement, justice, or labor affairs who have impeded their governments' antitrafficking efforts, have failed to implement their governments' antitrafficking laws and policies, or who otherwise bear responsibility for their governments' failures to take steps recognized internationally as appropriate to combat trafficking in persons, and whose governments have been ranked more than once as Tier 3 countries, which represent the worst anti-TIP performers, in the Department of State's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, and for which I have made a determination pursuant to section 110(d)(1)-(2) or (4) of the Act. The Act reflects international antitrafficking standards that guide efforts to eradicate this modern-day form of slavery around the world.

NOW, THEREFORE, I, GEORGE W. BUSH, President of the United States of America, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the Constitution and the laws of the United States, including section 212(f) of the Immigration and Nationality Act of 1952, 8 U.S.C. 1182(f), and section 301 of title 3, United States Code, hereby find that the unrestricted immigrant and nonimmigrant entry into the United States of persons described in section 1 of this proclamation would, except as provided for in sections 2 and 3 of this proclamation, be detrimental to the interests of the United States.

I therefore hereby proclaim that:

Section 1. The entry into the United States, as immigrants or nonimmigrants, of the following aliens is hereby suspended:

(a) Senior government officials -- defined as the heads of ministries or agencies and officials occupying positions within the two bureaucratic levels below those top positions -- responsible for domestic law enforcement, justice, or labor affairs who have impeded their governments' antitrafficking efforts, have failed to implement their governments' antitrafficking laws and policies, or who otherwise bear responsibility for their governments' failures to take steps recognized internationally as appropriate to combat trafficking in persons, and who are members of governments for which I have made a determination pursuant to section 110(d)(1)-(2) or (4) of the Act, in the current year and at least once in the preceding 3 years;

(b) The spouses of persons described in subsection (a) of this section.

Sec. 2. Section 1 of this proclamation shall not apply with respect to any person otherwise covered by section 1 where entry of such person would not be contrary to the interest of the United States.

Sec. 3. Persons covered by sections 1 or 2 of this proclamation shall be identified by the Secretary of State or the Secretary's designee, in his or her sole discretion, pursuant to such procedures as the Secretary may establish under section 5 of this proclamation.

Sec. 4. Nothing in this proclamation shall be construed to derogate from United States Government obligations under applicable international agreements.

Sec. 5. The Secretary of State shall implement this proclamation pursuant to such procedures as the Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of Homeland Security, may establish.

Sec. 6. This proclamation is effective immediately. It shall remain in effect until such time as the Secretary of State determines that it is no longer necessary and should be terminated, either in whole or in part. Any such determination by the Secretary of State shall be published in the Federal Register.

Sec. 7. This proclamation is not intended to, and does not, create any right, benefit, or privilege, substantive or procedural, enforceable at law or in equity by any party against the United States, its departments, agencies, instrumentalities, or entities, its officers or employees, or any other person.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand this sixteenth day of January, in the year of our Lord two thousand nine, and of the Independence of the United States of America the two hundred and thirty-third.

GEORGE W. BUSH

LOAD-DATE: January 16, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

JOURNAL-CODE: WP

1 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
 Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

December 28, 2008 Sunday

Guyanese paper slams "fake report" by USA on human trafficking

LENGTH: 686 words

Text of report by Guyanese newspaper Starbroek News website on 23 December

[Editorial: "Dangerous Delusions"]

How many reports on trafficking in persons does this country need? Apparently annoyed by the uncomfortable comments contained in the United State's Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons annual Trafficking in Persons Report, Guyana's Ministerial Task Force on Trafficking in Persons simply decided to write its own anodyne version. Does having two contradictory reports improve public safety?

Released on June 4, 2008, the USA report stated soberly that "Guyana is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour... Amerindian girls are trafficked to brothels near the mining camps and to coastal areas for sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. Young Amerindian men are exploited under forced labour conditions in mining and logging camps."

More seriously, the USA report added "The Government of Guyana does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, however, it is making significant efforts to do so. While the government has undertaken a commendable initiative to increase public awareness of the dangers of human trafficking through a nationwide outreach campaign and advertising of its anti-trafficking hotline, Guyana is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for a second consecutive year for failing to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking, particularly in the area of law enforcement actions against trafficking offenders."

This unflattering US report was a rebuke to the administration and a blemish on its reputation. But it is delusional to disregard it because it is unfavourable. Rather than correct the specific problems that the report identified, the administration simply wrote its own vacuous version. Presented on July 28, 2008 and launched on December 1, the local report for the year 2007 aimed less at collecting fresh evidence than at contradicting the US report's findings.

Minister of Home Affairs Clement Rohee, Chairman of the task force, said that the local report was born out of a desire to present to citizens a "factual and authentic" picture of the nature and magnitude of trafficking in persons in Guyana. "Too often we have external agencies of the donor community compiling reports on various phenomena in our country as if we Guyanese do not have the capacity and objectivity to compile such reports on our own," he said. Even former President Mrs Janet Jagan criticised the local media for publishing foreign reports that, she wrote, are "frequently false, malicious or just produced by persons or groups that know little about Guyana, pick up bits and pieces of information that are not researched, put them together and issue so-called reports."

To no one's surprise, the sanitised local report determined that trafficking in persons was "not a major problem," finding only 10 reported cases of persons "presumed to be trafficked" in all of Regions 1, 2, 3, 4, and 9 for an entire year. The local report oddly omits references to Regions 7 and 8 where many mining and logging camps are located. This report masks the realities of activities in the 'E & F' hinterland divisions where, owing to the vast size of the area and the small number of policemen, trafficking in persons is hugely underreported and, perhaps, undiscovered.

Self congratulation does not solve crime. It is a dangerous delusion to believe that a spurious report can airbrush underlying social and economic problems -particularly youth unemployment in Amerindian villages -and their consequences out of hinterland actuality.

Rather than writing fake reports, the administration should intensify anti-trafficking training for police and magistrates; increase its efforts to employ more efficient law enforcement techniques; improve policing in 'E & F' divisions; investigate and convict offenders; and enhance assistance for victims of trafficking.

Source: Starbroek News website, Georgetown, in English 23 Dec 03

LOAD-DATE: December 28, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

2 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

December 23, 2008 Tuesday

GROUNDBREAKING HUMAN TRAFFICKING LEGISLATION SIGNED INTO LAW

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 378 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New York Rep. Carolyn Maloney:

Congresswoman Carolyn B. Maloney (D-NY), co-chair of the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus, applauded President Bush today for signing into law H.R. 7311, the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act. H.R. 7311 is historic legislation that will combat human trafficking in the United States and around the world.

Thousands of human trafficking victims are being held in often deplorable conditions in cities and towns throughout America. Let there be no mistake: human trafficking is modern-day slavery, Maloney said. The bipartisan Wilberforce Act will dramatically strengthen our efforts to fight human trafficking, giving prosecutors the tools they need to hold traffickers accountable and providing a helping hand to victims, as well.

H.R. 7311 increases penalties against traffickers; expands protections for trafficking victims and their families; requires the Department of Justice to develop a new model state-level law focusing on a more comprehensive approach to investigating and prosecuting human trafficking; authorizes increased assistance for all victims of trafficking, including U.S. citizens; ensures that countries do not park on the State Departments Tier II Watch List; and establishes a presidential award for extraordinary anti-trafficking efforts.

###

BACKGROUND: Congresswoman Maloney is an original cosponsor of H.R. 3887, the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, which passed the House overwhelmingly in December 2007. She has worked to combat sex trafficking internationally, nationally, and in her New York City district for the past seven years. Maloney urged state and federal prosecutors to investigate Queens-based Big Apple Oriental Tours and other sex tour operators for criminal violations. She is a strong supporter of federal legislation to strengthen the ability of the government to prosecute sex tour operators.

In 2006, a landmark law to make the United States a leader in combating the worldwide affliction of sex trafficking was enacted. That law incorporated key provisions of the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act championed by Maloney and Congresswoman Deborah Pryce (R-OH).

LOAD-DATE: January 15, 2009LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

3 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

December 12, 2008 Friday

MALONEY HAILS PASSAGE OF CRITICAL HUMAN TRAFFICKING LEGISLATION

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 391 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New York Rep. Carolyn Maloney:

Congresswoman Carolyn B. Maloney (D-NY), co-chair of the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus, applauded Wednesday's passage in both the House and Senate of H.R. 7311, the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act. H.R. 7311, which will be sent to the President for his signature, is ground-breaking legislation that will combat human trafficking in the United States and around the world.

H.R. 7311 increases penalties against traffickers, expands protections for trafficking victims and their families, requires the Department of Justice to develop a new model state-level law focusing on a more comprehensive approach to investigating and prosecuting human trafficking, authorizes increased assistance for all victims of trafficking including U.S. citizens, ensures that countries do not park on the State Departments Tier II Watch List, and establishes a Presidential award for extraordinary anti-trafficking efforts.

The House and Senate have again shown our commitment to ending this form of modern-day slavery by passing this important legislation, Maloney said. I want to commend Chairman Berman, Chairman Conyers, Chairman Bobby Scott, Vice-President-elect Biden, Senator Brownback, my colleagues in the Human Trafficking Caucus, their staffs, and the anti-trafficking coalition for their support and their heartfelt commitment to this issue.

###

BACKGROUND: Congresswoman Maloney is an original cosponsor of H.R. 3887, the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act, which passed the House overwhelmingly in December 2007. She has worked to combat sex trafficking internationally, nationally, and in her New York City district for the past seven years. Maloney urged state and federal prosecutors to investigate Queens-based Big Apple Oriental Tours and other sex tour operators for criminal violations. She is a strong supporter of federal legislation to strengthen the ability of the government to prosecute sex tour operators.

In 2006, a landmark law to make the United States a leader in combating the worldwide affliction of sex trafficking was enacted. That law incorporated key provisions of the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act championed by Maloney and Congresswoman Deborah Pryce (R-OH).

LOAD-DATE: December 12, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

4 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

December 12, 2008 Friday 12:20 AM EST

REP. MALONEY HAILS PASSAGE OF CRITICAL HUMAN TRAFFICKING LEGISLATION

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 250 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, D-N.Y. (14th CD), issued the following news release:

Congresswoman Carolyn B. Maloney (D-NY), co-chair of the Congressional Human Trafficking Caucus, applauded Wednesday's passage in both the House and Senate of H.R. 7311, the "William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act." H.R. 7311, which will be sent to the President for his signature, is ground-breaking legislation that will combat human trafficking in the United States and around the world.

H.R. 7311 increases penalties against traffickers, expands protections for trafficking victims and their families, requires the Department of Justice to develop a new model state-level law focusing on a more comprehensive approach to investigating and prosecuting human trafficking, authorizes increased assistance for all victims of trafficking including U.S. citizens, ensures that countries do not "park" on the State Department's Tier II Watch List, and establishes a Presidential award for extraordinary anti-trafficking efforts.

"The House and Senate have again shown our commitment to ending this form of modern-day slavery by passing this important legislation," Maloney said. "I want to commend Chairman Berman, Chairman Conyers, Chairman Bobby Scott, Vice-President-elect Biden, Senator Brownback, my colleagues in the Human Trafficking Caucus, their staffs, and the anti-trafficking coalition for their support and their heartfelt commitment to this issue."

Contact: Jon Houston, 202/225-7944.

LOAD-DATE: December 13, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

5 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Fox News Network

December 1, 2008 MondaySHOW: FOX ON THE RECORD WITH GRETA VAN SUSTEREN 10:50 PM EST

Interview With Ambassador Mark Lagon

BYLINE: Greta Van SusterenGUESTS: Mark LagonSECTION: NEWS; DomesticLENGTH: 972 words

VAN SUSTEREN: This is a Fox News alert. There is more terror in India. According to the Associated Press an Indian official says a bomb blast on a train has killed two people and wounded 30 in the country's northeast region.

We have very few details at this hour.

Joran Van Der Sloot told us "On the Record" that he sold Natalee Holloway for $10,000. Now Van Der Sloot says he was lying to us and made up the story.

Lie or no lie, it is a fact that human trafficking is an international crisis. Bigger numbers of people are sold for labor and sex and just plain cruelty.

Moments ago we spoke to Ambassador Mark Lagon, Secretary of State Rice's global advisor for fighting human trafficking.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

VAN SUSTEREN: Ambassador, thank you very much for agreeing to sit down and talk with us.

AMBASSADOR MARK LAGON, SENIOR ADVISOR TO SECRETARY OF STATE: Great being with you.

VAN SUSTEREN: Ambassador, I'm not going to ask you about to be Natalee Holloway case. While we have been seeking to prove or disprove what happened to her, one of the things that has come to our attention is the enormity of the problem with human trafficking. And this is your job.

LAGON: It is. I head the office in the State Department to fight this problem of sex trafficking and forced labor, working with other countries.

VAN SUSTEREN: I was reading some of your materials--across borders over 800,000 people a year or more.

LAGON: If you look at trafficking within borders, it's millions, and across borders we think it's at least 800,000 people a year, many of them for sexual exploitation. We think a good 80 percent of them are females who are the victims.

VAN SUSTEREN: Is this a problem that, say, in the last five years is growing or is decreasing?

LAGON: I think it is growing. But we certainly are more aware of this problem. Nations around the world are beginning to put in place laws and only starting to effectively prosecute the bad guys.

VAN SUSTEREN: It's worldwide?

LAGON: Yes.

VAN SUSTEREN: Our attention has been focused more on the South American and Caribbean area. You have given me this map. Tell me in this Aruba, Venezuela, Caribbean area, what has our state department determined?

LAGON: In the Caribbean, you see a lot of transit of human trafficking victims, a lot of them for sexual exploitation. In the region of Latin America there has been increased focus on children and prostitution, but not enough of people who are adults.

And there's a problem in the region, including where there is legal prostitution, where there are being a magnet for sex trafficking.

Venezuela had for three years in a row the lowest ranking in our annual global report on its record on fighting human trafficking until last year, and then it moved up to the second lowest category of the watchlist.

VAN SUSTEREN: Is there any record or history of actual trafficking through Aruba?

LAGON: There is. Aruba, being small, is not ranked in our report, but there are cases. Admittedly, much of the pattern seems to be going to Aruba. But it is quite conceivable that trafficking from Aruba is possible.

VAN SUSTEREN: In Aruba, do you find that the policemen are willing to look at the problem? Are they honest, thorough, good, or does our state department have any problem with the law enforcement in Aruba?

LAGON: I am not in a position to give a really good assessment of that. But it is a region in which, in Latin America, corruption and lack of efficacy and law-enforcement is serious.

VAN SUSTEREN: We have some been dealing with the Natalee Holloway case, and you are not part of this investigation, but we have some information that we would like them to look at. But there is an unwillingness to even look at what we have. Do you find that unusual?

LAGON: Everyone should be open to the opportunity to look at evidence, because the possibility of trafficking in this region is serious.

VAN SUSTEREN: What do these women say, and I don't know if you have ever spoken to them or talked to people who have been the victim of trafficking-everyone says why don't you just walk away? I have talked to them, and I know what-but what to do here?

LAGON: The definition of human trafficking by law and under U.N. treaties involved force, fraud, and coercion.

In general prostitution, there is a lot of violence and manipulation by pimps. And in the situation of the human trafficking it is terribly acute.

Oftentimes people are kept in a brothel and cannot leave. They are living and being exploited in the same place. Their traffickers get them into debt. They make them afraid that if they run they will only be treated like a criminal.

VAN SUSTEREN: I take it then that you are not dismissive of the possibility that this could have happened to Natalee Holloway?

LAGON: I'm not. The flow of human trafficking through this region is significant. Rule of law is lacking. Where there are even laws, like in Aruba, they are not well implemented. It is quite possible that this is happening on a significant scale. So you really can't reject out of hand that idea.

VAN SUSTEREN: Ambassador, thank you.

LAGON: Pleasure.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

VAN SUSTEREN: Our entire interview with the ambassador will be posted on gretawire.com tomorrow.

And up next, the results of your live vote--do you think former President Clinton would be a good choice to serve out his wife's Senate term? Go to Gretawire.com and tell us--vote.

VAN SUSTEREN: Senator Hillary Clinton has been tapped to be our next Secretary of State. That leaves a vacant U.S. Senate seat for the state of New York.

You went to gretawire.com and answered this poll question--do you think former President Bill Clinton would be a good choice to serve out his wife's Senate term? 19 percent said yes, 81 percent said no. Thank you voting.

Thank you for watching and being with us. "The O'Reilly Factor" is next. Goodnight from Washington.

LOAD-DATE: December 2, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TRANSCRIPT: 120104cb.260

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Show

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 Fox News Network, LLC.

6 of 445 DOCUMENTS

UPI

November 26, 2008 Wednesday 2:17 PM EST

Analysis: Berlin a Russian mafia hub

BYLINE: STEFAN NICOLA

LENGTH: 629 words

DATELINE: BERLIN, Nov. 26

Berlin has become a European hub for the Russian mafia, according to security experts in the German capital.

If you own a BMW X5 or a Porsche Cayenne, you shouldn't park it in the streets of Berlin too often, because these fancy SUVs top the list from which the Russian mafia is "shopping" in Germany's capital. The criminals cruise the rich neighborhoods until they find their car of choice, then open, short-circuit and load it onto a truck -- in less than two minutes. Chances are the owners won't see their cars again.

"Such vehicles are brought into nearby body shops, where they are tuned or taken apart completely," Bernd Finger, the head of the Berlin Criminal Office, said earlier this month in an interview with the Sueddeutsche Zeitung newspaper. "From there they are taken to intermediate traders in Lithuania, Poland, Czech Republic, Slovenia. And from there they are taken into the buyer's country, most often Russia or Asia."

Finger is Berlin's chief anti-mafia czar, and he raised eyebrows when he recently revealed that Berlin, along with London and New York, has turned into a hub for the Russian mafia.

"We're in the center between east and west," he told the Sueddeutsche Zeitung. "You can get stolen goods to Poland within an hour, and the anonymity of a metropolis with 3.4 million people enables ethnic compartmentalization. The members stay among themselves, and thus undisturbed."

He later told the Tagesspiegel newspaper that Berlin in 2007 saw 68 organized crime cases with more than 1,000 individual crimes. Because of ongoing investigations, Finger didn't want to comment on how many members the Russian mafia has permanently stationed in Berlin.

Unlike the Mafia from Italy, Russian organized crime is not based on local or family structures, he said, but on professional strategic alliances that operate globally.

"It's all about making a lot of money very quickly," Finger said.

The organized car thefts are only the lowest in a three-tier structure the Russian mafia has established in Berlin, officials say. The Russian mafia's activities also include the middle league, such as prostitution or human trafficking, and the top league -- money laundering. Berlin for these crimes serves as an intermediate hub between Europe and the rest of the world, said Finger, who has also had to investigate targeted killings and racketeering.

So what do these guys look like? Big SUVs, tattoos, ordering several Dom Perignon bottles at once -- that holds true only for the midlevel gangsters, the henchmen, Finger said.

The really dangerous guys are eager not to make waves, and most often they are wearing expensive watches and business suits instead of gold chains and baggy pants.

&"They work as economic experts in international companies, and move, in a matter of seconds, millions (of euros) that are tainted with the blood of the innocent. These are the guys we have to take care of.&"

The Berlin police also advise German politicians, because the Russian mafia in the past has tried to influence their decision-making.

&"You won't believe it, but many politicians like to experience this sort of excitement that comes when you encounter the criminal milieu,&" he said, adding that organized crime is increasingly trying to influence how government money is spent.

Spending money the right way -- the German Police Union feels that has not happened when it comes to fighting organized crime.

&"It doesn't seem to be the political wish to do more&" against the mafia, Konrad Freiberg, head of the police union, told the Berliner Zeitung newspaper a few days after the Finger interview. He said the German states needs to dish out more money to improve police equipment.

LOAD-DATE: November 27, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved

November 16, 2008 Sunday

Illegal recruiters on 'watchlist'

LENGTH: 398 words

Manila: As part the government's new measures against human trafficking, the Bureau of Immigration announced that it will place illegal recruiters, as well as their victims, in its "watchlist," of suspected offenders.

Commissioner Marcelino Libanan of the Bureau of Immigrations (BI) said personnel at all ports of exit in the country will be furnished a watchlist of persons suspected to have been involved in human smuggling.

"They will remain in the watchlist until they can show substantive and convincing proof that they are not involved in illegal recruitment and human trafficking," he said. While particularly focused on monitoring the movements of human traffickers, the watchlist will also include victims, because he said that most often than not, human traffickers and illegal recruiters travel with their prey. "Suspected illegal recruiters and their victims caught attempting to leave the country will now be placed in the watchlist as part of the agency's intensified campaign to stop the trafficking and exit of undocumented overseas Filipino workers," he said.

He added that the guideline will be enforced at the Ninoy Aquino International Airport (NAIA) in Manila and other ports of exit.

According to Libanan, passengers will be photographed and that the circumstances and reasons for their being taken off from a particular flight be recorded for future references.

Libanan said the BI adopted the tougher policy to discourage Filipinos wishing to work abroad from falling prey to the schemes of syndicates engaged in the illegal recruitment and deployment of undocumented workers abroad.

He added the immigrations bureau will continue to strictly monitor departing passengers to make sure that those who leave for overseas jobs are properly documented and registered with the Philippine Overseas Employment Administration (POEA).

Statistics showed that nearly 400 Filipinos were barred from leaving the country from January to September this year.

Labour workers in Iraq

The Philippines labour secretary says the country has no immediate plan to lift a ban on its citizens working in Iraq.

His comments come after a plea from an Iraqi diplomat for more foreign labourers to help with the war-torn country's reconstruction. Labour Secretary Marianito Roque said on Friday there would be no deployment of Filipino workers pending an assessment of the security situation in Iraq.

- AP

LOAD-DATE: November 17, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 57

Copyright 2008 Gulf News - Al Nisr Publishing LLC.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

8 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Gulf Daily News

November 13, 2008

Justice vowed for expatriates

BYLINE: By SOMAN BABY

LENGTH: 377 words

BAHRAIN's national committee to combat human trafficking is expanding its activities to take care of expatriate workers in distress, it was revealed yesterday.

The committee will make every effort to ensure expat workers are treated in Bahrain with dignity, said its chairman Shaikh Abdul Aziz bin Mubarak Al Khalifa.

"The committee has representatives from various ministries, including Interior, Labour, Justice, Information and Foreign Affairs," he told the GDN.

"This helps us to forward complaints from workers directly to the ministries or departments.

Cases of sponsors harassing the workers will be taken up with the Interior Ministry and non-payment of salary will be brought to the notice of the Labour Ministry, said Shaikh Abdul Aziz, who is also the Foreign Ministry assistant under-secretary.

"The committee now meets once a month," he added.

"An awareness campaign will be strengthened with the support of the Information Ministry and will include leaflets in different languages highlighting workers' rights.

"It will also advise on sponsors how to treat their workers with dignity."

The committee had so far received very few complaints, said Shaikh Abdul Aziz.

"One of the complaints was from the Thai Embassy relating to forced prostitution involving their nationals," he revealed.

"Some complaints on workers being exploited were received from the Indian and Filipino embassies.

"We have taken them up with authorities for immediate action."

Shaikh Abdul Aziz said his committee would expand its activities in the new year to help workers in distress and stop all forms of human trafficking in Bahrain.

The US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report rated Bahrain earlier this year in the Tier 2 category based on its "significant efforts" to address trafficking and on future pledges.

It urged Bahrain to stop deporting victims of human trafficking and set up a shelter to provide them with medical and psychological care.

The US State Department is required by law to submit an annual report each year to Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of human trafficking.

The aim is to raise global awareness as well as highlight and encourage efforts by the international community to combat the problem.

soman@gdn.com.bh

LOAD-DATE: November 13, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 5

Copyright 2008 Gulf Daily News - Hilal Publishing and Marketing Group.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

9 of 445 DOCUMENTS

TradeArabia (Bahrain)

November 13, 2008 Thursday

Justice vowed for expatriates

BYLINE: Manama

LENGTH: 394 words

(Category: Government, Laws & Statutes)

(Image: expats.gif)

Bahrain's national committee to combat human trafficking is expanding its activities to take care of expatriate workers in distress, it was revealed yesterday.

The committee will make every effort to ensure expat workers are treated in Bahrain with dignity, said its chairman Shaikh Abdul Aziz bin Mubarak Al Khalifa.

'The committee has representatives from various ministries, including Interior, Labour, Justice, Information and Foreign Affairs,' he told the Gulf Daily News, our sister newspaper.

'This helps us to forward complaints from workers directly to the ministries or departments.

Cases of sponsors harassing the workers will be taken up with the Interior Ministry and non-payment of salary will be brought to the notice of the Labour Ministry, said Shaikh Abdul Aziz, who is also the Foreign Ministry assistant under-secretary.

'The committee now meets once a month,' he added.

'An awareness campaign will be strengthened with the support of the Information Ministry and will include leaflets in different languages highlighting workers' rights.

'It will also advise sponsors on how to treat their workers with dignity.'

The committee had so far received very few complaints, said Shaikh Abdul Aziz.

'One of the complaints was from the Thai Embassy relating to forced prostitution involving their nationals,' he revealed.

'Some complaints on workers being exploited were received from the Indian and Filipino embassies.

'We have taken them up with authorities for immediate action.'

Shaikh Abdul Aziz said his committee would expand its activities in the new year to help workers in distress and stop all forms of human trafficking in Bahrain.

The US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report rated Bahrain earlier this year in the Tier 2 category based on its 'significant efforts' to address trafficking and on future pledges.

It urged Bahrain to stop deporting victims of human trafficking and set up a shelter to provide them with medical and psychological care.

The US State Department is required by law to submit an annual report each year to Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of human trafficking.

The aim is to raise global awareness as well as highlight and encourage efforts by the international community to combat the problem.-TradeArabia News Service

LOAD-DATE: November 14, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

JOURNAL-CODE: 6

Copyright 2008 TradeArabia - Hilal Publishing and Marketing Group.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

10 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Business Day (South Africa)

November 08, 2008
The Weekender Edition

Human trafficking may escalate ahead of 2010 World Cup - report

BYLINE: MLUNGISI ZONDI

SECTION: CRIME, LAW & JUSTICE; Pg. 4

LENGTH: 453 words

Human trafficking may escalate ahead of 2010 World Cup - report

A NEW study has raised fears of an escalation in human trafficking in SA for commercial sexual exploitation during the Soccer World Cup, when thousands of tourists are expected to flood the country.

The report's findings are in contrast to the traditional forced migration of women and children, a cross-border phenomenon predominantly involving syndicates that recruit Zimbabwean, Mozambican and Asian nationals to work in SA.

The International Organisation for Migration's report identifies SA's unique sociopolitical history, stark economic inequalities, gender-based violence, and HIV/AIDS as factors that place women and children at risk of human trafficking. It also identifies traditional beliefs involving muti, lobolo and child placement as risks.

So dire is the situation that the US state department this year put SA on its watch list for the fourth consecutive year for its inability to meet the minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking.

"Data collected shows internal trafficking victims are generally recruited from regions of lower socioeconomic status, in provinces such as Mpumalanga, Limpopo, Northern Cape and Eastern Cape, as well as informal settlements or rural areas of Western Cape, Free State and Gauteng," the study says.

Child-headed households are most vulnerable to recruitment for commercial sexual exploitation.

"Respondents most often mentioned Johannesburg as a destination, followed by Durban and Cape Town", the study found. They are often transported there by minibus taxi, with the fare paid for by the recruiter.

Victims are controlled through intimidation, threats and use of force, while their movement is restricted. Often, they are required to repay their transport "debts".

"Drugs and alcohol are often cited as a means of control, particularly in situations related to commercial sexual exploitation," the report says.

The victims are mostly black, female and under the age of 20. They are often recruited with the offer of a job, through an ad in a newspaper or through a friend or acquaintance.

"The upcoming Fifa World Cup in 2010 has sparked specific concerns around internal and cross-border trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation," the report says.

Despite having ratified the United Nations Palermo Protocol, which obligates signatories to address trafficking as a crime, SA does not have comprehensive laws addressing the issue. The International Organisation for Migration says despite provisions under various laws "vaguely referring to child welfare and sexual offences" used in prosecution, SA's conviction rates are low.

Offenders generally receive minimal sentencing, often just a fine.

LOAD-DATE: November 8, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 BDFM Publishers PTY Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

11 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Weekender (South Africa)

November 8, 2008
The Weekender Edition

Human trafficking may escalate ahead of 2010 World Cup - report

BYLINE: Mlungisi Zondi

SECTION: CRIME, LAW & JUSTICE; Pg. 4

LENGTH: 455 words

Human trafficking may escalate ahead of 2010 World Cup - report

A NEW study has raised fears of an escalation in human trafficking in SA for commercial sexual exploitation during the Soccer World Cup, when thousands of tourists are expected to flood the country.

The report's findings are in contrast to the traditional forced migration of women and children, a cross-border phenomenon predominantly involving syndicates that recruit Zimbabwean, Mozambican and Asian nationals to work in SA.

The International Organisation for Migration's report identifies SA's unique sociopolitical history, stark economic inequalities, gender-based violence, and HIV/AIDS as factors that place women and children at risk of human trafficking. It also identifies traditional beliefs involving muthi, lobolo and child placement as risks.

So dire is the situation that the US state department this year put SA on its watch list for the fourth consecutive year for its inability to meet the minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking.

"Data collected shows internal trafficking victims are generally recruited from regions of lower socioeconomic status, in provinces such as Mpumalanga, Limpopo, Northern Cape and Eastern Cape, as well as informal settlements or rural areas of Western Cape, Free State and Gauteng," the study says.

Child-headed households are most vulnerable to recruitment for commercial sexual exploitation.

"Respondents most often mentioned Johannesburg as a destination, followed by Durban and Cape Town", the study found. They are often transported there by minibus taxi, with the fare paid for by the recruiter.

Victims are controlled through intimidation, threats and use of force, while their movement is restricted. Often, they are required to repay their transport "debts".

"Drugs and alcohol are often cited as a means of control, particularly in situations related to commercial sexual exploitation," the report says.

The victims are mostly black, female and under the age of 20. They are often recruited with the offer of a job, through an ad in a newspaper or through a friend or acquaintance.

"The upcoming Fifa World Cup in 2010 has sparked specific concerns around internal and cross-border trafficking for the purposes of sexual exploitation," the report says.

Despite having ratified the United Nations Palermo Protocol, which obligates signatories to address trafficking as a crime, SA does not have comprehensive laws addressing the issue. The International Organisation for Migration says despite provisions under various laws "vaguely referring to child welfare and sexual offences" used in prosecution, SA's conviction rates are low.

Offenders generally receive minimal sentencing, often just a fine.

LOAD-DATE: January 21, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: BD

Copyright 2008 BDFM Publishers PTY Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

12 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

November 4, 2008 Tuesday

OMA blacklists 15 pilgrim guides for human trafficking

BYLINE: By Julmunir I. Jannaral

LENGTH: 628 words

COTABATO CITY: The Office on Muslim Affairs (OMA) has totally banned at least 15 sheikhs or pilgrim guides from transacting business with OMA regarding hajj or the annual pilgrimage to Makkah, Kingdom of Saudi Arabia on suspicion of their involvement in human trafficking to the Middle East in the guise of performing the minor hajj known as umrah.

Undersecretary Datu Ali Sangki, the OMA executive director, on Monday told The Manila Times that as a result of his drastic action in banning whom he described as "recalcitrant sheikhs," his leadership as Muslim affairs chief is now the subject of a demolition job by people who would want to get back at him.

Sangki said the 15 sheikhs including one from this city who are now blacklisted even went to the extent of using the "padrino system" to restore their accreditation with the OMA. In particular, he cited Lanao del Sur Rep. Pangalian Balindong whom these sheikhs have tapped to get back at the OMA.

He said Balindong was totally misled by the sheikhs to fight for their cause and to raise an issue against him in his capacity as OMA chief. At least of the 15 blacklisted sheikhs, five come from the home province of Balindong in Lanao del Sur, namely Sheikh Abduljalil Mauna with 10 jamaah or wards that illegally stayed behind in Saudi Arabia; Sheikh Basaroden Maruhom, 2 wards; Sheikh Abdulmojib Dipatuan, 2 wards; Sheikh Mohammad Abdulmajid, 7 wards; and Sheikh Mustapha Abdullah, 1 ward.

The Muslim affairs chief said the case actually stemmed from the act of conspiracy of the 15 sheikhs with five of them identified above in allowing their jamaah (wards) numbering around 100 who performed the recent umrah to stay illegally behind in Saudi Arabia even after they have already performed their minor pilgrimage.

Sangki also identified one of the accused pilgrim guides as Sheikh Manson Kusin who is in-charge as a pilgrim guide for Region 12-A, particularly Cotabato City, who abandoned his 16 wards in Saudi Arabia and returned alone to Manila even before the religious rite could start. "This is tantamount to human trafficking which the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia just like any other country strictly prohibits," Sangki said.

Weng Danial, a native of Tandubas, Tawi-Tawi who is has been an OMA employee for more than 20 years already had observed that the "iron fist" policy now implemented by Sangki is just appropriate for the misdemeanors of these sheikhs. "This should have been done by previous Muslim affairs executive directors," Danial said.

In his stern memorandum regarding the violation committed by the sheikhs, Sangki wrote: "In view of their violation of the terms and conditions set forth in the Sheikh Accreditation as contained in the Office Order No. 0237 dated July 1, 2008, particularly the Affidavit of Undertaking executive by Sheikhs with the Office on Muslim Affairs, the...Sheikhs are hereby advised to cease and desist from recruiting Jamaah/s and further instructed to exhaust all means to repatriate their over staying Jamaah/s [pilgrim wards] in the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia."

Sangki said the sheikhs and their pilgrim wards have in effect violated the Saudi government immigration laws and the Saudi Ministry of Hajj Rules and Regulations which binds the OMA to comply with.

As this developed, Sangki said he appealed to all Muslim lawmakers and his fellow Muslims for their kind understanding in his move to cleanse and bring reforms to OMA especially the Bureau of Pilgrimage and Endowment (BPE) which has been a source of intrigues or controversy in past administration.

He said he handpicked Hadji Soekarno "Bong" Mohammad of Tubig Indangan, Simunul, Tawi-Tawi as officer-in-charge of BPE in order to bring about the much needed reforms in the pilgrimage program of the country.

LOAD-DATE: January 16, 2009

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 News Bites Pty Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

Global News Bites

13 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

October 20, 2008 Monday 1:35 AM EST

PRESIDENTIAL DETERMINATION WITH RESPECT TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS' EFFORTS REGARDING TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 5578 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the following news release: Consistent with section 110 of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (Division A of Public Law 106-386), as amended, (the "Act"), I hereby:

* Make the determination provided in section 110(d)(1)(A)(i) of the Act, with respect to Burma, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), and Syria, not to provide certain funding for those countries' governments for Fiscal Year 2009, until such government complies with the minimum standards or makes significant efforts to bring itself into compliance, as may be determined by the Secretary of State in a report to the Congress pursuant to section 110(b) of the Act;

* Make the determination provided in section 110(d)(1)(A)(ii) of the Act, with respect to Cuba and Iran not to provide certain funding for those countries' governments for Fiscal Year 2009, until such government complies with the minimum standards or makes significant efforts to bring itself into compliance, as may be determined by the Secretary of State in a report to the Congress pursuant to section 110(b) of the Act;

* Make the determination provided in section 110(d)(3) of the Act, concerning the determination of the Secretary of State with respect to Moldova and Oman;

* Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Algeria, Fiji, Kuwait, Papua New Guinea, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, and Sudan, that provision to these countries' governments of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

* Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to the DPRK, that a partial waiver to allow funding for programs described in section 110(d)(1)(A)(i) of the Act that support the goals of the Six-Party talks would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States; and

* Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Iran, that a partial waiver to allow funding for educational and cultural exchange programs described in section 110(d)(1)(A)(ii) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

You are hereby authorized and directed to submit this determination and the certification required by section 110(e) of the Act to the Congress and to publish this determination in the Federal Register.

GEORGE W. BUSH

Memorandum of Justification Consistent With the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, Regarding Determinations With Respect to "Tier 3" Countries

The President has made determinations regarding the 14 countries placed on Tier 3 of the State Department's 2008 annual Report on Trafficking in Persons. The President has determined to sanction Burma, Cuba, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), Iran, and Syria. The United States will not provide funding for participation by officials or employees of the Government of Cuba in educational and cultural exchange programs until such government complies with the Act's minimum standards to combat trafficking or makes significant efforts to do so. The United States will not provide certain non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance to the Governments of Burma or Syria until such government complies with the Act's minimum standards to combat trafficking or makes significant efforts to do so. Furthermore, the President determined, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, that provision of certain assistance to the Governments of the DPRK and Iran would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. The President also determined, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, that provision of all bilateral and multilateral assistance to Algeria, Fiji, Kuwait, Papua New Guinea, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, and Sudan that otherwise would have been cut off would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

The determinations also indicate the Secretary of State's subsequent compliance determinations regarding Moldova and Oman. It is significant that 2 of the 14 Tier 3 countries took actions that averted the need for the President to make a determination regarding sanctions and waivers. Information highlighted in the Trafficking in Persons Report and the possibility of sanctions, in conjunction with our diplomatic efforts, encouraged these countries' governments to take important measures against trafficking.

Section 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act interferes with the President's authority to direct foreign affairs. We, therefore, interpret it as precatory. Nonetheless, it is the policy of the United States that, consistent with the provisions of the Act, the U.S. Executive Director of each multilateral development bank, as defined in the Act, and of the International Monetary Fund will vote against, and use the Executive Director's best efforts to deny any loan or other utilization of the funds of the respective institution to the Governments of Burma, Cuba, the DPRK, Iran, and Syria for Fiscal Year 2009, until such a government complies with the minimum standards or makes significant efforts to bring itself into compliance, as may be determined by the Secretary of State in a report to the Congress pursuant to section 110(b) of the Act.

Explanations of the President's determinations regarding each of the 14 countries follow.

Moldova On the basis of positive actions undertaken by the Government of Moldova since March 2008, the Secretary of State has determined that the Government of Moldova does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. This is the standard for placement on Tier 2 of the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The Secretary of State has placed Moldova on the Special Watch List because the determination that the Government of Moldova is making significant efforts is based, in part, on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

In June 2008, the Government of Moldova was presented with an action plan by the State Department that outlined steps to combat trafficking. Since that time, it has accomplished each of the items in the Department's action plan or made commitments to take additional future steps over the next year, thus demonstrating "significant efforts." These efforts include:

Since the release of the June 2008 TIP Report, the Moldovan government has presented evidence that it is taking tangible steps to address the problem of trafficking-related complicity, the primary factor for its Tier 3 ranking in the 2008 Report. Specifically, the government acknowledged a lack of adequate efforts to prosecute officials reportedly complicit in trafficking, and in June 2008, it re-opened investigations into high profile allegations of such complicity that had been previously dismissed without transparency. Furthermore, the government opened several new investigations of alleged trafficking complicity of law enforcement officials. In addition, since its Tier 3 placement, the Government of Moldova has: made high-level public statements condemning trafficking-related complicity, drafted a code of conduct for law enforcement personnel; initiated vetting procedures for public officials involved in combating trafficking; and established an anonymous reporting mechanism for trafficking related complicity.

Since the release of the 2008 TIP Report, the Government of Moldova has taken additional measures that include: improving data collection on trafficking-related law enforcement efforts; concrete outreach to anti-trafficking NGOs; releasing funds for victim protection (marking the first time the government has provided direct funding for victim services); and enacting regulations for facilitating and funding victim repatriation.

Oman

On the basis of positive actions undertaken by the Government of Oman since March 2008, the Secretary of State has determined that the Government of Oman does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. This is the standard for placement on Tier 2 of the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The Secretary of State has placed Oman on the Special Watch List because the determination that the Government of Oman is making significant efforts is based, in part, on our expectations of additional future steps over the next year.

Since the June 2008 release of the TIP Report, the Government of Oman has adopted significant measures to prevent trafficking in persons for the purpose of forced labor by addressing abusive work conditions. Such measures include its recruitment of a total of 94 additional labor inspectors (male and female) - as well as 7 legal researchers - to strengthen enforcement of Oman labor laws and punish acts of trafficking for labor exploitation. In August, labor inspectors received training in collaboration with the International Labor Organization that, among other topics, highlighted their role in combating human trafficking and best practices against trafficking in persons. Oman's Ministry of Manpower has publicly admonished the poor performance and excessive fees charged to workers by some Omani labor recruiting firms, and it has pledged to conduct more regular inspections of their operations.

Algeria The Government of Algeria does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Algeria, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Algeria has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of trafficking of men, women, and children both within and through Algeria. The government did not prosecute any individuals for trafficking offenses, and did not train law enforcement or judicial officials on anti-trafficking measures. The government does not offer protective services to victims and did not institute a victim identification procedure to prevent the punishment or summary deportation of trafficking victims. The Government of Algeria also has not developed a public awareness campaign or other trafficking prevention programs. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Algeria, however, is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Algeria in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions: Approximately $1.3 million in security assistance, including $800,000 in International Military Education and Training (IMET), and an anticipated $4 million in MEPI assistance would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing this assistance in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. security interests. Development assistance of approximately $965,000 would have also been subject to sanction. Sanctioning this and MEPI aid would have removed United States Government tools in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Algeria.

Burma The Government of Burma does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Burma.

Justification: The Burmese military remains directly involved in forced labor, and there are reports that some children have been involuntarily conscripted into the Burmese Army for the purpose of forced labor. Although the Burmese Government has taken increased steps to combat trafficking for sexual exploitation, the significant state-sanctioned use of internal forced labor, especially by the military, continues.

Impact of Sanctions: The United States does not provide direct assistance to the Burmese government. In Fiscal Year 2008, the Government of Burma received $1.2 million in U.S. assistance through the United Nations World Health and Food and Agriculture Organizations for avian influenza preparedness and response. In response to the devastating Cyclone Nargis that hit in May 2008, the United States has provided $50 million to date in assistance to the people of Burma. Some in-kind assistance initially went through the Burmese government; however, once transportation lines were established, assistance was channeled through the United Nations and various NGOs. The United States Government provides humanitarian assistance along the Thai-Burmese border through various nongovernmental organizations, supports democracy activities both inside and outside the country, and supports the provision of services to those with or at-risk of HIV/AIDS. The United States also has supported a nongovernmental organization working in Burma to assist victims of trafficking repatriated from Thailand.

Existing sanctions on Burma include restrictions on new investment, imports, exports of financial services, bilateral assistance, and arms sales. Additionally, travel restrictions and/or financial sanctions have been imposed against senior Burmese officials and their immediate relatives, a number of state-owned enterprises, and other individuals and entities affiliated with the regime.

Cuba The Government of Cuba does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Cuba.

Justification: The Government of Cuba continues to dismiss as politically motivated requests for information on any anti-trafficking efforts it may be making. Furthermore, the Cuban government does not appear to have made tangible efforts to prosecute traffickers, identify victims, and provide victims with protections and legal aid. Cuba's state-sponsored tourism industry tacitly promotes the prostitution of children and is a draw for foreign sex tourists. The government has avoided developing a strategy to address the problem and has no discernable anti-trafficking law enforcement, victim protection, or prevention policies.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of Cuba is already subject to an extensive economic embargo tied to Cuba's poor record on, among other things, democracy, human rights, and economic reform. No Cuban Government officials or employees participate in current or planned United States Government-funded educational or cultural exchange programs. The United States Government does not offer economic assistance to the Government of Cuba and will not allow any significant new investment in Cuba by U.S. companies until democratic and economic reforms are instituted. While the embargo-related sanctions will remain in place until there are fundamental political and economic reforms in Cuba, sanctioning Cuba for activities related to trafficking in persons expresses clear U.S. disapproval of the Cuban Government's acceptance, if not endorsement, of such activities. The United States Government supports non-governmental entities under specific authorities, including Section 109 of the LIBERTAD Act of 1996, and sanctions against Cuba do not restrict these activities.

Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) The Government of the DPRK does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction the DPRK. The President has also determined that provision of funding that supports the goals of the Six-Party Talks would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of the DPRK is making no effort to address trafficking in persons. The government does not recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes forced labor conditions and other forms of severe punishment on its prisoners, including North Koreans forcibly returned from China. Further, conditions in the DPRK drive many North Koreans to seek a way out of the country, putting them at risk of becoming trafficking victims. Women who enter northern China from the DPRK may be sold as brides and trafficked for purposes of sexual exploitation. Although other U.S. measures against North Korea are in place, the President's determination indicates the strong U.S. disapproval of the DPRK Government's failure to address trafficking in persons.

Impact of Sanctions: The imposition of partial sanctions will further the national interest of the United States by allowing certain activities that promote the goals of the Six-Party Talks.

Fiji The Government of Fiji does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Fiji, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Interim Government of Fiji has taken no significant steps to address the problem of children exploited in the commercial sex trade. The Interim Government has, however, begun a positive dialogue with the United States on trafficking issues. Fiji's diminished vigilance on TIP is due in large part to the illegitimate and increasingly ineffective nature of the interim government installed after the military coup d'état in December 2006. The coup ousted a democratically-elected government and, as a result, most United States assistance to the Interim Government is restricted and will continue to be restricted until the country's constitutional democracy is restored. A full waiver of sanctions is in the U.S. national interest as it will enable the United States to offer meaningful inducements to Fiji's leaders to encourage them to restore democratic rule and to provide timely assistance to a new government once it assumes power. Thus, a second layer of sanctions would greatly complicate the United States' ability to promote democracy.

The United States Government coordinates closely its policy and sanctions on Fiji with the Pacific Island Forum (PIF), the regional organization that includes all the Pacific Island countries, Australia, and New Zealand. The explicit goal sought by the United States and its regional partners is a restoration of democracy. In 2007, Interim President Bainimarama pledged to hold elections by the end of March 2009 but reneged on this commitment in mid-2008. Immediately after his announcement, Secretary of State Rice met senior officials from the Pacific region in Samoa and urged them to remain determined to press the Interim Government to fulfill its commitment to restore democracy. A regional summit meeting in August did just that, sending a strongly-worded message to Fiji's interim leaders that urged it to hold elections on schedule or face possible expulsion from the PIF.

Impact of Sanctions: The Interim Government of Fiji is already subject to sanctions that bar bilateral assistance from the United States government. Thus, additional sanctions would not increase the pressure on Fiji's Interim Government to address its trafficking problem. The waiver enables the United States Government to more effectively promote democratic reform and human rights in Fiji.

Iran The Government of Iran does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Iran. The President has also determined that provision of funding for educational and cultural exchange programs that would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Iran continues to dismiss criticism of its inadequate anti-trafficking efforts while continuing to punish - often severely, including beatings, imprisonment, and execution - victims of trafficking. Specifically, children who have been trafficked in Iran's illegal commercial sex trade have been punished as adulterers by Iran's Islamic courts; some have been executed. The government has avoided developing a comprehensive strategy to address Iran's human trafficking problem.

A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as it will allow certain types of individuals who are influential in Iranian society to learn about and be exposed to the United States and its people.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of Iran is already subject to economic sanctions due to, among other things, its support for international terrorism. The United States Government does not provide economic assistance to the Government of Iran. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for educational and cultural programs that involve the participation of individuals who in some cases may be affiliated with the government.

Kuwait The Government of Kuwait does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Kuwait, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Kuwait has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude in which many foreign domestic workers and laborers are found in Kuwait, but has committed to work with the United States Government on this problem through a constructive dialogue. The government has opened a shelter for victims of forced labor, though it has helped few victims, and it reportedly has turned away other victims. The government has ample resources to address Kuwait's trafficking problems, but has not yet reported any significant law enforcement efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking crimes and convict and sentence trafficking offenders. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Kuwait is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Kuwait in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI) and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions: Approximately $2.7 billion dollars in projected foreign military sales (FMS) to Kuwait, $15,000 in International Military Education and Training (IMET) funding, and an anticipated $3 million in MEPI assistance would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Sanctioning MEPI programs would have removed a key United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Kuwait.

Papua New Guinea The Government of Papua New Guinea does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Papua New Guinea, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Papua New Guinea has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of trafficking of underage girls for commercial sexual exploitation within the country. The government has not improved its poor anti-trafficking law enforcement record or shown an effort to identify and protect victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced labor.

Impact of Sanctions: Approximately $280,000 in International Military Education and Training (IMET) funds would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of allowing for the uninterrupted continuation of important military-to-military security cooperation programs.

Qatar The Government of Qatar does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Qatar, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Qatar has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude in which many foreign domestic workers are found in Qatar. The government offers protective services to victims through a shelter. Nonetheless, the government has not instituted a victim identification procedure to prevent the punishment of trafficking victims, and victims are believed to be among those detained indefinitely in deportation centers. Qatar continues to provide training to government officials through seminars and conferences and has committed to paying for comprehensive law enforcement training over the next year. However, the Government of Qatar's record of prosecuting trafficking offenses remains poor; the government did not report any prosecutions of those suspected of trafficking crimes. Qatar also has not developed a public awareness campaign or other trafficking prevention programs. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Qatar is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions: Approximately $400 million in projected foreign military sales (FMS) and $15,000 in International Military Education and Training (IMET) funds would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Sanctioning MEPI programs would have removed a key United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Qatar.

Saudi Arabia The Government of Saudi Arabia does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Saudi Arabia, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: The Government of Saudi Arabia has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude in which many foreign domestic workers and laborers are found in Saudi Arabia, but has committed to work with the United States Government on this problem through a constructive dialogue. The government offers only a small number of services for these victims of trafficking - who are among millions of South and Southeast Asian workers brought to the Kingdom - and prosecutes few of those suspected of trafficking crimes. The government has ample resources to address Saudi Arabia's trafficking problems, but has only recently begun to show an interest in tackling this serious human rights issue. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Saudi Arabia is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Saudi Arabia in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions: Approximately $2.2 billion dollars in projected foreign military sales to Saudi Arabia, $1.5 million in MEPI funds, and $15,000 in International Military Education and Training (IMET) funding would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Sanctioning MEPI programs would have removed a key United States government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Saudi Arabia.

Sudan The Government of Sudan does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive sanctions against Sudan, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification: Since March 2008, the Government of Sudan has made no progress in rescuing and reintegrating victims of trafficking into their communities of origin, resulting in thousands of people continuing to remain in prolonged situations of forced labor and sexual exploitation. It also made no effort to address the trafficking of women for domestic servitude within and through the country. The government's Council of Ministers did, however, in 2007, approve the draft Child Protection Act, which prohibits the recruitment or enlisting of children (under the age of 18) in the armed forces; the Act must be approved by parliament before it can be enacted. Southern Sudan also made progress in passing its own Child Protection Act.

A full waiver of sanctions is in the U.S. national interest as it will allow the funding of programs to, among other things, enhance security within the country, support democratic development, and carry out additional reconstruction projects in Southern Sudan.

Impact of Sanctions: Comprehensive sanctions against Sudan are already in place, including those imposed under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, those related to its designation as a state sponsor of terrorism, and several other sanctions. Applying additional sanctions could have affected more than $365 million in assistance to bolster security within the country, implement peace agreements, and further the reconstruction of Southern Sudan.

The end of the 21-year civil war in Sudan, as marked by the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) by the Government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Army on January 9, 2005, signaled a new era for Sudan. The United States continues to work with the parties to support the implementation of the peace agreement and bring about democratic transformation in Sudan. While the signing of the Darfur Peace Agreement two years ago provided an opportunity to contribute towards the resolution of the crisis in Darfur, the conditions on the ground remain tenuous, and the progress towards a bona fide peace process remains stalled. Under the CPA, we continue to implement a wide variety of programs to restore effective governance and allow economic growth in the South and other conflict areas. These include, but are not limited to, programs aimed at restoring a functioning judicial system and other elements necessary for the return to the rule of law and security, a functioning legislature, elements of a market economy, mitigating conflict, and ensuring security. Because both humanitarian and consensus-building efforts to support a peaceful transition in Darfur have been hampered by a delayed peace process, the United States Government remains cautious in exploring opportunities to begin to support recovery activities. However, the United States Government maintains diplomatic engagement to strengthen the peace process that will eventually allow opportunities for longer-term development activities. Bilateral programs and projects in both of these areas, in conjunction with other countries and international institutions, are currently underway. The President's action will allow these important efforts to continue as appropriate.

Syria The Government of Syria does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Syria.

Justification: The Government of Syria has not made significant efforts to address its trafficking in persons problem since the release of the June Report. The government made no efforts to develop an anti-trafficking policy, increase identification of trafficking victims or prosecutions of traffickers, or raise public awareness of the issue of trafficking. There was no discernable progress in passing and enacting a comprehensive anti-trafficking law drafted in 2006. Syria reported no law enforcement efforts to punish trafficking offenses this year. In addition, the government made no discernable efforts to identify and provide protection services to victims of trafficking; instead it appears to have arrested or prosecuted some victims for prostitution or immigration violations.

Impact of Sanctions: The Government of Syria is already subject to economic sanctions due to, among other things, its support for international terrorism.

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

14 of 445 DOCUMENTS

October 12, 2008 Sunday

Omanisation can be good if done the right way

LENGTH: 606 words

The issue of nationalisation, or replacing expatriate workers with locals, is a serious business in Oman.

For one, the authorities are worried about the job prospects for nationals. For another, Omanisation could improve the sultanate's record in a US report dealing with trafficking in people.

Knowing about real unemployment rate is not an exact science in Oman. By one report, the jobless rate stands at about 15 per cent of eligible Omani nationals. Yet actual figures are most likely to be higher in rural areas and among women. Still, available statistics point out disturbing facts about demographics. About 43 per cent of the population is below 15 years of age. Many will enter the job markets in the next few years.

Foreign workers soaked up 79 per cent, or 580,000 private sector jobs, in July 2007. Locals represented about a quarter of employment in the private sector only a few years ago. Private sector firms increased their dependence on foreign workers as a rise in oil prices opened up fresh opportunities to bring in expatriates.

However, officials seem to have reached a conclusion that only a ban on visas for numerous professions would force companies to consider hiring locals in certain jobs. In late July, the Ministry of Manpower stopped issuing visas to companies engaged in the following activities: import and export, cleaning, barbershop, laundry, electronic repair, garbage cleaning and selling, textile shops, mobile GSM shops, health clubs, workshops in aluminium, iron, wood, car repair and all related activities, tailoring shops and beauty parlours.

However, employers rightly complain that such a ban would undermine their business prospects. Some firms will most likely suffer losses because of the visa ban. At stake is creating the sort of employment opportunities that locals admire and not just jobs per se.

Trouble is, employment in the private sector seems to be the only forward, as the public sector could not promise a sizeable number of job opportunities for locals. Already, Omani nationals assume more than 90 per cent of jobs in governmental departments. Vision 2020 calls for ensuring that locals make up 68 per cent of civil servants. Still, major firms such as BankMuscat report Omanisation in excess of 90 per cent levels.

Challenge

Separately, the policy of reducing reliance on expats should help address another challenge, namely the accusation of not enough doing to fight trafficking. The 2008 Trafficking in Persons, issued by the US State Department, places Oman under Tier 3 category, the lowest. The report cites practices not allowed under international law, namely that of employers confiscating passports of foreign workers. In addition, the report considers "not sufficient stringent" the punishment of a month in prison for those charged with forced labour.

Oman had promised to improve matters related to foreign workers in the run-up to a Congressional voting of a free trade agreement with the US in the summer of 2006. Prior to voting and then approving the pact, US lawmakers had voiced concerns about mistreatment of foreign workers in the sultanate. The concerns dealt with numerous issues, including child employment. Omani officials promised to rectify the shortcomings. However, the State Department confirms that mistreatment of expatriate workers remains a concern in Oman.

Omani officials deserve kudos for taking up measures designed to improve job prospects for locals in the private sector. However, authorities should avoid undermining the country's business prospects while implementing the Omanisation policy.

- The writer is Member of Parliament in Bahrain.

LOAD-DATE: October 22, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: 57

Copyright 2008 Gulf News - Al Nisr Publishing LLC.
All Rights Reserved
Syndigate.info, Al Bawaba.com

15 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Africa - Political
 Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

October 6, 2008 Monday

Kenyan paper says country key to international human trafficking cartel

LENGTH: 1199 words

Text of report by Ken Opala entitled "How Kenyans are sold into slavery" published by Kenyan privately-owned newspaper Daily Nation website on 6 October; subheadings inserted editorially

Thousands of Kenyans are being driven into modern slavery abroad in their desperate attempts to escape from worsening economic conditions at home.

Nation investigations show that nearly 20,000 Kenyans fall prey to human trafficking cartels yearly and are living in appalling conditions in north America, Europe and the Middle East.

The case of a 14-year-old girl rescued in the UK is a stark reminder of the growing trade in humans. She had been moved to Liverpool by a man who locked her in a house and forced her to have sex with numerous people. Luckily she escaped and she is now under the care of a charity in the UK.

Her plight came to light on 8 July, when UK Conservative Party MP Peter Bone of Wellingborough told Westminster Hall: "(She) was a black girl from Kenya. She came in on a passport that did not have her name or photograph on it, but was allowed into the country."

Apart from the revelation by Mr Bone, little information is available about the girl. The Kenyan high commission was not forthcoming when this writer used a London contact to seek more information about the girl.

Yet what emerges from this case is that Kenya has become a key operation base for cartels that are turning 17,500 Kenyans (according to estimates by Randy Fleitman, until recently the US labour attache, in Nairobi) into bondage abroad, about one in 40 people trafficked worldwide.

The cartels have also been bringing into Kenya Ugandans, Tanzanians, Indians, Chinese, Pakistani, Bangladeshi and Congolese, who are forced to work in construction industry and the EPZ [Export Processing Zones] factories, and as prostitutes in brothels in Nairobi.

After rescuing two Kenyan children in Tanzania last year, police believe another 40 minors and six adults are living there as slaves.

Police sources say investigations have also moved to The Netherlands and Ireland where five children are believed to be living in similar circumstances.

And the African Network for the Prevention and Protection Against Child Abuse (Anppcan), Kenya chapter, is pursuing investigations on reports that children bought or stolen in Kenya are held in Busia town homes [western Kenya, Uganda border] veiled as schools before they are ferried to Burundi, southern Africa and Europe.

It has emerged also that some of these children are being trafficked "for purposes such as removal of organs, religious rituals or witchcraft", according to Child Rights Advisory Documentation and Legal Centre (Cradle, The Children's Foundation) in its 90-page report, "Grand Illusions, Shattered Dreams" published three months ago. "Kenya is a source, transit and destination for trafficked children," says Mr Ahmed Hussein, director of children's services, Ministry of Gender, Children and Social Development.

Women trafficking

In a report "Human Trafficking in East Africa: Research Assessment and Baseline Information in Tanzania, Kenya, Uganda and Burundi", published three months ago, the International Organization of Migration (IOM) says Kenya and Tanzania are transit routes for Ethiopian women being trafficked to Europe and the Middle East and Somalis trafficked to South Africa.

Chinese women have been trafficked for sexual exploitation and Bangladeshis for forced labour through Kenya. "In all of the countries (Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania and Burundi) the majority of trafficked respondents indicated that traffickers used either promises of jobs and/or promises of jobs with a good salary to persuade them."

Victims pay between 80,000 shillings [about 1,000 dollars] and 700,000 shillings [10,000 dollars] to the cartels for either right of passage abroad or jobs that hardly exist in Kenya, according to Cyrus Omooria, the officer in charge of investigations and prosecution, Immigration Department, Mombasa [coast].

For those able to get to their destinations (Kenya, Europe, North America, South Africa, Middle East), the cartels seize their identification documents, hold them incommunicado and could turn them into sex slaves, according to Noah Chanyisa Chune, the COTU [Central Organization of Trade Unions] director of education who is trying to fight slavery in the EPZs.

"The most common form of recruitment is deception, followed by abuse of power or coercion. Most of the victims were given false promises of jobs, better life and even marriage to rich people abroad and at home," the Cradle report says.

Following two months investigations, this writer can reveal that about 20,000 people in Kenya are pushed into slavery in Europe and Middle East each year while another 30,000 get into slavery locally, working as house-helpers or as involuntary prostitutes in Nairobi and at the coast.

Repatriation

The situation has become so bad that the government is repatriating 80 foreigners each month (about 1,000 a year), according to a top immigration official.

In its publication, US State Department Trafficking in Persons Report, June 2008, the American government places Kenya in "Tier 2", the classification of a country that is a "source, transit and destination" for people trafficked for purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation.

Those vulnerable are people hungry for foreign jobs. Mr Omooria, who has been in Immigration Department for 15 years, has rescued hundreds of trafficked victims, the latest being 28 Somalis discovered at the Miritini [coastal] vehicle inspection unit on 8 May.

The van that had gone for mere check up happened to be carrying human cargo destined for Tanzania. It was at this checkpoint the immigration and police stumbled on a big story, the 25 Somalis on board had no identification on them and were headed to South Africa.

In another case in May, a group of 20 Somalis and Ethiopians were seized by police in Msambweni abandoned on an island next to Shimoni.

Human smugglers and traffickers have become so impudent that they advertise their services in local daily newspapers. They invite applications from cabin crews, nurses, beauticians, waiters and sales executives to work in foreign lands, mostly Middle East and Asia.

"Jobs guaranteed in Dubai", "Jobs in Dubai and Canada", "Jobs in America/Dubai", "Jobs in Kuwait", "Live and work as an Au Pair in Europe and Canada", "Kenya, Sudan, Dubai jobs", they advertise. And the gullible apply.

But a close scrutiny reveals the "recruiters" only offer cell phone numbers and do not indicate their location. Those with premises tend to shift every few months to avoid people they would have duped.

An agency in Nairobi's South B claims to hire house helps for Syria and Turkey. But a counsellor in the Turkish embassy in Nairobi denied issuing work permits to Kenyans recently.

The South B agency is not registered with the government and the Kenya Association of Private Employment Agencies (Kapea). "That agency is illegal," says Kapea Secretary-General Margaret Mugwanja.

Kapea has only 25 members, yet "hundreds of such agencies operate in the country", COTU's education director Noah Chanyisa Chune says.

Source: Daily Nation website, Nairobi, in English 6 Oct 08

LOAD-DATE: October 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

16 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

October 5, 2008 Sunday

Kenya; How Kenyans Are Sold Into Slavery

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 1130 words

Thousands of Kenyans are being driven into modern slavery abroad in their desperate attempts to escape from worsening economic conditions at home.

Nation investigations show that nearly 20,000 Kenyans fall prey to human trafficking cartels yearly and are living in appalling conditions in North America, Europe and the Middle East.

The case of a 14-year-old girl rescued in the United Kingdom is a stark reminder of the growing trade in humans.

She had been moved to Liverpool by a man who locked her in a house and forced her to have sex with numerous people. Luckily she escaped and she is now under the care of a charity in the UK.

Her plight came to light on July 8, when UK Conservative Party MP Peter Bone of Wellingborough told Westminster Hall.

"(She) was a black girl from Kenya. She came in on a passport that did not have her name or photograph on it, but was allowed into the country."

Apart from the revelation by Mr Bone, little information is available about the girl. The Kenyan High Commission was not forthcoming when this writer used a London contact to seek more information about the girl.

Yet what emerges from this case is that Kenya has become a key operation base for cartels that are turning 17,500 Kenyans (according to estimates by Randy Fleitman, until recently the US Labour Attache, in Nairobi) into bondage abroad -- about one in 40 people trafficked worldwide.

The cartels have also been bringing into Kenya Ugandans, Tanzanians, Indians, Chinese, Pakistani, Bangladeshis and Congolese, who are forced to work in construction industry and the EPZ factories, and as prostitutes in brothels in Nairobi.

After rescuing two Kenyan children in Tanzania last year, police believe another 40 minors and six adults are living there as slaves.

Police sources say investigations have also moved to The Netherlands and Ireland where five children are believed to be living in similar circumstances.

Bought or stolen

And the African Network for the Prevention and Protection Against Child Abuse (Anppcan), Kenya Chapter, is pursuing investigations on reports that children bought or stolen in Kenya are held in Busia Town homes veiled as schools before they are ferried to Burundi, southern Africa and Europe.

It has emerged also that some of these children are being trafficked "for purposes such as removal of organs, religious rituals or witchcraft", according to Child Rights Advisory Documentation and Legal Centre (Cradle -- The Children's Foundation) in its 90-page report, "Grand Illusions, Shattered Dreams" published three months ago.

"Kenya is a source, transit and destination for trafficked children," says Mr Ahmed Hussein, director of children's services, Ministry of Gender, Children and Social Development.

In a report "Human Trafficking in East Africa: Research Assessment and Baseline Information in Tanzania, Kenya, Uganda and Burundi", published three months ago, the International Organisation of Migration (IOM) says Kenya and Tanzania are transit routes for Ethiopian women being trafficked to Europe and the Middle East and Somalis trafficked to South Africa.

Chinese women have been trafficked for sexual exploitation and Bangladeshis for forced labour through Kenya.

"In all of the countries (Kenya, Uganda, Tanzania and Burundi) the majority of trafficked respondents indicated that traffickers used either promises of jobs and/or promises of jobs with a good salary to persuade them."

Victims pay between Sh80,000 and Sh700,000 to the cartels for either right of passage abroad or jobs that hardly exist in Kenya, according to Cyrus Omooria, the officer in charge of investigations and prosecution, Immigration Department, Mombasa.

For those able to get to their destinations (Kenya, Europe, North America, South Africa, Middle East), the cartels seize their identification documents, hold them incommunicado and could turn them into sex slaves, according to Noah Chanyisa Chune, the Cotu director of Education who is trying to fight slavery in the EPZs.

"The most common form of recruitment is deception, followed by abuse of power or coercion. Most of the victims were given false promises of jobs, better life and even marriage to rich people abroad and at home," the Cradle report says.

Following two months investigations, this writer can reveal that about 20,000 people in Kenya are pushed into slavery in Europe and Middle East each year while another 30,000 get into slavery locally, working as house-helpers or as involuntary prostitutes in Nairobi and at the Coast.

The situation has become so bad that the Government is repatriating 80 foreigners each month (about 1,000 a year), according to a top Immigration official.

In its publication, US State Department Trafficking in Persons Report, June 2008, the American Government places Kenya in "Tier 2", the classification of a country that is a "source, transit and destination" for people trafficked for purposes of forced labour and sexual exploitation.

Those vulnerable are people hungry for foreign jobs. Mr Omooria, who has been in Immigration Department for 15 years, has rescued hundreds of trafficked victims, the latest being 28 Somalis discovered at the Miritini Vehicle Inspection unit on May 8.

The van that had gone for mere check up happened to be carrying human cargo destined for Tanzania. It was at this checkpoint the Immigration and Police stumbled on a big story -- the 25 Somalis on board had no identification on them and were headed to South Africa.

In another case in May, a group of 20 Somalis and Ethiopians were seized by police in Msambweni abandoned on an island next to Shimoni.

Human smugglers and traffickers have become so impudent that they advertise their services in local daily newspapers.

They invite applications from cabin crews, nurses, beauticians, waiters and sales executives to work in foreign lands, mostly Middle East and Asia.

"Jobs guaranteed in Dubai", "Jobs in Dubai and Canada", "Jobs in America/Dubai", "Jobs in Kuwait", "Live and work as an Au Pair in Europe and Canada", "Kenya, Sudan, Dubai jobs", they advertise. And the gullible apply.

But a close scrutiny reveals the "recruiters" only offer cell phone numbers and do not indicate their location. Those with premises tend to shift every few months to avoid people they would have duped.

An agency in Nairobi's South B claims to hire house-helpers for Syria and Turkey. But a counsellor in the Turkish embassy in Nairobi denied issuing work permits to Kenyans recently.

The South B agency is not registered with the Government and the Kenya Association of Private Employment Agencies (Kapea).

"That agency is illegal," says Kapea secretary-general Margaret Mugwanja. Kapea has only 25 members, yet "hundreds of such agencies operate in the country," Cotu's education director Noah Chanyisa Chune says.

LOAD-DATE: October 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2008 AllAfrica, Inc.

17 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

September 24, 2008 WednesdayHEARING OF THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE (HELSINKI COMMISSION) (AS RELEASED BY THE HELSINKI COMMISSION);*SUBJECT: EAST OR WEST? THE FUTURE OF DEMOCRACY IN MOLDOVA;*CHAired BY: CLIFF BOND, SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT ADVISER, CSCE;*WITNESSES: AMBASSADOR NICOLAE CHIRTOACA, AMBASSADOR OF THE REPUBLIC OF MOLDOVA TO THE UNITED STATES; VLAD LUPAN, SOROS FOUNDATION-MOLDOVA, EUROPEAN INITIATIVES PROGRAM; WILLIAM HILL, NATIONAL DEFENSE UNIVERSITY AND FORMER HEAD OF THE OSCE MISSION TO MOLDOVA;*LOCATION: 1539 LONGWORTH HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C.*SECTION: PRESS CONFERENCE OR SPEECH*LENGTH: 15131 words

HEARING OF THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE (HELSINKI COMMISSION) (AS RELEASED BY THE HELSINKI COMMISSION) SUBJECT: EAST OR WEST? THE FUTURE OF DEMOCRACY IN MOLDOVA CHAIRED BY: CLIFF BOND, SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT ADVISER, CSCE WITNESSES: AMBASSADOR NICOLAE CHIRTOACA, AMBASSADOR OF THE REPUBLIC OF MOLDOVA TO THE UNITED STATES; VLAD LUPAN, SOROS FOUNDATION-MOLDOVA, EUROPEAN INITIATIVES PROGRAM; WILLIAM HILL, NATIONAL DEFENSE UNIVERSITY AND FORMER HEAD OF THE OSCE MISSION TO MOLDOVA LOCATION: 1539 LONGWORTH HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 10:10 A.M. EDT DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 2008

MR. BOND: Ladies and gentlemen, welcome to today's briefing organized by the Helsinki Commission. The title of today's briefing is, "East or West? The Future of Democracy in Moldova."

My name is Cliff Bond. I am a State Department representative on the Helsinki Commission. Chairman Hastings had planned to join us here today to share the meeting. Unfortunately, he was called away on House business. He may join us later on, but we are lucky to have Congressman Joseph Pitts with us who is a member of the Helsinki Commission.

And let me invite Congressman Pitts to say a few words.

REP. JOSEPH PITTS (R-PA): Thank you, Mr. Ambassador. Thank you for setting up this important briefing.

The issues currently facing Eastern Europe are of great concern and deserve priority consideration by the OSCE and the participating states. This is a critical time for the region, and its next steps and future actions will send an important message to the rest of the world. Russia's recent invasion of the Republic of Georgia has shown its expansionist goals and raise questions about the future of Eastern Europe and the potential for the European bloc.

Since its independence the Republic of Moldova has faced many political challenges, in part due to the disputes over Transdnistria. Nonetheless, the country has taken steps toward political and economic freedom. It has held free and fair elections, it's opened its markets, it's engaged in negotiations in efforts to resolve the situation in Transdnistria.

However, there are still concerns raised over issues in Moldova, and I particularly remain concerned that Moldova continues to be a major source and transit country for sex trafficking. Moldovan women have been trafficked to the Middle East, in Eastern Europe, in Western Europe, and girls, young women, have even been trafficked within the country from rural areas.

And so I'm very interested in hearing today's testimonies and hope the important issues will be addressed. And I wanted to express my gratitude to Chairman Hastings for scheduling this important hearing to discuss the future of Moldova, and I look forward to learning from our distinguished panelists who are with us today.

Thank you.

MR. BOND: Thank you very much, Mr. Congressman.

We have, as you said, several very distinguished presenters here with us today. They are the Moldovan ambassador to the United States, Ambassador Nicolae Chirtoaca, as well as Vlad Lupan from the European Initiatives Program of the Soros Foundation, and Dr. William Hill, who's a former head of the OSCE mission in Moldova.

We'll begin with Ambassador Chirtoaca, and we'll follow through with the other two presenters, and then we'll open for questioning.

Mr. Ambassador?

AMB. CHIRTOACA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Congressman Pitts, (inaudible), ladies and gentlemen.

I would like to start my presentation by expressing my gratitude to the Helsinki Commission for organizing and hosting this event and for the possibility to address the issue related to democracy development in my country, the Republic of Moldova, from the perspective of approaching 2009 parliamentary elections and taking into consideration the changing geopolitical environment in Eastern Europe caused mostly by the recent Georgia crisis that has a direct impact on the settlement of so-called frozen conflicts in the ex- Soviet states. Since the beginning of this century, Moldova has made visible progress, moving from a typically weak state (inaudible) confronted with multiple problems and obsessed by an identity crisis to relatively stable democratic institutions, functional government structures, growing economy -- GDP growth is around 6, 7 percent per year -- and an economy based on the private sector.

Throughout this period, (inaudible) limited internal capacities (inaudible) for change. The Republic of Moldova has remained committed to democratic reforms and (inaudible) of the society, providing security and stability in the region, mostly through efforts painted as peaceful resolution of the separatist crisis and the territorial reintegration of the state.

Following the 2005 parliamentary elections, the government continues its effort in order to improve democratic governance in the country. It's reducing corruption, pushing through economic reforms and welcoming foreign investments.

At the same time, President Voronin made clear his intentions that the Republic of Moldova follow in the path of other successful post-communist countries and draw closer to the European Union as well as develop partnership relations with NATO within the framework of the Individual Partnership Action Plan.

What I would like today -- my presentation will be based mostly on the idea of how to measure democratic reforms, how deep are democratic changes, what are criteria to approach this problem? And, of course, I will not -- speaking as a representative of my country, I will rely mostly on the appreciation given to my country by the international organizations, first of all, by the Council of Europe who is monitoring very, very closely the democratic reforms in my country. The organizational security in cooperation with Europe is engaged in this process, as well as the European Union.

I would like to remind you, Moldova just ended an entire period and implemented the three-year action plan, and we have reports concerning the state of democracy in my country. I think it will help the participants just to see more clearly the picture without making quite a lot of publicity in the favor of one issue or another.

But I would like to start with the Millennium Challenge Account eligibility, and Moldova has been offered the chance to develop the compact in December 2006. This eligibility is the kind of -- not reward -- it's the appreciation of a partner country, a good policy performance and is based on scoring above the median, at least half of 17 indicators in each of three policy categories: Ruling justly, investing in people and economic freedom.

The first category contains indicators that mirror the quality of democratic governance: Country performance and freedom of expression and belief, association and organizational rights, the rule of law, respect of human and civil rights and independence of judiciary.

The conditionality -- I underline -- the conditionality of the assistance provided within the framework of cooperation with the Millennium Challenge Corporation help my government and improve the governance in accordance with the recommended norms and good practices. First of all, the gradual reduction of corruption and state bureaucracy, and this way is making irreversible the market and democratic reforms in Moldova.

But what are the appeal of the leading (inaudible) European organizations? First of all, I would like to start with the recent European Commission progress state report on the implementation of the European Neighborhood Policy in 2007 made public on April 2008. During the reporting period, the Republic of Moldova, it said in this report, "made good progress in most areas, including democracy and rule of law. The 2007 local elections were generally well administered, and voters were offered a genuine choice." I'm quoting from the report, it's not my interpretation of this paper.

Other (inaudible) during the reporting period were substantial progress in improving the institutional framework and procedures on control and certification of origin, which allows E.U. to grant the Republic of Moldova additional economic (ph) state preferences.

(inaudible) on visa facilitation and the admission and the positive cooperation with E.U. Border Assistance Mission, known as the EUBAM. The Republic of Moldova also cooperated closely with the E.U. in all questions related to the Transdnistria settlement effort, and work is ongoing to put into practice the proposals of the president of the Republic of Moldova on confidence-building measures.

A look at self-government and (inaudible) legislative acts, including on administrative decentralization, local public administration, regional development were adopted in December 2006. This brought national legislation closer to the recommendation of the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities in Europe.

The Republic of Moldova adopted a comprehensive strategy and implementation plan for reforming its judicial system. It's the capacity of the Supreme Council of Magistrates, the body in charge of judicial self-administration, were consolidated, and the Department of Judicial Administration subordinated as the Ministry of Justice was created and started operating in January of 2008.

The code of ethics for judges was approved in November 2006 and judicial (inaudible) under the (inaudible) of Supreme Council. It was introduced by law in 2007.

My country also (inaudible) accepting activities in the fields of combating corruption and raising awareness on corruption in light of phenomenon, as well took steps in the area to adjust its legislative framework to international standards and to (inaudible) institutional framework. I would like also to remind you that we take part in the Threshold Millennium Challenge Corporation Program since 2006, and it's also focused on reducing and combating corruption.

The National Human Rights Action Plan 2004-2008 is under implementation in the context of ongoing efforts to battle human trafficking, (inaudible) for victims of human trafficking while it's establishing five pilot regions. The National Action Plan of Anti- Trafficking 2007-2009 was set up with National Committee of Anti- Trafficking ensuring full implementation.

In February 2008, the European Convention for Human Trafficking (inaudible), and the Republic of Moldova has been the first country to ratify this convention.

The broadcasting role, the mass media freedom is one of the issue of concerns, and the opposition is not really happy how it functions. In 2006, a new law that has been adopted by the parliament provides a good legislative basis to ensure respect for the freedom of expression. The correct implementation in a manner which promotes the plurality of the media has to be ensured.

The biggest problem of Moldova, and especially the current media and written press, is the fact that they are not financially free, and the financial freedom of this mass media goes together with economic reforms and is good competition and the monies that are paid for to a newspaper and to give radio stations just to ensure this independence. The next parliamentary elections I expect to be called in mid-March 2009, so the parliament will decide.

The parliament of Moldova, because we are parliamentarian republic, will form the new government, will elect the president, as the second and last tenure of President Vladimir Voronin comes to an end next year. The parliament has passed a number of amendments to the electoral code that dates back to '97. According to the OSCE, I quote, "It provides an adequate basis for the conduct of democratic elections if implemented in good faith," the end of the quote.

In 2007, a new law of political parties -- I would like to remind you that we have, according to the last report of Freedom House, 28 political parties and organizations, because it's quite a lot for small Moldova. Sorry, I'm saying that. Maybe, who knows how many parties we need?

But there are a lot of political parties (inaudible) of the electoral code and was adopted and submitted to Venice Commission. Adopted in December 21, 2007, the law aims to regulate legislation functioning, financing of political parties (inaudible) electoral system, all transparent and less prone to abuse.

However, it also creates a number of restrictions that can be explained by the need to weigh the efficiency of the current party system as well as the national security concerns. For example, the threshold was increased from 4 to 6 percent. The electoral blocs were prohibited and certain restrictions to persons holding dual citizenship were introduced.

It is worth to be mentioned that Venice Commission recommended 5 percent of this threshold (inaudible). It is also worth mentioning that electoral blocs are prohibited to participate at elections in such European countries with long-lasting democratic traditions, like Germany, Austria, (inaudible), Hungary and Finland. At the same time, according to Moldovan legislature, the parties enjoy the right to create post-electoral colleges. According to the civil societies (inaudible) represented a vibrant aspect of Moldova's public space. As is mentioned in this year's Freedom House Nations in Transit report, which just appeared, by the way, I quote, "The number of active organizations is significant, and only certain NGOs have the capacity to contribute to public policies. (inaudible) and activities are developing slowly but lack (inaudible). At the same time, more reporting efforts did not bear the expected results.

Dependence on donor support leaves NGOs vulnerable and poses a key challenge to the sector's development. Until NGOs become transparent and open working with media, they will lack credibility in their mission to promote democratic matters. And, unfortunately, quite a lot of think tanks and NGOs are fully involved in the political processes, and, in this way, our citizens are liking alternative information (inaudible) democratization processes in my country.

Now, about Transdnistria conflict, our strategy in a conflict settlement, about how we approach this issue just now, especially after the August events in South Caucasus region.

For about a year, Moldova has been vigorously pushing for resuming the discussion between the current international format known as five plus two. I would like to remember this is international format with participation of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, Russia, Ukraine, as mediators; European Union and United States of America as observers, as well as the Republic of Moldova and secessionist authorities.

The government strategy for conflict resolution is based on a complex package approach to all the issues related to the (inaudible) crisis: Political, economic, social, military and humanitarian.

The package proposals includes the development and adoption of a special (inaudible) statute for Transdnistria region, while respecting the sovereignty and (inaudible) integrity of the Republic of Moldova. The consolidation of the neutrality studies, neutral studies, constitutional (inaudible) we call it, because it's written -- our constitution of Moldova, it's a neutral state. (inaudible) military troops from the national territory, a condition of ownership right and of certain special guarantees to the population of the eastern part of the country, currently under the control of separatist authorities.

These particular results were adopted in 2006 by Moldovan experts who tried to find a common denominator that would accommodate very small dollars and Russia interests without undermining the viability of a future reintegrated state or legalizing Russian military presence in Moldova.

The key elements of the negotiation process is a special (inaudible) status for Transdnistria region. Clear division of confidences in (inaudible), though it is functional central institutions. (inaudible) of Transdnistria region under the Moldovan parliament. The last part is important because of the spring 2009 parliament elections, and (inaudible) the population from the eastern bank of Dniestr River will take part in this democratic exercise.

The separate (inaudible) of the region will be, in part, (inaudible) in the (inaudible) legislature, and the (inaudible) total population currently is estimated at 13 percent.

The European Union and the United States of America long ago welcomed the package proposal as a good foundation and platform for viable and long-lasting settlement. It is necessary to mention that before the Georgian crisis Moldova has never formally -- sorry, Moscow has never formally reacted to our proposals in spite of our government persistent attempts to elicit a positive response. My country is currently observing the (inaudible) region while reiterating its firm belief of the exclusively political solutions of all of the disputes to be taken to the negotiations table. The same position is also reflected in the statement by the government of the Republic of Moldova issued on August 29 regarding the situation in South Ossetia and Abkhazia. It's (inaudible) that Moldova does not see the international recognition of these provinces as a stabilizing factor of the situation.

At this point, we can clearly state that the (inaudible) mediators and observers (inaudible) still continue. Moldova insists on five plus two international format. At this time being, as far as we know, neither (inaudible) or Moscow does not have a different approach, accepting five plus two as a basic format for negotiations. (inaudible) the president of the Republic of Moldova and of the Russian affiliation from the (inaudible) this year. There is a decision of (inaudible) to stop so-called moratorium on (inaudible) and begin a meeting in the three plus two format (inaudible) Russia (inaudible) on September 8 (inaudible) are developments that bring assurance of an early resumption of the five plus two international negotiation format.

However, it will be wrong and premature to conclude that Moscow has fully abandoned hopes of achieving a settlement on its own terms. There are no indications that Russia is prepared to renounce its long-standing policy of using the end result of Transdnistria conflict as leverage to circumscribe Moldova's foreign policy options or to legalize its military presence in Moldova, at least during so-called post-conflict years. The main goal is contained in the famous Kozak memorandum from 2003.

At the same time, there are a few further concessions our government can make without compromising the future of Moldovan state and the European integration strategy. Despite the progress made, effective implementation of reforms remain a challenge. In order to advance democracy, peace and total integration of the country, Moldova has to be successful in its effort to end the transition from the Soviet past to the sustainable and durable democracy of market economy and efficient governance.

But I would like just to invite you to address the problem of the current state of democracy from the point of view of more sustainable and less politicized. We understand there are three different and distinct periods of transition, and we are now just in between the second and the third. (inaudible) liberalization we passed in '95- '94, then a democracy stabilization that took us seven, eight years, and now we are ending by democracy consolidation, very often, opposition and quite a lot of (inaudible). They try to use an ideal model (inaudible), how it works in developed countries with maybe hundreds of years of experience, trying to compare with the model and criticizing (inaudible), which is basically not constructive and not a positive approach to (inaudible).

Moldova is still in transition. It's monitored very closely, it's given assistance. The biggest key problem is institutional deficiencies. The system works, but, of course, we need probably three or five years and the transition. Now, this transition is based on European and Western paradigm of development, and the Moldovan policy, to be integrated into the union is the biggest driving force and European model, which is basically the Western one, is taken as (inaudible) people like just this model for development of the country.

Concluding, I would like to mention that there's a large consensus in the country among the leading political parties, nine representatives of the developing (inaudible) and the socially visible and responsible civil society organization regarding the European future of Moldova.

There's a common understanding that only real and consistent democratic reforms can bring Moldova closer to the implementation of (inaudible) built around national strategy for development, to restore our historic and cultural ties to Europe that date back to the (inaudible) of Roman empire, an early Christian period of the modern Western civilization.

The integration of the countries of today's European institution, a leading organization, first of all, the European Union is understood as main way of implementation of the vision and strategy.

Thank you very much for your attention, and I appreciate the opportunity to speak here today and welcome any questions that you may have.

MR. BOND: Thank you.

Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador. We'll turn to Mr. Vlad Lupan of the Soros Foundation now.

MR. LUPAN: Thank you, Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thanks for the opportunity to share my views about the democracy in Moldova, as well as, thank you for the concern that the commission shows for my country. I hope this extremely encouraging attitude continues, and the commission will organize a hearing on Moldovan matters ahead of 2009 elections.

I would also like to thank the Moldova Foundation based in Washington for assisting me in attending this session.

I don't intend to speak about the comparative success or successes of the current government, thus its existing problems, as the government has the opportunity to promote its point of view extensively through the existing network of officials, official visits and meetings.

The civil society has fewer possibilities; therefore, I will go to the point and focus mainly on those concrete shortcomings that present a serious concern for democracy in Moldova.

I think, first of all, three matters should be taken into account. In 2008, we can agree, is an eventful year for Moldova. First of all, the country is approaching general and presidential elections at the beginning of 2009. Secondly, 2008 is also the year when the action plan signed between the European Union and the Republic of Moldova already expired formally. Thirdly, as mentioned about the 2000, it's also a year of changes with impact on Transdnistran conflict resolution and Russia's role in it, particularly after the war in Georgia.

The state of democracy in Moldova and the elections are matters of concern for people now. The state was admirable by regional standards at the beginning of its independence, and the country was the first from the countries of newly created CIS to be admitted into the Council of Europe.

The local assessment of the situation, the indicators of such international non-governmental organizations, as Freedom House, Amnesty International and Transparency International, do not place now Moldova in a position of leader.

The Council of Europe announced this year that it does not intend to renounce its monitoring of Moldova since the country did not meet the democratic criteria that would allow for such an image-making decision.

The state of democracy is closely linked now with country's European aspirations. Moldova signed in February 2005 a three-year action plan with the European Union. This (inaudible) the step-by- step implementation of those democratic reforms that Moldova needs in order to come closer to the E.U.

And by European rules, Moldova should abide by Copenhagen criteria: The stability of democratic institutions, the rule of law, human rights and the respect for minorities as well as a free and functioning market and the capacity to face the obligation of an E.U. member state.

The European action plan with Moldova left some question marks, some still unanswered. The E.U., indeed, decided to encourage Moldova in 2008 due to the fact that it was already facing a difficult relationship with Russia on Transdnistran conflict resolution as well as due to the fact that the country already on E.U. and NATO border still made some steps toward mostly legalistic reforms.

At the beginning of 2008, the Europeans took the decision to formally extend the action plan for a brief period of time, while in May 2008 they started -- they took a decision to start a reflection process in the new agreement with Moldova.

Even though there are concerns in relations to Russia's intentions, the E.U. remains also concerned about the pace of reform in Moldova. In its country report that was mentioned of April 3, as well as during its May 2008 decision on the reflection process, it stated that the action plan implementation needs progress in five crucial areas. Those are exactly the areas that are mentioned as Copenhagen criteria.

Moldova also suggested that it has arrears in such fields as the independence of justice, fight against corruption, freedom of the media and investment climate and business environment.

One more warning came from the European Union along the May 2008 decision to support Moldova with a reflection process. The Moldovan government was asked to ensure free and fair elections in 2009. Such a warning came as it is widely believed that there is a high temptation of the governing party to use state resources and their control over the public media (inaudible) on competition or fraud the election in less visible ways.

(inaudible) one is of primary attention as it forms the base for a sustainable democracy and respect for human rights, the independence of justice. The government again declared the reform of the judiciary as its priority in 2008. This is indeed true, although most of the so-called achievements meant presenting by the minister of justice a Council of Europe opinion to the prosecutor's office, creating a commission to draft a concept paper and other similar actions and achievements.

The Moldovan non-government organization lawyers for human rights rightly assesses that the most relevant indicator of the state of judiciary in Moldova and about its independence is the number of cases that are directed to the European Court of Human Rights. And among the state members of the Council of Europe, Moldova holds the first place with the highest number of cases per capita -- 15 cases per 1 million citizens. Analyses, both governmental and non-governmental, show that of all the cases that Moldova was accused, about half are related to the faulty judiciary procedures and decisions.

Despite officially expressed concerns by prime minister and minister of justice, this reality is the result of the unofficial policies of the current governing party implemented since its accession to power in 2001. The independence, of course, was affected in 2002 by mass cleaning of judges by the Moldovan president who is also the chairman of the Communist Party. He refused to extend the nomination period of the judges at that time without any written explanation. At the same time, there were cases of nominations of some other judges based on loyalty to the ruling party, as Freedom House reported yet in 2003.

Now, the civil society assesses that such a cleaning that started in 2002 led to an increased interference of the executive power in judiciary. The U.S. State Department report on human rights practices in Moldova from this year, March 2008, confirms that in the case of judiciary, specifically stating that the official pressure and corruption remain the problem.

The problem with the procedure of selection of judges is another point where the Moldovan NGOs agree with the findings of the U.S. State Department report. Thus, the initial phase of elimination is not uncommon. The judges are appointed upon suggestions of the Supreme Council on Magistrates by the president of the country. However, one of the NGO's tests is that under an informal (inaudible), such an appointment is done only after a hearing by the governing Communist Party faction of the parliament and not by the parliament's legal commission. The prosecutor's office is also considered to be affected by the same weaknesses and pressures as the courts.

When we speak about reform in Moldova and the reforms, the local E.U. experts conclude that the adoption of documents regulation and legislation is not followed by their implementation in such a problem that is reported, basically, in all the areas. This is a problem that is not only specific to judiciary.

Thus, we are coming to another important element of a democratic society: Free media. Moldova dropped down, according to the Freedom House reports on that matter as well. Although media legislation legally embraces the European norms as rightly reported, still, the implementation, the matter that we have just mentioned, the implementation of those provisions is done in such a manner as to ensure governing party control over the only national TV, Moldova 1.

Despite promises of reform that the Moldovan president made in May after your meeting, real actions still do not meet the promises. The position parties have no access to the national TV, which is now, by law, a public station. The broadcasting code was previously edited to allow the governing party to preserve control over the Broadcasting Coordination Council. This body then distributed broadcasting frequencies to the politically loyal stations and operated arbitrary licenses (inaudible). There were concrete cases of inappropriate treatment of foreign commentators, journalists or unwanted media by law enforcement, such as the cases of (inaudible) commentators, Romanian TV prohibition and contact (inaudible) with Russia (inaudible) to journalists. These are also raising concerns regarding the freedom of expression.

Even non-important and anti-governmental demonstrations, sometimes by singular people, were violently stopped by police despite the existing legislation.

Media outlets are not closed in Moldova. Their criticism of the governing party is quite often quoted by the Moldovan president as proof of media freedom. However, the impression is that these media are afloat only to be such examples of (inaudible) while obviously they are permanently pressured, and, as mentioned above, limited in distribution and broadcast just to minimize the competition to the government-controlled media. Moldova is the poorest country in Europe, and this makes the investment climate as well as business environment important elements that the state should insure. Moldova's economy is growing this year, particularly when looking at the former USSR this is true. However, when compared with its European neighbors, it seriously lags behind.

Due to that, nearly one-third of the Moldovans have already left to find jobs in the E.U. and Russia. The supply in remittance is already near 50 percent of country's GDP and has provided the opportunities to grow. However, people leaving the country is not a sign of a growing economy. The money transfers cannot mean proper economic development as these are not reinvested into business.

The so-called tax amnesty, operated last year by the government, does not seem to be the best solution to manage the fiscal burden. The unconfirmed rumors of presidential family involvement in taking over many lucrative businesses do not help the situation.

Pressure over foreign investors seem to produce a negative effect regardless of the good intentions.

Last year, reduction of taxes, operated by the government, in an attempt to increase interest in investing in Moldova, was considered by International Monetary Organization as insufficient as to favor foreign direct investment. The FDI is proven by those organizations to grow in countries with predictable business climate and a stable judiciary -- last one being a crucial problem reported about.

Now we can focus on the internal political climate where there are interconnected elements that need our attention.

The governing party made an internal analysis that prompted them to change the electoral legislation, as speculated, to ensure a greater electoral success in 2009. The communists changed the electoral threshold from 4 to 6 percent. They further prohibited pre-electoral critical alliances which are often voted by Moldovan people. And, finally, passed legislation that provides state funds only to those parties that will enter the parliament or local regional governments.

If seen separately, these steps, indeed, may raise minor questions. Since many of those principles are separately present on the European political scene. However, only one year ahead of the elections and taken in conjunction to another -- one to another, they create a commutative effect that is actually anti-democratic.

It affects the right of a large part of the populous to unite, choose and ensure that they are properly represented in the political life. Moreover, the government used the state budget to distribute funds mainly to the communist-led local governments. Moldovan president himself publicly declared that those who did not vote for the Communist party in local 2007 elections will have to pay the price and they receive no state funds, a promise that is now actually implemented. Using state resources to fine voters, in fact, the citizens of own country, is, in my opinion, undemocratic act.

A number of party has been affected as well directly. Signatories, for example, for one -- or for the party's newly created, which started to have impact on Moldovan political life, were subject to excessive questioning by law enforcement bodies. People were called by law enforcement and questioned for hours as to why they want to become a member of that party, who are their relatives. They're asked to sign standing, sitting, with right hand, with left hand and so on.

In case of another parliamentary party that declared during this June congress that the E.U. integration was transformed into unsupported political gain, the government communists accused the party of being devoted to Russia's goals. As we already know, the communists themselves are in negotiations with Russia.

Yes, there is a matter of a new, assertive Russia. European integration, in case of Moldova, was declared the strategic irreversible goal of the country. The Moldovan ruling party also insisted to bring forth the resolution of the Transdnistrian problems and relations with Russia, as the two top priorities of the country since 2006.

After almost unanimously adopting on July 22 of 2005 a law on the principles of the Transdnistrian conflict resolution by the Moldovan parliament, the governing party unexpectedly launched direct, bilateral negotiations with Russia, which provoked an increased amount of concerns. These concerns came out of the previous experience of 2003 when the Kremlin pressed for an unacceptable settlement through a memorandum adopted by Russian presidential (inaudible), Dmitry Kozak.

The unfortunate Kozak precedent made the civil society and political party suspicious of the new negotiations and (inaudible) pressures from national and particularly international (inaudible). The governing party admitted that something that they initially called consultations is taking place and suggested that we prepare a package deal that would be based on the July 2005 law along with other documents that are in line with that law. The government also stated that the deal was drafted in such a way as to already include Russia's interests in it and, thus, make it interesting for Moscow while respecting the Moldovan law. In my opinion, this is in itself a contradiction.

Russia is a country that behaves in real politic manner, projects power and believes in the controlled chaos of separatist region that it actually masters.

Russia is a country that strongly believes in tradeoffs on the international arena. This is a reality on the ground that contradicted assessments that we are not in the 19th century. Indeed, we are not but Russia is.

Moldova cannot negotiate on equal terms in a bilateral negotiation with a country such as Russia, because it cannot offer in tradeoff terms something that Moscow already has: The leverage of Moldova through the Transdnistrian conflict resolution, its military presence and the so-called mediator's role. It seems that the Moldovan officials in charge of the matter, who are the same people who negotiated a bad deal with Kozak in 2003, did not presume that such negotiations meant offering something to Russia that Moldova did not have.

Affirming that Moldova will not yield to Kremlin pressure was unrealistic. It now transpired that Russia was not clearly responding to Moldovan proposal, generating pressure and subsequent concessions, particularly in the economic sphere. The unilateral dependence on Russia gas was already a concern for the government due to a previous decision by that government to provide Russia the control package of shares to the Moldovan statement (inaudible) Moldova gas in exchange for eradicating the debts. However, when faced with lack of Russian response to the governmental package deal on Transdnistria, the government recently followed up with a contradictory move that strengthens Moldovan dependency. The state decided to cede the local distribution network to (inaudible) as well.

Russian companies that border (inaudible) Transdnistrian region without governmental approval were ensured that their new property rights will be recognized. Experts were encouraged to Russia lately while there was not the same level of official visible encouragement to the experts to the E.U., at least through diversified markets and ensuring economic security goals.

These unilateral concessions made in hope to sweeten, sorry to say, Russia did not yield the results. And, contrary, it was rumored that Russia was warning Moldova, Moldovan officials to be more flexible, and that the reason for such a warning will be seen during 2008. It was exactly before the August war in Georgia.

By no coincidence, Moldovan President Voronin was called to meet the Russian president on the day when Dmitry Medvedev announced the decision to recognize South Ossetia and Abkhazia. The next troubling step was an announcement made by the Russian minister of foreign affairs that deciding Moldovan conflict will return to the 2003 Kozak memorandum. This is the very memorandum that was rejected by Moldova as unacceptable and which comes against the Moldovan law of July 2005, which cannot be violated by the Moldovan negotiators.

A number of Moldovan experts believe that further Russian pressure to either implement such a memorandum or to simply promote its interest in Moldova will follow with certainty during 2008, with possible negative repercussions over its populous. Certain political parties might be supported by Moscow. Transdnistrian leadership will be used to put more pressure over Chisinau, particularly through the newly instituted two plus one format of negotiations that is outside the five plus two format and which is not a good format for Moldova, as Chisinau recognizes correctly. This effort is so the autonomous region of Gagauzia in the south of Moldova will be, and already is, reignited. Eventually, some do not even exclude gas cuts in this winter, which happened before, all leading to, if not a social event or a political crisis.

Russian pressure is detrimental for a democratic future of Moldova. (inaudible) is insistently promoting the concept of a future Moldova with a Transdnistria veto over most important foreign policy decisions but also internal decisions, such as E.U. membership. Basically, it's a (inaudible) right over democratic reforms and the Transdnistrian leadership has shown that it is against such reforms. The Transdnistria itself is a dictatorship, and it is against such concepts when it is actually supporting such concepts as the sovereign democracy it is promoting in Russia and the vertical of power, which allow for an unlimited and uncontrolled leadership that declare each of its decisions as democratic.

In conclusion, I would like to state that there is, of course -- there are several dilemmas in Moldova. Indeed, the Russian pressure is real and important factor in Moldova. Indeed, we can expect negative developments, possibly even before December 2008.

However, the geopolitical determinism is not the way to ensure that Moldova should receive unconditional support without seriously implementing democratic reforms.

The Moldovan communists have been responsible for the current situation of Moldova, which is, indeed, deteriorating since they have been, by the way, democratically elected to power. It does seem that they are now trying to avoid yielding to the Russian pressure. They would like the Moldovan civil society and political parties to help them out through statements that reject the Russian proposal, as it seems, so that the president can save face.

The problem is that it is believed that the communists will use the blame game, not only to avoid complications with Russia before elections. As in 2003, they will presumably blame the civil society for not being active enough for the political parties or for the fact that they have deteriorated the relations with Russia, thus place responsibility ahead of the elections on other shoulders.

The dilemma of the civil society, and particularly of the political parties unaffiliated with the government, is how they can help a Communist Party in government that is prosecuting them and does not genuinely implement democratic reforms in a sufficient manner (inaudible) free political competition.

We believe that support for Moldova should be and should exist and should be from now on conditional on reforms.

Thank you very much for your attention.

MR. BOND: Thank you.

And now we'll turn to Dr. William Hill of the National War College, currently of the National War College, formerly a director of the OIC mission in Moldova.

MR. HILL: Thank you, Thank you very much, ambassadors, ladies and gentlemen, our friends.

First of all, I have to state that the remarks I offer here are in my personal capacity and do not necessarily represent the views or position of the National War College or the Department of Defense. I've distributed, or made available, to the commission a short article that may or may not appear in the print soon, which addresses some of the issues involved in the status of the Transdniestran settlement negotiations going on right now.

This briefing does, indeed, come at a sensitive time with much attention on other crucial areas of the former Soviet Union following last month's war in Georgia. In Moldova, the good news out of all of this, first and foremost, I'd presume, is that nobody really seems to be preparing or wish to fight each other from one position or another, and, therefore, any movement toward a settlement is, frankly, likely to be peaceful.

The five plus two negotiations are on the cusp of renewing after some two and a half years without a negotiating round. You may well see a formal session very soon, and attempts have been ongoing to generate work on portions -- or begin expert work on portions of the comprehensive Moldovan package that has been on the table for quite some time.

The Russian Federation has also been more active, in particular, Russian activities were probably instrumental in bringing about a meeting of President Voronin and the Transdniestran leader, Igor Smirnov, last spring, the first time the two had seen each other in almost seven years. The prospects for further movement or success are mixed. Partially, the positions of Chisinau and Tiraspol are pretty far apart. The positions of those who were involved in the process as mediators or observers also are not particularly close together on some issues, and these differences have to be reconciled, the commonalities need to be found before real progress can be made. I would point out one thing that's not generally mentioned but I found during my time there, and I think it's still a phenomenon: There is a potential, and unrealized and perhaps paradoxical potential, for progress in the left bank, in particular in the Transdniestran business community where leaders and representatives of a number of enterprises have made considerable headway for a decade or more in penetrating the Western European and North American market. And these businessmen, entrepreneurs from the left bank are actually oriented toward integration and further operation in Western markets, and this may be a potential for finding common ground that could lead to an acceptable settlement for all parties involved. It doesn't mean that it will happen, but it's something that one might look at.

The real question with the increased activity of the Russian Federation now is whether Russia will work within or outside the generally accepted negotiated framework. In this sense, in my informal conversations with negotiators, both from the OSCE and then particularly U.S. representatives, what I hear from them is generally that we are open to greater Russian activity and constructive Russian initiatives, but these initiatives should contribute then to progress within the five plus two format. In other words, there's nothing wrong with an individual country being active, but it should lead back to the general framework within which we consider an acceptable settlement has to be reached.

I also think that after what I've seen, as after especially the events of August, the U.S. is more active and more supportive of constructive progress and just more active in support in Moldova, and that's probably a good thing.

The other note I'd put to all of this is that a settlement of the Transdniestran conflict, in my view, would be a good thing, but it's not a sine qua non for progress in everything else in Moldova. In other words, I'd like to reiterate what you'll see if you read through. With respect to Moldova in 2008, the absence of a solution to the Transdniestran question will be better than a bad solution that cripples the country's chances for reform and integration into Europe as a whole. For any settlement to succeed, Russia must be a part, but so must the rest of Europe and the North Atlantic community, that is, the E.U. and the U.S.

I'd say commenting on U.S. actions elsewhere in the globe, my Russian colleagues have often said that unilateralism and unilateral solutions are generally not a good thing. The conflict areas in the periphery of the former USSR, like Moldova, are places where I think Moscow would do well to listen to its own counsel, its own advice.

Very briefly, in terms of other elements that have been raised today, the status of Moldovan electoral democracy, this is a classic case of, is the glass half full or half empty? On the half full category, opposition parties generally are allowed - are able to register and conduct activity in Moldova. There's considerable freedom of advocacy, organization and campaigning, and opposition parties have won significant victories in elections and garnered a considerable percentage of the vote. For example, municipal elections in 2007, the opposition won a resounding victory and defeated the communist candidates in Chisinau. So that's the good part.

On the half empty side, indeed, the 2007 law on political parties is worrisome, because it allows the basis for government interference and regulation of all political parties, including opposition political parties, not necessarily a desirable thing. The new 6 percent threshold and the prohibition of electoral blocs is generally aimed, or in Moldovan circumstances, will probably work against diversity and freedom or the success of opposition parties or a multitude parties in electoral competition.

And there's still problems with the use of administrative resources, administrative restrictions on political parties or political prosecutions and investigations of opposition figures or opposition parties.

Now, if you look at the situation in Moldova leading up to the elections in 2009, it leads to a couple of observations. First of all, the ruling party, the PCRM, or Party of Communists, has considerable popular support, and partisans or supporters of this party really don't need to engage in some of the chicanery and administrative juggling in order to promote electoral success of the party.

The party does have a base, so why do this if you want to have free and fair elections?

The other thing is that some of the opposition's problems are of their own making. The opposition, broad right, right center opposition consistently draws over 40 percent of the electorate in Moldova. The problem is, this is split among some 10 to 15 opposition parties where every political leader wishes to be king of his little faction rather than a part of a broad coalition within the rules that would have a chance of electoral success, considerable representation in parliament and perhaps even control. It remains -- it was a problem in the 1990s, it remains a problem late into this decade in Moldova. The opposition does have legitimate complaints about the status of the playing field, rules of the game, but they also have to stop shooting themselves in the foot if they want to be successful.

Overall, I'd say, what we from outside really should encourage is for the U.S., E.U., OSCE, Council of Europe and other international organizations and bodies that engage in electoral monitoring, in human rights monitoring, should remain very active and communicate early to all participants in the Moldovan electoral process, that irrespective of who wins, we expect a clean election, and this is the best way to ensure continued and broad support.

On human rights, in general, we've heard things -- I second what I've heard about difficulties with freedom of expression, in particular, broadcasting is long since of the authorities in Moldova have had the benefit of the good advice of the Council of Europe, E.U., OSCE, and in many respects having to do with public broadcasting, they failed to listen.

Anti-trafficking, this has been a big disappointment. Now, Moldova has done enough recently to get themselves raised back from tier three up to tier two, but since I began working with the Moldovan government in 1999, 2000 to help them draft legislation against trafficking in persons, and more needs to be done on this. It's a problem on both sides of the river. It's sort of been, sort of, like squeezing balloons. First, the traffic went toward Western Europe and the Balkans. As the international community and authorities got a handle on that, it moved toward the east and south. But it's something where clearly the authorities can and should, must do much more.

Corruption and the judicial system is still a big problem, despite a decade and a half of promises of reform from many administrations and work with many international organizations. Some things have been done but not as much has been done as needs to be. And until this is tackled, it's corrosive of trust of citizens in government, and it prevents effective reform in many other areas.

On the economy and business climate, it's a patchy picture here. Moldova has gotten recently good remarks from the IMF and World Bank and is doing a number of things correct in their economy. However, the web of economic reforms is still patchy, and there are problems with implementation, especially in things that are important to the creation of a favorable business and investment climate and allowing small businesses to pop up, especially outside of the capital, and this needs to be implemented.

Given some of these difficulties, you saw Fitch where it recently downgraded the Moldovan economic outlook from positive to stable, because there are some fundamental weaknesses behind this good picture. The biggest one is that there is not enough domestic jobs, enough domestic business, enough domestic investment being created. The figure I had is about 33 percent of the Moldovan GDP comes from remittances from Moldovans who work abroad. The figure, according to the Moldovan press recently, hit $1 billion submitted back to Moldova in remittances for 2008. That's before the end of the year, so it's going to be well over $1 billion.

It's good to have the money coming in, but it's not stable. What if the people stop sending money home? What if their families go out to join them? The problem is getting someone to change this and put the Moldovan economy on a more stable basis, because the money comes back to Moldova, people use it for consumption, which means that Moldova has a highly unfavorable trade balance. The current account is highly disbalanced but offset by the remittances.

But the people pay taxes in Moldova so the government budget is more than filled, and so you go to either the executive branch or the legislative branch and they say, "What's the problem? We have a surplus in the government budget this year, and as far as out as we can see if it stays the same. If it doesn't stay the same, the economic foundations could be worrisome."

Overall, looking at Moldova, much has been done that is good, and a lot needs to be encouraged. Things need to be corrected, to be sure, but this is by no means -- by no means we wish to paint a dismal picture. What I would recommend, as an individual, simply for my own country, is, first of all, to provide continued and consistent high-level engagement and support with conditionality. I think the Millennium Challenge Account has been a good approach, it's been useful. Other elements of support and conditionality have been useful, and we can see positive results from this. In particular, in Transdnistria, there needs to be sustained, high-level attention. This is not something that can come up in a meeting every once in a while, then we forget about it and low-level -- working-level people deal with it and don't get any attention.

This is an important question for some of our interlocutors, and, therefore, it needs to be an attention that gets consistent -- or an issue that gets consistent attention from us at a level that can communicate authoritatively and take decisions.

Most particularly, I would advocate, including this issue, regularly in high-level U.S.-Russian Federation dialogues. It's an important issue to Moscow, and we will not influence what Moscow thinks about it unless we raise it with Moscow at an appropriate level and conduct a dialogue at that level. Otherwise, we won't be taken seriously.

Thank you very much. Thank you for the opportunity. BOND: Thank you so much, Dr. Hill.

I'm going to open it up to questions now, but I'd like to start by putting a question to our panelists.

It seems to me from what you said that it's going to be extraordinarily important to have an election this spring that shows the support of the Moldovan people for the government and the elected officials and strengthens their hand in dealing with the Transdnistria problem, as well as advancing reforms.

Dr. Hill mentioned monitoring, election monitoring, long and short term, as a way to influence the outcome of those elections so that they're free and fair. Do you have other ideas on things the United States, Europe, multilateral organizations, like the OSCE, can do to help assure that free and fair outcome?

AMB. CHIRTOACA: Definitely, the election from March 2009 will be a moment of truth for our democratic system, but I would like to remind you that since the beginning of our period of independent existence, Moldova always had a very good record concerning the organization of free and, more or less, fair elections and criticism from the international observers. I've been focused mostly on the use of administrative state power resources, which is, basically, we understand that this is raising awareness but since the beginning of the '90s.

So we always have been, as I mentioned, monitored (inaudible) special missions sent to Moldova by the OSCE, by the Council of Europe, by the European Union, even by commonwealths of independent states. It always has been monitored very, very closely.

Definitely, this is already a part of Moldova. Even despite we are in transition, this is a part of our democratic culture. Moldovans are a civil society, one of the most maybe success story. I think it was the creation in 2005 of association of civil society organizations that are taking -- well, ensuring this kind of monitoring, not only the capital but all over Europe -- sorry, Sigmund Freud (inaudible)-- all over Moldova.

So from that point of view, I think everything will be OK. We understand how important. We are scrutinized very closely. The European (inaudible) of Moldova depends on the quality of democracy, and this is not political wrestling, this is a reality, and this is understood politically, responsible presenting of political class that has made really, really a big test for Moldova.

I have a feeling that we'll have already some changes in (inaudible) to conflict settlement even earlier, and we did not exclude that (inaudible) in December. That meeting will be kind of benchmark, it is a benchmark for Russian diplomacy in trying just to make some efforts in using the current situation as an argument in the dialogue with the best, but I will not collaborate too much on this topic. We'll see. Initiatives that we do, we are not inclined to any concession anymore.

This is a problem of the future of Moldovan state. The future of real sovereignty and independence. We'll see what Russian Federation will propose, and a package approach is conceded as the main element of our strategy. But definitely take good democracy and efficient democracy can help us to solve our (inaudible) conflict.

Thank you.

MR. BOND: Thank you.

MR. LUPAN: Indeed, the 2009 elections are important in the view of the future of Moldova, because that is what the European Union actually said, that we will support Moldova, but we want to see free and fair elections. This is an important element for our future support as a country.

I think that we should look -- and we are looking as the civil society and some experts from the civil society -- are looking at the events of 2009 from the perspective -- not from that perspective of negative problems that are existing, on which I have focused on parts, but from the perspective of the future of the country, independent of which political party wins the elections, this is the important thing.

The important thing is that these elections should be free and fair, and then we will speak about the developments, and then we can speak about the proper developments. This is a first step now that is necessary. The problem that we see here is that for the moment there are no sufficient signs that these will be free and fair elections, and these will be changed. And what and who can do for Moldova, what can be done for Moldova and who can do it?

Speaking about monitoring, the long-term monitoring of the OSCE starts one month ahead of elections, if I'm right, if I still remember from my previous OSCE -- two months, all right -- from my previous OSCE experience. Because I was also working for the OSCE myself and monitored the elections in several countries.

Two months is not enough. Two months is not enough, because it is not a matter of time ahead of the elections, it's a matter of preparations for the elections at the beginning of the campaign, and the campaign will not start two months ahead of the elections. It will be well-prepared to have a lot -- but there is one positive thing that we can and should look at.

There is an OIC mission in Moldova that is actually already monitoring the situation. There is an E.U. delegation in Moldova that is already monitoring the reforms and the elections. And these organisms, in conjunction with monitoring by the civil society and political parties, can be supported, you know, to monitor the pre- electoral campaign, on one hand.

On the other hand, what E.U. can do for Moldova, and why I am focusing that much on the E.U., because, actually, as I said before, the reforms that are stipulated by the E.U. are the democratic reforms that Moldova needs. And we want to become a member of the E.U.

The E.U. can support Moldova through a decision to start a negotiation process on the new agreement, and the U.S. can help Moldova in its bilateral discussions with E.U. on that matter.

What is important here, however, as I said, is to have the necessary conditionality. When Moldova -- if Moldova wants to receive such a support, then it still should implement a number of reforms, and they should be done in good faith.

This is the role that U.S. can play in its relations with the E.U. and in its relations with Moldova, particularly, the U.S. can clearly state that there is -- hopefully, there is -- and I feel there is -- there is a support for Moldova, but this support needs to be seen. There should be a feedback from Moldova as well. One should be a player, one should be a democratic player, one should show that we are a group of the same countries, that we believe in the same values as the E.U. and U.S. in democratic values. And that has to be proven. Although, of course, it is difficult for Moldova to progress on its path to democracy, and it is indeed a matter of time, and it is indeed -- nobody expects Moldova overnight to become a country but we do tend to better ourselves, and this is the message that the civil society is trying to send. And in this respect, the E.U. and the U.S. can help, and the OSCE already is helping us in the sense that it already monitors the elections.

What can be done by these organizations for countries is that it can start to, sort of, support this for the monitoring of the elections already from now, and also it should work closely with the government on the matters that are not considered to be sufficiently democratic.

MR. HILL: I would just like to add that in my experience in working with the authorities in Moldova, including the present ones in this area, is that they do desire to meet their international commitments and international norms. They also want to win the election. The key is early involvement, engagement and feedback in the area from missions that are on the ground, because the problems arise, generally, in the campaign. Election day everything will look good, but it's the conditions of the campaign which are the primary concern and where the engagement can be most effective. And I've found it can be effective, because my interlocutors were very often influenced, I thought positively, by international feedback.

MR. BOND: OK. Thank you for all of that.

One remark and then I'm going to open it to the floor to questions, and I'm going to encourage people to come forward, use a microphone here, state your name and affiliation and pose a question to our speakers.

But my comment is the dependence on remittances is not -- is a problem that other countries share. I know in Latin American, in a couple of cases, the countries have set up investment funds so that their foreign workers can actually invest in the funds as well as send money back to their families, which will be consumed. It's a way of saving for them, and it's a way of encouraging investment in the home country. I don't know if Moldova's considered that.

Now, if we have people who would like to pose a question? Please?

VLAD SPANU: My name is Vlad Spanu, and I'm the president of the Moldova Foundation here in Washington. And my question is regarding the topic of today's discussion, "Where Moldova Goes, East or West?"

So my organization, along with other organization partnerships, partnered and organized two events on post-elections Moldova. We did it (inaudible); in 2005, after the parliamentary elections; in 2007, after the local elections.

Among the conclusion of experts I brought from Moldova, from the United States was one important statement. Moldova does conduct the free and fair elections on election day, and I think the speakers and Ambassador Hill actually mentioned. But the big problem is before the elections. During this month, there are -- the state institutions prevent the competition, both the parties and for independent media.

So the question is this to all speakers: Why Moldova behaves this way? If it wants to join the democratic society, the democratic family, if all Moldova wants to play both ways, to be a semi-authoritarian country within the CIS and at the same time to declare itself a democratic country and be part of the European Union. So it's very difficult to play this way.

So my question is, what way Moldova really wants to go? The current comments are it really wants to go to join the West or to stay outside of Western family. Thank you.

AMB. CHIRTOACA: To tell the truth, I was not really very happy with the topic of our discussion but just right, OK to just to stay open about it. There's no doubt about this, no question about the strategic orientation of Moldova. It's the problem how to address the threat of Transdniestra, the Russian intervention in the different area of Soviet space and this is a problem of Moldova specificity.

Moldova is still, let's say, trapped and looking endless transition. The end of transition landed in Europe, and this is, again, I would like to state it, repeat it here, again, model of development, it's a functional democracy, efficient governance, freedom of mass media, rule of law and the (inaudible) judiciary system place a great, great values and principles. The problem is, at the institutional level, Moldova needs new capacity, (inaudible), strange people, educated people just to ensure the efficiency of functions of this democratic mechanism.

(inaudible), and I think this is nothing more than speculations concerning their orientation as a foreign policy and long, long-term strategy of my country. It reminds me a little bit Mr. Lupan saying, "What we have to do political parties and vibrant single society organization to move Moldova in the right place.

Moldova is not Milosevic Serbia with non-government organizations. Please get back to the natural functions. Please educate people, provide society with a clear vision, have more analytical and systemic approach. Do not make speculations, because we need professionals with clear strategies, and you can contribute in a very direct way unless you would like to be political fighters. Please organize 20 non-service political formations and struggle for democracy. If you'd like to be struggle for democracy, be a patriot outside Moldova and be freedom fighter inside Moldova. I think this is the best formula to be efficient and to help our country, which is still in an extraordinarily difficult situation, even now. Thank you.

MR. LUPAN: The problem that we are facing now, as a country, is that we have this situation when the attitude of the government is changing according to its preferences on the international (inaudible), according to its international relations. The relations of Moldova should not -- not in the past but especially not in the future -- should not be those factors that should be influenced, the democratic development inside the country. These are the things that are clear.

I think that specificity is often quoted by many countries when they fail to implement certain reforms or to take certain steps. Specificity of each country is not in failing to implement certain reforms but to implement them in a different way, (inaudible).

I think this issue is where Moldova goes, East or West, was very much speculated in recent years, coming again to the matter of geopolitical determinants, the fact that if we have better relations with Russia, then we should give Russia what Russia wants. The E.U. is a richer area, and we should go there, and that is why we want to be an E.U. member.

I think these sort of issues are now already going away and should be going away. I think that we should be moving to the West, and I think that the point is that if it comes to the political and geopolitical determinants, we can see that relations with Russia are not exactly progressing in the way they were planned. So that's why Moldova will be moving to West, and this is something encouraging.

But as I said again, it should not be a matter of international relations. It should be a matter of political will of the people. And that (inaudible), indeed, was already expressed in 2005 when both parties signed a joint paper on the European integration. I think this is the only way for the moment, at least. I think this is the only way we should look at it. The problems of relations with other countries, indeed, appear, and that's the role of all of us to correct our course in such a way as to ensure that European integration.

MR. HILL: I think Ambassador Chirtoaca has given a good enumeration of the standards and values that go into what is perceived as European or, generally, broader European integration or orientation. Clearly, my experience is that most Moldovans that I had dealings with were broadly oriented toward becoming a part of the larger European community, specifically the European Union.

The problem is juxtaposing this with countries to the east or to the north, because I found on a personal level relatively little hostility among Moldovans to having good relations on a personal level with either Ukraine or the Russian Federation, although they might object to policies.

But I think it's very important to focus on these and focus on what you mean by east or west or European and non-European. I'm reminded by some of the very emotional debates of 2002, 2003 when representatives of various organizations said, "No, we want a European solution to the Transdnistran problem, we don't want federalization." Well, my German colleagues were very puzzled to what respect a federation is now the European phenomenon. I mean, it was quite clear that what the people meant is they didn't want a certain kind of federation that left the country in a non-viable state. And so it's good to be very clear what you're talking about.

So I come back to that basic set of values is I think broadly shared by most of the Moldovan public, and given a chance to work at it freely, that's the direction that Moldova will go. BOND: I'd just note, before this session, I was doing some reading on Moldova, and on the 23rd of September, an association of sociologists and demographers, so-called Vox-Populi, took a referendum on Moldova's future, and 63 percent of the respondents said that they supported Moldova's eventual entry into the European Union. Only 12 percent of the country were against it.

Please, further questions? Any further questions from the audience? Please.

JONAS ROLETT: My name is Jonas Rolett from the Open Society institute.

You know, one of the things that is evident whenever there's a discussion of Moldova is that it lives in, kind of, a rough neighborhood, and a lot of issues which we've been discussing today relate directly, I think, to trying to survive in that zone.

I wanted to ask a little bit, given that there is consensus among the speakers about the direction of Moldova, a little bit about Western instruments that can, sort of, assist, push, pull Moldova in its stated direction. We know, of course, that there's the prospect, at least, of E.U. membership, and there are lots of instruments that the European Union has at its disposal to, sort of, promote reform and to assist Moldova, generally, to move in that direction. I'm wondering a little bit about, since we're here in Washington, what instruments the U.S. might have, particularly on issues related to energy, democratic consolidation, support within the spheres of international diplomacy, et cetera. Thank you.

MR. BOND: Dr. Hill, you might want to address OSCE in particular in that, in terms of how we could use the OSCE.

MR. HILL: Well, everybody turns -- OK, sure thing -- everybody turns to the American on the panel.

We've mentioned the Millennium Challenge Account, which is a way in which the current administration in Washington has found to address providing assistance based upon conditionality and rewarding performance. That is one area.

One other area that has been, I think, recently both Washington and the embassy have done is to make efforts to treat Moldova as a whole country and to try to find ways without providing any basis for legal recognition of the Transdnestr entity to provide assistance to people throughout the country, including on the left bank, which has been a way -- to do it in a way that is reinforcing of the idea that this is one country, all of the population should benefit from -- and should see -- that the population on the left bank should see benefits from association with the broader outside community.

In terms of the OSCE, I mean, I could exhaust the rest of the time with recommendations, but with the OSCE and other international bodies, the first thing is for the U.S. to provide personnel and involvement, both financing and personnel. Unfortunately, recently, the United States has been understandably preoccupied with the Middle East and South Asia, and it's been to the great detriment of our involvement with organizations that work on the ground, not only in Moldova but elsewhere through a broad swathe of Eurasia. And this is invaluable. Organizations on the ground provide direct contact, direct information, daily day-to-day back and forth with officials, both support and feedback when they have something not terribly supportive to provide.

Yes, given the current economic situation, not only in the U.S. but worldwide, it's not a great time -- it's never a great time to suggest that one needs to reverse -- instead of declining contributions, raise them. But one needs to keep in mind -- from the U.S. needs to keep in mind the great necessity of maintaining American support and American personnel in these international operations that go out on the ground and provide a direct and less structured contact with governments, civil society and people, less structured contact than you can get formally by doing it through formal, accredited, national diplomatic missions.

That's the very short list. I mean, there's undoubtedly more that I could cite.

MR. LUPAN: Just a very brief mention. As I mentioned before, one of the main (inaudible) for Moldova and for the future of Moldova is a matter of accession to the European Union. That agreement that Moldova is supposed to sign with new agreement going beyond the partnership and cooperation agreement, this is something that Moldova really wants. This is the governmental position, but it is also the position of the civil society that issued a statement on these matters now in August with relation to the events in Georgia.

This is one of the things which I have mentioned before. There is need for Moldova to receive positive signals that it will receive -- it will be treated as a European country. It will receive more attention, but it should be also conditional on reforms. And these reforms should be encouraged and supported.

When we think about the involvement of the U.S., we, indeed, can speak about the involvement with the government and with preparation of the government or, let's say, training of the governmental officials for those tasks that they need to fulfill. Because as the ambassador mentioned, there is a lack of capacity within the government, not only within the government but also within the civil society there is lack of capacities, because both are representing Moldova. Moldova, unfortunately, is underdeveloped, and that's why we cannot develop neither one nor another.

What I can add is that the civil society, at least, has some capacity, some limited capacity. It is coming out with policies and recommendations. This has been done on 23rd of September with another opinion of the experts with regard to the Transdnestr problem. This was done in August when the civil society experts came out with their opinion on the events in Georgia and the impact on Moldova. They have called the government to cooperate on -- eventually on a study for the Moldovans' future security. These are the methods that, unfortunately, cannot be done without support.

The training and the preparations, good advice would be sometimes very helpful. With regard to energy worldwide, as I mentioned, there is a slight chance, but it does exist, that in winter Moldova could face energy cuts, particularly in gas. I don't know what would be the best solution for this problem, if it will happen at all. Last time, Moldova was supplied gas from Ukraine. I'm not sure this will happen this time. If it happens, Moldova needs to be prepared for contingencies, and in this respect perhaps we should look at other options and you're asking, look at other options to support Moldova in energy field through its neighbors, through Ukraine, through eventually Romania, although relations with Romania are not great.

But this probably can be U.S. support, this probably can be European support for Moldova, and, therefore, it might be under certain circumstances accepted even if it comes through Romania.

And I think that one of the real instruments that already exists in the field of democracy but encourages Moldova and that makes Moldova move ahead with all sorts of reforms is the Council of Europe. I think this instrument should be used continuously for further monitoring and, of course, advice for Moldova with regard to those reforms that I have mentioned that are necessary for Moldova. And OSCE here, as well, has necessary instruments. U.S. is present in this organization, in OSCE, I mean. It can support such projects for Moldova, as Moldova would need.

AMB. CHIRTOACA: I would just briefly about the conditionality as one of the tools and driving force behind democratic reforms in the transitional countries. Definitely, there is a big difference between central European countries. I mean, (inaudible) Baltic for Baltic's union and Bulgaria, Romania. They've been promised a clear (inaudible) for new integration, which is not the case of Moldova.

I agree with the idea, we are negotiating now, so since '98 we have partnership and cooperation agreements with E.U., just as right that we conceded to sign another association and civilization agreement, and maybe and definitely for this negotiation we'll start after the 2009 new elections. That's why, again, this is so important to mention it.

And it's not (inaudible) of E.U. conditionality, so-called Copenhagen criteria, words because, again, the integration of Moldova's pursuit as a national idea with a large commitment, with reliable polls, even sociological polls, in terms of (inaudible) more than 70 percent of population. We have much more modest indicators (inaudible) around one set of population in favor with (inaudible). This is all about to be neutral, to have a constitutional (inaudible) of public policy and debate inside the society. We are dependent on natural gas 100 percent. This is our national security concern. I do not have very negative perception of winter problems. I do not think that there will be difficulties in the relationship with Ukraine and Russia ally provoked a couple of years ago. They, sort of, (inaudible) policy of Moscow.

Anyway, we have to be justified, and this is a very good sign, so we have good relations with Azerbaijan corporations, and we are looking at a good terminal. We invite the MCC American corporation to take part in the reconstruction of well terminal on (inaudible) to develop the infrastructure. It's all about MCC complex strategy. It's reconstruction of infrastructure roads, qualitative (inaudible) on public health, and we consider that here in the United States of America plays a great role, because this is roughly $300 million to $350 million will be granted to local and American corporations, and this is an economic and business platform for further development for some more, different involvement, and this is an (inaudible) for attracting investments and to ensure there are growing economic, stable, growing, economic development of my country.

And, of course, Transdnistria, this is a permanent, open and transparent dialogue with the Department of State with other bodies that are involved in a way (inaudible) in a frozen conflict. That means I can assure you this is the biggest part of our job (inaudible) diplomats (inaudible) in Washington, D.C.

We understand that (inaudible) limited capacity for small countries. It has a clear geopolitical dimension, has a clear strategic (inaudible) who are witnessing the emerging new security world in Europe, and, of course, we would like to move closer to more stable zone, and we'd like to use this moment of opportunity, but, again, it's still very risky.

Of course, we need assistance, partnership and five plus two exactly for U.S. (inaudible) of European Union, especially after Nicolas Sarkozy mediation in Georgia crisis. This is a new fact that gives new dynamics, and we would like to use them in the most positive and constructive way just to get closer to the Transdnistria conflicts (inaudible). Thank you.

MR. BOND: Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador.

I'd like to turn the floor over to John Finerty, who is -- and deserves the credit for organizing this session today and has done all the work to put this program together.

JOHN FINERTY: Thank you. I'll try to be brief here.

I was interested in something Ambassador Hill mentioned about the, sort of, business interests in the left bank of Transdniestra being more conciliatory, and I think this had a lot to do with E.U. borders, just the mission there and cutting down on some of the black marketing things like this. And some of us on the staff (inaudible).

It seems to me, though, that if you have the right coalition of forces where Russia decided for one reason or another to go along with the settlement, to get out of the way of a settlement, and if the suggestion is that your government has made, Mr. Ambassador, concessions, if you will, to resolve this situation, that could be done.

I don't have in front of me the legislation that goes back to 2005 on the principles of the Transdniestra situation. It seems to me, though, there is little there that would -- it leaves too much space for the folks who operate in Transdniestra.

Would that legislation have to be changed?

AMB. CHIRTOACA: This time I will start and we'll go right to the left.

No, the legislation will not be changed. We consider it will provoke or destabilize the situation, and this legislation has been voted on the basis large consensus among all the political parties in our parliament. Nobody will revise or give back or just put under the impression it's basic, but this is the basic principles. So the problem is flexibility, and there's always a certain degree of flexibility will be thin interpretation.

But this is a package of (inaudible). We are speaking about a large autonomy of Transdniestra region populated mostly by ethnic Moldovans, and the rest of the Russian-speaking -- but the biggest minority is the Ukrainian-speaking minority and then Bulgarian and Russian. So there is no basis for any kind of other approach. But this is a negotiated status -- special status of the region all about. That's why this is a main element I mentioned in my presentation of the future negotiations.

Regarding the OSCE (inaudible) left bank (inaudible), this is a (inaudible) all a perception of a confidence -- consolidating the future confidence measures. And when Transdniestra business, this is the kind of (inaudible) in eastern part of Moldova. So we'll be involved in (inaudible) projects financed by MCC. It was involved in the United States government. This is (inaudible) create and form new channels of communication. And the E.U. result of that is supportive. The E.U. would like also an opinion and would like also just to assist financially and to take part in this project and communication.

(inaudible) before all these events. Now, this is a little bit -- well, it's a different situation, but these principles remain as the basic elements of our conflict settlement. LUPAN: With business interests in 2005 law, hypothetically speaking, indeed, they do not contradict each other, in my personal opinion. The point is that this law clearly states that it was for certain business interests. What does it actually mean by that? It means that what Moldova already started to implement, the return of the Transdniestran enterprise under its control within the economics has yielded some posted results in the sense that there is less, at least, speculation about what and who does in Transdniestran region and with business interests. They have been reduced.

There is a certain reduction of illegal business in Transdniestra, and that is the point. The point is, legally or illegally, legal or illegal business. It does not block, basically, the development of business. That's what we should aim for, and I think this is the point where we should come and we are coming to the development of business in Moldova, as a whole. The development of business in Moldova as a whole should set some standards that would allow for both Moldovan and Transdniestran business to develop freely without harm and actually promote business, because that would be, of course, helpful for the whole country, and it would provide more taxes and better incomes and so on and more tax.

MR. HILL: OK. I told the Moldovan government in 2005, when they were considering the law, that I thought it restricted their flexibility in negotiating unduly, and I still think that, but it's not a fatal restriction. And, you know, laws can be amended if situations change and if circumstances change.

Business on the left bank, I didn't say the businessmen were good guys. I did say they were interested in the Western European, North American market and had been more successful in left bank -- or right bank, excuse me, western Moldovan enterprises, which are still oriented largely toward the Russian and Ukrainian market. But the point here is that the interest of many of the entrepreneurs on the left bank is pointing toward being able to conduct commerce on the greater European market, and this offers an opportunity for creating conditions that would encourage them to integrate politically into a Moldovan community.

As a matter of fact, following the 2005 law, the negotiations and the package, all significant Transdnierstran enterprises have registered as economic agents of the Republic of Moldova. They receive Moldovan seal stamps, documentation for trade with the European Union. They even receive preferences, E.U. preferences operating as economic agents of the Republic of Moldova. Integration here on the economic side has proceeded far in advance of any political integration within the country.

What worries the businessmen, what is right now the -- they don't trust the political institutions in Moldova, and what has been given by Moldovan authorities, they say, "Well, the Moldovan authorities could take away again with the stroke of a pen," and they want a political guarantee and some sort of political system or autonomy or something that guarantees their ability to defend these preferences. And that's, basically, in very, very blunt terms what one of the most fundamental issues in the negotiations. There are others. My whole point in this was, though, that there is an element on the left bank that actually is favorably inclined toward integration in Moldova, and the Moldovan government has been at times very skillful in using this phenomenon, and it's a phenomenon that I would encourage, both all to use because it's a way of narrowing the differences between the two banks rather than concentrating on what divides them. And there are other things in the historical memory that prove divisive.

I know we're reaching the end. I'd like to say one more thing, just to get back to the assistance and what outsiders can do and other things. We can give all sorts of advice as to what various authorities in Moldova, whether in Chisinau or Tiraspol, should do.

The thing that strikes me, though -- something worth keeping in mind, because I'm not sure I have the ultimate answer to it -- is when you give advice, then someone locally has to carry it out. And if what you have in the country is a population composed of elderly people in villages, pensioners and their grandchildren, with the adult working population working abroad and sending money back, you have the ultimate capacity problem, and it's one that I've seen increasingly and consistently going on in Moldova.

And one of the things, whether authorities in Moldova or those that help from outside, need constantly to keep in mind is a way of encouraging the development of businesses, industries and jobs in Moldova that attract and keep talented young and middle-aged people in the country that provides the basic capacity base for doing all of the things that the country can do. It's not something that can be solved quickly, and it's not something that can be attacked directly through a single program, but it runs now as an undercurrent that affects, at least in my estimation and my experience in the country, it affects almost all initiatives that either domestic authorities or international bodies in other countries involved from the outside have to deal with is simply not that the people aren't talented but there just aren't enough of them, because too many are working abroad because there aren't the opportunities at home.

Thanks very much.

MR. BOND: I mean, it's sort of circular, but by integrating into Europe and meeting conditions of European integration, you will create an environment in which people (inaudible). But that's the direction the country obviously has to go.

Well, we are out of time, and I want to thank our speakers and their participation today. Also thank our audience for posing questions.

And all of this will be transcribed and available on our Web site in about 48 hours, I'm told, on our Helsinki Commission Web site. Thank you very much.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

18 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Official Kremlin Int'l News Broadcast

September 24, 2008 Wednesday

HEARING OF THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE; SUBJECT: EAST OR WEST? THE FUTURE OF DEMOCRACY IN MOLDOVA;
CHAIR BY: CLIFF BOND, SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT ADVISER, CSCE;
WITNESSES: AMBASSADOR NICOLAE CHIRTOACA, AMBASSADOR OF THE REPUBLIC OF MOLDOVA TO THE UNITED STATES; VLAD LUPAN, SOROS FOUNDATION-MOLDOVA, EUROPEAN INITIATIVES PROGRAM; WILLIAM HILL, NATIONAL DEFENSE UNIVERSITY AND FORMER HEAD OF THE OSCE MISSION TO MOLDOVA; LOCATION: 1539 LONGWORTH HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 10:10 A.M. EDT DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 2008

LENGTH: 15131 words

HEARING OF THE UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE (HELSINKI COMMISSION) (AS RELEASED BY THE HELSINKI COMMISSION) SUBJECT: EAST OR WEST? THE FUTURE OF DEMOCRACY IN MOLDOVA CHAIRED BY: CLIFF BOND, SENIOR STATE DEPARTMENT ADVISER, CSCE WITNESSES: AMBASSADOR NICOLAE CHIRTOACA, AMBASSADOR OF THE REPUBLIC OF MOLDOVA TO THE UNITED STATES; VLAD LUPAN, SOROS FOUNDATION-MOLDOVA, EUROPEAN INITIATIVES PROGRAM; WILLIAM HILL, NATIONAL DEFENSE UNIVERSITY AND FORMER HEAD OF THE OSCE MISSION TO MOLDOVA LOCATION: 1539 LONGWORTH HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 10:10 A.M. EDT DATE: WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 2008

MR. BOND: Ladies and gentlemen, welcome to today's briefing organized by the Helsinki Commission. The title of today's briefing is, "East or West? The Future of Democracy in Moldova."

My name is Cliff Bond. I am a State Department representative on the Helsinki Commission. Chairman Hastings had planned to join us here today to share the meeting. Unfortunately, he was called away on House business. He may join us later on, but we are lucky to have Congressman Joseph Pitts with us who is a member of the Helsinki Commission.

And let me invite Congressman Pitts to say a few words.

REP. JOSEPH PITTS (R-PA): Thank you, Mr. Ambassador. Thank you for setting up this important briefing.

The issues currently facing Eastern Europe are of great concern and deserve priority consideration by the OSCE and the participating states. This is a critical time for the region, and its next steps and future actions will send an important message to the rest of the world. Russia's recent invasion of the Republic of Georgia has shown its expansionist goals and raise questions about the future of Eastern Europe and the potential for the European bloc.

Since its independence the Republic of Moldova has faced many political challenges, in part due to the disputes over Transdnistria. Nonetheless, the country has taken steps toward political and economic freedom. It has held free and fair elections, it's opened its markets, it's engaged in negotiations in efforts to resolve the situation in Transdnistria.

However, there are still concerns raised over issues in Moldova, and I particularly remain concerned that Moldova continues to be a major source and transit country for sex trafficking. Moldovan women have been trafficked to the Middle East, in Eastern Europe, in Western Europe, and girls, young women, have even been trafficked within the country from rural areas.

And so I'm very interested in hearing today's testimonies and hope the important issues will be addressed. And I wanted to express my gratitude to Chairman Hastings for scheduling this important hearing to discuss the future of Moldova, and I look forward to learning from our distinguished panelists who are with us today.

Thank you.

MR. BOND: Thank you very much, Mr. Congressman.

We have, as you said, several very distinguished presenters here with us today. They are the Moldovan ambassador to the United States, Ambassador Nicolae Chirtoaca, as well as Vlad Lupan from the European Initiatives Program of the Soros Foundation, and Dr. William Hill, who's a former head of the OSCE mission in Moldova.

We'll begin with Ambassador Chirtoaca, and we'll follow through with the other two presenters, and then we'll open for questioning.

Mr. Ambassador?

AMB. CHIRTOACA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, Congressman Pitts, (inaudible), ladies and gentlemen.

I would like to start my presentation by expressing my gratitude to the Helsinki Commission for organizing and hosting this event and for the possibility to address the issue related to democracy development in my country, the Republic of Moldova, from the perspective of approaching 2009 parliamentary elections and taking into consideration the changing geopolitical environment in Eastern Europe caused mostly by the recent Georgia crisis that has a direct impact on the settlement of so-called frozen conflicts in the ex- Soviet states. Since the beginning of this century, Moldova has made visible progress, moving from a typically weak state (inaudible) confronted with multiple problems and obsessed by an identity crisis to relatively stable democratic institutions, functional government structures, growing economy -- GDP growth is around 6, 7 percent per year -- and an economy based on the private sector.

Throughout this period, (inaudible) limited internal capacities (inaudible) for change. The Republic of Moldova has remained committed to democratic reforms and (inaudible) of the society, providing security and stability in the region, mostly through efforts painted as peaceful resolution of the separatist crisis and the territorial reintegration of the state.

Following the 2005 parliamentary elections, the government continues its effort in order to improve democratic governance in the country. It's reducing corruption, pushing through economic reforms and welcoming foreign investments.

At the same time, President Voronin made clear his intentions that the Republic of Moldova follow in the path of other successful post-communist countries and draw closer to the European Union as well as develop partnership relations with NATO within the framework of the Individual Partnership Action Plan.

What I would like today -- my presentation will be based mostly on the idea of how to measure democratic reforms, how deep are democratic changes, what are criteria to approach this problem? And, of course, I will not -- speaking as a representative of my country, I will rely mostly on the appreciation given to my country by the international organizations, first of all, by the Council of Europe who is monitoring very, very closely the democratic reforms in my country. The organizational security in cooperation with Europe is engaged in this process, as well as the European Union.

I would like to remind you, Moldova just ended an entire period and implemented the three-year action plan, and we have reports concerning the state of democracy in my country. I think it will help the participants just to see more clearly the picture without making quite a lot of publicity in the favor of one issue or another.

But I would like to start with the Millennium Challenge Account eligibility, and Moldova has been offered the chance to develop the compact in December 2006. This eligibility is the kind of -- not reward -- it's the appreciation of a partner country, a good policy performance and is based on scoring above the median, at least half of 17 indicators in each of three policy categories: Ruling justly, investing in people and economic freedom.

The first category contains indicators that mirror the quality of democratic governance: Country performance and freedom of expression and belief, association and organizational rights, the rule of law, respect of human and civil rights and independence of judiciary.

The conditionality -- I underline -- the conditionality of the assistance provided within the framework of cooperation with the Millennium Challenge Corporation help my government and improve the governance in accordance with the recommended norms and good practices. First of all, the gradual reduction of corruption and state bureaucracy, and this way is making irreversible the market and democratic reforms in Moldova.

But what are the appeal of the leading (inaudible) European organizations? First of all, I would like to start with the recent European Commission progress state report on the implementation of the European Neighborhood Policy in 2007 made public on April 2008. During the reporting period, the Republic of Moldova, it said in this report, "made good progress in most areas, including democracy and rule of law. The 2007 local elections were generally well administered, and voters were offered a genuine choice." I'm quoting from the report, it's not my interpretation of this paper.

Other (inaudible) during the reporting period were substantial progress in improving the institutional framework and procedures on control and certification of origin, which allows E.U. to grant the Republic of Moldova additional economic (ph) state preferences.

(inaudible) on visa facilitation and the admission and the positive cooperation with E.U. Border Assistance Mission, known as the EUBAM. The Republic of Moldova also cooperated closely with the E.U. in all questions related to the Transdnistria settlement effort, and work is ongoing to put into practice the proposals of the president of the Republic of Moldova on confidence-building measures.

A look at self-government and (inaudible) legislative acts, including on administrative decentralization, local public administration, regional development were adopted in December 2006. This brought national legislation closer to the recommendation of the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities in Europe.

The Republic of Moldova adopted a comprehensive strategy and implementation plan for reforming its judicial system. It's the capacity of the Supreme Council of Magistrates, the body in charge of judicial self-administration, were consolidated, and the Department of Judicial Administration subordinated as the Ministry of Justice was created and started operating in January of 2008.

The code of ethics for judges was approved in November 2006 and judicial (inaudible) under the (inaudible) of Supreme Council. It was introduced by law in 2007.

My country also (inaudible) accepting activities in the fields of combating corruption and raising awareness on corruption in light of phenomenon, as well took steps in the area to adjust its legislative framework to international standards and to (inaudible) institutional framework. I would like also to remind you that we take part in the Threshold Millennium Challenge Corporation Program since 2006, and it's also focused on reducing and combating corruption.

The National Human Rights Action Plan 2004-2008 is under implementation in the context of ongoing efforts to battle human trafficking, (inaudible) for victims of human trafficking while it's establishing five pilot regions. The National Action Plan of Anti- Trafficking 2007-2009 was set up with National Committee of Anti- Trafficking ensuring full implementation.

In February 2008, the European Convention for Human Trafficking (inaudible), and the Republic of Moldova has been the first country to ratify this convention.

The broadcasting role, the mass media freedom is one of the issue of concerns, and the opposition is not really happy how it functions. In 2006, a new law that has been adopted by the parliament provides a good legislative basis to ensure respect for the freedom of expression. The correct implementation in a manner which promotes the plurality of the media has to be ensured.

The biggest problem of Moldova, and especially the current media and written press, is the fact that they are not financially free, and the financial freedom of this mass media goes together with economic reforms and is good competition and the monies that are paid for to a newspaper and to give radio stations just to ensure this independence. The next parliamentary elections I expect to be called in mid-March 2009, so the parliament will decide.

The parliament of Moldova, because we are parliamentarian republic, will form the new government, will elect the president, as the second and last tenure of President Vladimir Voronin comes to an end next year. The parliament has passed a number of amendments to the electoral code that dates back to '97. According to the OSCE, I quote, "It provides an adequate basis for the conduct of democratic elections if implemented in good faith," the end of the quote.

In 2007, a new law of political parties -- I would like to remind you that we have, according to the last report of Freedom House, 28 political parties and organizations, because it's quite a lot for small Moldova. Sorry, I'm saying that. Maybe, who knows how many parties we need?

But there are a lot of political parties (inaudible) of the electoral code and was adopted and submitted to Venice Commission. Adopted in December 21, 2007, the law aims to regulate legislation functioning, financing of political parties (inaudible) electoral system, all transparent and less prone to abuse.

However, it also creates a number of restrictions that can be explained by the need to weigh the efficiency of the current party system as well as the national security concerns. For example, the threshold was increased from 4 to 6 percent. The electoral blocs were prohibited and certain restrictions to persons holding dual citizenship were introduced.

It is worth to be mentioned that Venice Commission recommended 5 percent of this threshold (inaudible). It is also worth mentioning that electoral blocs are prohibited to participate at elections in such European countries with long-lasting democratic traditions, like Germany, Austria, (inaudible), Hungary and Finland. At the same time, according to Moldovan legislature, the parties enjoy the right to create post-electoral colleges. According to the civil societies (inaudible) represented a vibrant aspect of Moldova's public space. As is mentioned in this year's Freedom House Nations in Transit report, which just appeared, by the way, I quote, "The number of active organizations is significant, and only certain NGOs have the capacity to contribute to public policies. (inaudible) and activities are developing slowly but lack (inaudible). At the same time, more reporting efforts did not bear the expected results.

Dependence on donor support leaves NGOs vulnerable and poses a key challenge to the sector's development. Until NGOs become transparent and open working with media, they will lack credibility in their mission to promote democratic matters. And, unfortunately, quite a lot of think tanks and NGOs are fully involved in the political processes, and, in this way, our citizens are liking alternative information (inaudible) democratization processes in my country.

Now, about Transdnistria conflict, our strategy in a conflict settlement, about how we approach this issue just now, especially after the August events in South Caucasus region.

For about a year, Moldova has been vigorously pushing for resuming the discussion between the current international format known as five plus two. I would like to remember this is international format with participation of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, Russia, Ukraine, as mediators; European Union and United States of America as observers, as well as the Republic of Moldova and secessionist authorities.

The government strategy for conflict resolution is based on a complex package approach to all the issues related to the (inaudible) crisis: Political, economic, social, military and humanitarian.

The package proposals includes the development and adoption of a special (inaudible) statute for Transdnistria region, while respecting the sovereignty and (inaudible) integrity of the Republic of Moldova. The consolidation of the neutrality studies, neutral studies, constitutional (inaudible) we call it, because it's written -- our constitution of Moldova, it's a neutral state. (inaudible) military troops from the national territory, a condition of ownership right and of certain special guarantees to the population of the eastern part of the country, currently under the control of separatist authorities.

These particular results were adopted in 2006 by Moldovan experts who tried to find a common denominator that would accommodate very small dollars and Russia interests without undermining the viability of a future reintegrated state or legalizing Russian military presence in Moldova.

The key elements of the negotiation process is a special (inaudible) status for Transdnistria region. Clear division of confidences in (inaudible), though it is functional central institutions. (inaudible) of Transdnistria region under the Moldovan parliament. The last part is important because of the spring 2009 parliament elections, and (inaudible) the population from the eastern bank of Dniestr River will take part in this democratic exercise.

The separate (inaudible) of the region will be, in part, (inaudible) in the (inaudible) legislature, and the (inaudible) total population currently is estimated at 13 percent.

The European Union and the United States of America long ago welcomed the package proposal as a good foundation and platform for viable and long-lasting settlement. It is necessary to mention that before the Georgian crisis Moldova has never formally -- sorry, Moscow has never formally reacted to our proposals in spite of our government persistent attempts to elicit a positive response. My country is currently observing the (inaudible) region while reiterating its firm belief of the exclusively political solutions of all of the disputes to be taken to the negotiations table. The same position is also reflected in the statement by the government of the Republic of Moldova issued on August 29 regarding the situation in South Ossetia and Abkhazia. It's (inaudible) that Moldova does not see the international recognition of these provinces as a stabilizing factor of the situation.

At this point, we can clearly state that the (inaudible) mediators and observers (inaudible) still continue. Moldova insists on five plus two international format. At this time being, as far as we know, neither (inaudible) or Moscow does not have a different approach, accepting five plus two as a basic format for negotiations. (inaudible) the president of the Republic of Moldova and of the Russian affiliation from the (inaudible) this year. There is a decision of (inaudible) to stop so-called moratorium on (inaudible) and begin a meeting in the three plus two format (inaudible) Russia (inaudible) on September 8 (inaudible) are developments that bring assurance of an early resumption of the five plus two international negotiation format.

However, it will be wrong and premature to conclude that Moscow has fully abandoned hopes of achieving a settlement on its own terms. There are no indications that Russia is prepared to renounce its long-standing policy of using the end result of Transdnistria conflict as leverage to circumscribe Moldova's foreign policy options or to legalize its military presence in Moldova, at least during so-called post-conflict years. The main goal is contained in the famous Kozak memorandum from 2003.

At the same time, there are a few further concessions our government can make without compromising the future of Moldovan state and the European integration strategy. Despite the progress made, effective implementation of reforms remain a challenge. In order to advance democracy, peace and total integration of the country, Moldova has to be successful in its effort to end the transition from the Soviet past to the sustainable and durable democracy of market economy and efficient governance.

But I would like just to invite you to address the problem of the current state of democracy from the point of view of more sustainable and less politicized. We understand there are three different and distinct periods of transition, and we are now just in between the second and the third. (inaudible) liberalization we passed in '95- '94, then a democracy stabilization that took us seven, eight years, and now we are ending by democracy consolidation, very often, opposition and quite a lot of (inaudible). They try to use an ideal model (inaudible), how it works in developed countries with maybe hundreds of years of experience, trying to compare with the model and criticizing (inaudible), which is basically not constructive and not a positive approach to (inaudible).

Moldova is still in transition. It's monitored very closely, it's given assistance. The biggest key problem is institutional deficiencies. The system works, but, of course, we need probably three or five years and the transition. Now, this transition is based on European and Western paradigm of development, and the Moldovan policy, to be integrated into the union is the biggest driving force and European model, which is basically the Western one, is taken as (inaudible) people like just this model for development of the country.

Concluding, I would like to mention that there's a large consensus in the country among the leading political parties, nine representatives of the developing (inaudible) and the socially visible and responsible civil society organization regarding the European future of Moldova.

There's a common understanding that only real and consistent democratic reforms can bring Moldova closer to the implementation of (inaudible) built around national strategy for development, to restore our historic and cultural ties to Europe that date back to the (inaudible) of Roman empire, an early Christian period of the modern Western civilization.

The integration of the countries of today's European institution, a leading organization, first of all, the European Union is understood as main way of implementation of the vision and strategy.

Thank you very much for your attention, and I appreciate the opportunity to speak here today and welcome any questions that you may have.

MR. BOND: Thank you.

Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador. We'll turn to Mr. Vlad Lupan of the Soros Foundation now.

MR. LUPAN: Thank you, Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thanks for the opportunity to share my views about the democracy in Moldova, as well as, thank you for the concern that the commission shows for my country. I hope this extremely encouraging attitude continues, and the commission will organize a hearing on Moldovan matters ahead of 2009 elections.

I would also like to thank the Moldova Foundation based in Washington for assisting me in attending this session.

I don't intend to speak about the comparative success or successes of the current government, thus its existing problems, as the government has the opportunity to promote its point of view extensively through the existing network of officials, official visits and meetings.

The civil society has fewer possibilities; therefore, I will go to the point and focus mainly on those concrete shortcomings that present a serious concern for democracy in Moldova.

I think, first of all, three matters should be taken into account. In 2008, we can agree, is an eventful year for Moldova. First of all, the country is approaching general and presidential elections at the beginning of 2009. Secondly, 2008 is also the year when the action plan signed between the European Union and the Republic of Moldova already expired formally. Thirdly, as mentioned about the 2000, it's also a year of changes with impact on Transdnistran conflict resolution and Russia's role in it, particularly after the war in Georgia.

The state of democracy in Moldova and the elections are matters of concern for people now. The state was admirable by regional standards at the beginning of its independence, and the country was the first from the countries of newly created CIS to be admitted into the Council of Europe.

The local assessment of the situation, the indicators of such international non-governmental organizations, as Freedom House, Amnesty International and Transparency International, do not place now Moldova in a position of leader.

The Council of Europe announced this year that it does not intend to renounce its monitoring of Moldova since the country did not meet the democratic criteria that would allow for such an image-making decision.

The state of democracy is closely linked now with country's European aspirations. Moldova signed in February 2005 a three-year action plan with the European Union. This (inaudible) the step-by- step implementation of those democratic reforms that Moldova needs in order to come closer to the E.U.

And by European rules, Moldova should abide by Copenhagen criteria: The stability of democratic institutions, the rule of law, human rights and the respect for minorities as well as a free and functioning market and the capacity to face the obligation of an E.U. member state.

The European action plan with Moldova left some question marks, some still unanswered. The E.U., indeed, decided to encourage Moldova in 2008 due to the fact that it was already facing a difficult relationship with Russia on Transdnistran conflict resolution as well as due to the fact that the country already on E.U. and NATO border still made some steps toward mostly legalistic reforms.

At the beginning of 2008, the Europeans took the decision to formally extend the action plan for a brief period of time, while in May 2008 they started -- they took a decision to start a reflection process in the new agreement with Moldova.

Even though there are concerns in relations to Russia's intentions, the E.U. remains also concerned about the pace of reform in Moldova. In its country report that was mentioned of April 3, as well as during its May 2008 decision on the reflection process, it stated that the action plan implementation needs progress in five crucial areas. Those are exactly the areas that are mentioned as Copenhagen criteria.

Moldova also suggested that it has arrears in such fields as the independence of justice, fight against corruption, freedom of the media and investment climate and business environment.

One more warning came from the European Union along the May 2008 decision to support Moldova with a reflection process. The Moldovan government was asked to ensure free and fair elections in 2009. Such a warning came as it is widely believed that there is a high temptation of the governing party to use state resources and their control over the public media (inaudible) on competition or fraud the election in less visible ways.

(inaudible) one is of primary attention as it forms the base for a sustainable democracy and respect for human rights, the independence of justice. The government again declared the reform of the judiciary as its priority in 2008. This is indeed true, although most of the so-called achievements meant presenting by the minister of justice a Council of Europe opinion to the prosecutor's office, creating a commission to draft a concept paper and other similar actions and achievements.

The Moldovan non-government organization lawyers for human rights rightly assesses that the most relevant indicator of the state of judiciary in Moldova and about its independence is the number of cases that are directed to the European Court of Human Rights. And among the state members of the Council of Europe, Moldova holds the first place with the highest number of cases per capita -- 15 cases per 1 million citizens. Analyses, both governmental and non-governmental, show that of all the cases that Moldova was accused, about half are related to the faulty judiciary procedures and decisions.

Despite officially expressed concerns by prime minister and minister of justice, this reality is the result of the unofficial policies of the current governing party implemented since its accession to power in 2001. The independence, of course, was affected in 2002 by mass cleaning of judges by the Moldovan president who is also the chairman of the Communist Party. He refused to extend the nomination period of the judges at that time without any written explanation. At the same time, there were cases of nominations of some other judges based on loyalty to the ruling party, as Freedom House reported yet in 2003.

Now, the civil society assesses that such a cleaning that started in 2002 led to an increased interference of the executive power in judiciary. The U.S. State Department report on human rights practices in Moldova from this year, March 2008, confirms that in the case of judiciary, specifically stating that the official pressure and corruption remain the problem.

The problem with the procedure of selection of judges is another point where the Moldovan NGOs agree with the findings of the U.S. State Department report. Thus, the initial phase of elimination is not uncommon. The judges are appointed upon suggestions of the Supreme Council on Magistrates by the president of the country. However, one of the NGO's tests is that under an informal (inaudible), such an appointment is done only after a hearing by the governing Communist Party faction of the parliament and not by the parliament's legal commission. The prosecutor's office is also considered to be affected by the same weaknesses and pressures as the courts.

When we speak about reform in Moldova and the reforms, the local E.U. experts conclude that the adoption of documents regulation and legislation is not followed by their implementation in such a problem that is reported, basically, in all the areas. This is a problem that is not only specific to judiciary.

Thus, we are coming to another important element of a democratic society: Free media. Moldova dropped down, according to the Freedom House reports on that matter as well. Although media legislation legally embraces the European norms as rightly reported, still, the implementation, the matter that we have just mentioned, the implementation of those provisions is done in such a manner as to ensure governing party control over the only national TV, Moldova 1.

Despite promises of reform that the Moldovan president made in May after your meeting, real actions still do not meet the promises. The position parties have no access to the national TV, which is now, by law, a public station. The broadcasting code was previously edited to allow the governing party to preserve control over the Broadcasting Coordination Council. This body then distributed broadcasting frequencies to the politically loyal stations and operated arbitrary licenses (inaudible). There were concrete cases of inappropriate treatment of foreign commentators, journalists or unwanted media by law enforcement, such as the cases of (inaudible) commentators, Romanian TV prohibition and contact (inaudible) with Russia (inaudible) to journalists. These are also raising concerns regarding the freedom of expression.

Even non-important and anti-governmental demonstrations, sometimes by singular people, were violently stopped by police despite the existing legislation.

Media outlets are not closed in Moldova. Their criticism of the governing party is quite often quoted by the Moldovan president as proof of media freedom. However, the impression is that these media are afloat only to be such examples of (inaudible) while obviously they are permanently pressured, and, as mentioned above, limited in distribution and broadcast just to minimize the competition to the government-controlled media. Moldova is the poorest country in Europe, and this makes the investment climate as well as business environment important elements that the state should insure. Moldova's economy is growing this year, particularly when looking at the former USSR this is true. However, when compared with its European neighbors, it seriously lags behind.

Due to that, nearly one-third of the Moldovans have already left to find jobs in the E.U. and Russia. The supply in remittance is already near 50 percent of country's GDP and has provided the opportunities to grow. However, people leaving the country is not a sign of a growing economy. The money transfers cannot mean proper economic development as these are not reinvested into business.

The so-called tax amnesty, operated last year by the government, does not seem to be the best solution to manage the fiscal burden. The unconfirmed rumors of presidential family involvement in taking over many lucrative businesses do not help the situation.

Pressure over foreign investors seem to produce a negative effect regardless of the good intentions.

Last year, reduction of taxes, operated by the government, in an attempt to increase interest in investing in Moldova, was considered by International Monetary Organization as insufficient as to favor foreign direct investment. The FDI is proven by those organizations to grow in countries with predictable business climate and a stable judiciary -- last one being a crucial problem reported about.

Now we can focus on the internal political climate where there are interconnected elements that need our attention.

The governing party made an internal analysis that prompted them to change the electoral legislation, as speculated, to ensure a greater electoral success in 2009. The communists changed the electoral threshold from 4 to 6 percent. They further prohibited pre-electoral critical alliances which are often voted by Moldovan people. And, finally, passed legislation that provides state funds only to those parties that will enter the parliament or local regional governments.

If seen separately, these steps, indeed, may raise minor questions. Since many of those principles are separately present on the European political scene. However, only one year ahead of the elections and taken in conjunction to another -- one to another, they create a commutative effect that is actually anti-democratic.

It affects the right of a large part of the populous to unite, choose and ensure that they are properly represented in the political life. Moreover, the government used the state budget to distribute funds mainly to the communist-led local governments. Moldovan president himself publicly declared that those who did not vote for the Communist party in local 2007 elections will have to pay the price and they receive no state funds, a promise that is now actually implemented. Using state resources to fine voters, in fact, the citizens of own country, is, in my opinion, undemocratic act.

A number of party has been affected as well directly. Signatories, for example, for one -- or for the party's newly created, which started to have impact on Moldovan political life, were subject to excessive questioning by law enforcement bodies. People were called by law enforcement and questioned for hours as to why they want to become a member of that party, who are their relatives. They're asked to sign standing, sitting, with right hand, with left hand and so on.

In case of another parliamentary party that declared during this June congress that the E.U. integration was transformed into unsupported political gain, the government communists accused the party of being devoted to Russia's goals. As we already know, the communists themselves are in negotiations with Russia.

Yes, there is a matter of a new, assertive Russia. European integration, in case of Moldova, was declared the strategic irreversible goal of the country. The Moldovan ruling party also insisted to bring forth the resolution of the Transdnestrian problems and relations with Russia, as the two top priorities of the country since 2006.

After almost unanimously adopting on July 22 of 2005 a law on the principles of the Transdnestrian conflict resolution by the Moldovan parliament, the governing party unexpectedly launched direct, bilateral negotiations with Russia, which provoked an increased amount of concerns. These concerns came out of the previous experience of 2003 when the Kremlin pressed for an unacceptable settlement through a memorandum adopted by Russian presidential (inaudible), Dmitry Kozak.

The unfortunate Kozak precedent made the civil society and political party suspicious of the new negotiations and (inaudible) pressures from national and particularly international (inaudible). The governing party admitted that something that they initially called consultations is taking place and suggested that we prepare a package deal that would be based on the July 2005 law along with other documents that are in line with that law. The government also stated that the deal was drafted in such a way as to already include Russia's interests in it and, thus, make it interesting for Moscow while respecting the Moldovan law. In my opinion, this is in itself a contradiction.

Russia is a country that behaves in real politic manner, projects power and believes in the controlled chaos of separatist region that it actually masters.

Russia is a country that strongly believes in tradeoffs on the international arena. This is a reality on the ground that contradicted assessments that we are not in the 19th century. Indeed, we are not but Russia is.

Moldova cannot negotiate on equal terms in a bilateral negotiation with a country such as Russia, because it cannot offer in tradeoff terms something that Moscow already has: The leverage of Moldova through the Transdnestrian conflict resolution, its military presence and the so-called mediator's role. It seems that the Moldovan officials in charge of the matter, who are the same people who negotiated a bad deal with Kozak in 2003, did not presume that such negotiations meant offering something to Russia that Moldova did not have.

Affirming that Moldova will not yield to Kremlin pressure was unrealistic. It now transpired that Russia was not clearly responding to Moldovan proposal, generating pressure and subsequent concessions, particularly in the economic sphere. The unilateral dependence on Russia gas was already a concern for the government due to a previous decision by that government to provide Russia the control package of shares to the Moldovan statement (inaudible) Moldova gas in exchange for eradicating the debts. However, when faced with lack of Russian response to the governmental package deal on Transdnistria, the government recently followed up with a contradictory move that strengthens Moldovan dependency. The state decided to cede the local distribution network to (inaudible) as well.

Russian companies that border (inaudible) Transdnistrian region without governmental approval were ensured that their new property rights will be recognized. Experts were encouraged to Russia lately while there was not the same level of official visible encouragement to the experts to the E.U., at least through diversified markets and ensuring economic security goals.

These unilateral concessions made in hope to sweeten, sorry to say, Russia did not yield the results. And, contrary, it was rumored that Russia was warning Moldova, Moldovan officials to be more flexible, and that the reason for such a warning will be seen during 2008. It was exactly before the August war in Georgia.

By no coincidence, Moldovan President Voronin was called to meet the Russian president on the day when Dmitry Medvedev announced the decision to recognize South Ossetia and Abkhazia. The next troubling step was an announcement made by the Russian minister of foreign affairs that deciding Moldovan conflict will return to the 2003 Kozak memorandum. This is the very memorandum that was rejected by Moldova as unacceptable and which comes against the Moldovan law of July 2005, which cannot be violated by the Moldovan negotiators.

A number of Moldovan experts believe that further Russian pressure to either implement such a memorandum or to simply promote its interest in Moldova will follow with certainty during 2008, with possible negative repercussions over its populous. Certain political parties might be supported by Moscow. Transdnistrian leadership will be used to put more pressure over Chisinau, particularly through the newly instituted two plus one format of negotiations that is outside the five plus two format and which is not a good format for Moldova, as Chisinau recognizes correctly. This effort is so the autonomous region of Gagauzia in the south of Moldova will be, and already is, reignited. Eventually, some do not even exclude gas cuts in this winter, which happened before, all leading to, if not a social event or a political crisis.

Russian pressure is detrimental for a democratic future of Moldova. (inaudible) is insistently promoting the concept of a future Moldova with a Transdnistria veto over most important foreign policy decisions but also internal decisions, such as E.U. membership. Basically, it's a (inaudible) right over democratic reforms and the Transdnistrian leadership has shown that it is against such reforms. The Transdnistria itself is a dictatorship, and it is against such concepts when it is actually supporting such concepts as the sovereign democracy it is promoting in Russia and the vertical of power, which allow for an unlimited and uncontrolled leadership that declare each of its decisions as democratic.

In conclusion, I would like to state that there is, of course -- there are several dilemmas in Moldova. Indeed, the Russian pressure is real and important factor in Moldova. Indeed, we can expect negative developments, possibly even before December 2008.

However, the geopolitical determinism is not the way to ensure that Moldova should receive unconditional support without seriously implementing democratic reforms.

The Moldovan communists have been responsible for the current situation of Moldova, which is, indeed, deteriorating since they have been, by the way, democratically elected to power. It does seem that they are now trying to avoid yielding to the Russian pressure. They would like the Moldovan civil society and political parties to help them out through statements that reject the Russian proposal, as it seems, so that the president can save face.

The problem is that it is believed that the communists will use the blame game, not only to avoid complications with Russia before elections. As in 2003, they will presumably blame the civil society for not being active enough for the political parties or for the fact that they have deteriorated the relations with Russia, thus place responsibility ahead of the elections on other shoulders.

The dilemma of the civil society, and particularly of the political parties unaffiliated with the government, is how they can help a Communist Party in government that is prosecuting them and does not genuinely implement democratic reforms in a sufficient manner (inaudible) free political competition.

We believe that support for Moldova should be and should exist and should be from now on conditional on reforms.

Thank you very much for your attention.

MR. BOND: Thank you.

And now we'll turn to Dr. William Hill of the National War College, currently of the National War College, formerly a director of the OIC mission in Moldova.

MR. HILL: Thank you, Thank you very much, ambassadors, ladies and gentlemen, our friends.

First of all, I have to state that the remarks I offer here are in my personal capacity and do not necessarily represent the views or position of the National War College or the Department of Defense. I've distributed, or made available, to the commission a short article that may or may not appear in the print soon, which addresses some of the issues involved in the status of the Transdniestran settlement negotiations going on right now.

This briefing does, indeed, come at a sensitive time with much attention on other crucial areas of the former Soviet Union following last month's war in Georgia. In Moldova, the good news out of all of this, first and foremost, I'd presume, is that nobody really seems to be preparing or wish to fight each other from one position or another, and, therefore, any movement toward a settlement is, frankly, likely to be peaceful.

The five plus two negotiations are on the cusp of renewing after some two and a half years without a negotiating round. You may well see a formal session very soon, and attempts have been ongoing to generate work on portions -- or begin expert work on portions of the comprehensive Moldovan package that has been on the table for quite some time.

The Russian Federation has also been more active, in particular, Russian activities were probably instrumental in bringing about a meeting of President Voronin and the Transdniestran leader, Igor Smirnov, last spring, the first time the two had seen each other in almost seven years. The prospects for further movement or success are mixed. Partially, the positions of Chisinau and Tiraspol are pretty far apart. The positions of those who were involved in the process as mediators or observers also are not particularly close together on some issues, and these differences have to be reconciled, the commonalities need to be found before real progress can be made. I would point out one thing that's not generally mentioned but I found during my time there, and I think it's still a phenomenon: There is a potential, and unrealized and perhaps paradoxical potential, for progress in the left bank, in particular in the Transdniestran business community where leaders and representatives of a number of enterprises have made considerable headway for a decade or more in penetrating the Western European and North American market. And these businessmen, entrepreneurs from the left bank are actually oriented toward integration and further operation in Western markets, and this may be a potential for finding common ground that could lead to an acceptable settlement for all parties involved. It doesn't mean that it will happen, but it's something that one might look at.

The real question with the increased activity of the Russian Federation now is whether Russia will work within or outside the generally accepted negotiated framework. In this sense, in my informal conversations with negotiators, both from the OSCE and then particularly U.S. representatives, what I hear from them is generally that we are open to greater Russian activity and constructive Russian initiatives, but these initiatives should contribute then to progress within the five plus two format. In other words, there's nothing wrong with an individual country being active, but it should lead back to the general framework within which we consider an acceptable settlement has to be reached.

I also think that after what I've seen, as after especially the events of August, the U.S. is more active and more supportive of constructive progress and just more active in support in Moldova, and that's probably a good thing.

The other note I'd put to all of this is that a settlement of the Transdniestran conflict, in my view, would be a good thing, but it's not a sine qua non for progress in everything else in Moldova. In other words, I'd like to reiterate what you'll see if you read through. With respect to Moldova in 2008, the absence of a solution to the Transdniestran question will be better than a bad solution that cripples the country's chances for reform and integration into Europe as a whole. For any settlement to succeed, Russia must be a part, but so must the rest of Europe and the North Atlantic community, that is, the E.U. and the U.S.

I'd say commenting on U.S. actions elsewhere in the globe, my Russian colleagues have often said that unilateralism and unilateral solutions are generally not a good thing. The conflict areas in the periphery of the former USSR, like Moldova, are places where I think Moscow would do well to listen to its own counsel, its own advice.

Very briefly, in terms of other elements that have been raised today, the status of Moldovan electoral democracy, this is a classic case of, is the glass half full or half empty? On the half full category, opposition parties generally are allowed - are able to register and conduct activity in Moldova. There's considerable freedom of advocacy, organization and campaigning, and opposition parties have won significant victories in elections and garnered a considerable percentage of the vote. For example, municipal elections in 2007, the opposition won a resounding victory and defeated the communist candidates in Chisinau. So that's the good part.

On the half empty side, indeed, the 2007 law on political parties is worrisome, because it allows the basis for government interference and regulation of all political parties, including opposition political parties, not necessarily a desirable thing. The new 6 percent threshold and the prohibition of electoral blocs is generally aimed, or in Moldovan circumstances, will probably work against diversity and freedom or the success of opposition parties or a multitude parties in electoral competition.

And there's still problems with the use of administrative resources, administrative restrictions on political parties or political prosecutions and investigations of opposition figures or opposition parties.

Now, if you look at the situation in Moldova leading up to the elections in 2009, it leads to a couple of observations. First of all, the ruling party, the PCRM, or Party of Communists, has considerable popular support, and partisans or supporters of this party really don't need to engage in some of the chicanery and administrative juggling in order to promote electoral success of the party.

The party does have a base, so why do this if you want to have free and fair elections?

The other thing is that some of the opposition's problems are of their own making. The opposition, broad right, right center opposition consistently draws over 40 percent of the electorate in Moldova. The problem is, this is split among some 10 to 15 opposition parties where every political leader wishes to be king of his little faction rather than a part of a broad coalition within the rules that would have a chance of electoral success, considerable representation in parliament and perhaps even control. It remains -- it was a problem in the 1990s, it remains a problem late into this decade in Moldova. The opposition does have legitimate complaints about the status of the playing field, rules of the game, but they also have to stop shooting themselves in the foot if they want to be successful.

Overall, I'd say, what we from outside really should encourage is for the U.S., E.U., OSCE, Council of Europe and other international organizations and bodies that engage in electoral monitoring, in human rights monitoring, should remain very active and communicate early to all participants in the Moldovan electoral process, that irrespective of who wins, we expect a clean election, and this is the best way to ensure continued and broad support.

On human rights, in general, we've heard things -- I second what I've heard about difficulties with freedom of expression, in particular, broadcasting is long since of the authorities in Moldova have had the benefit of the good advice of the Council of Europe, E.U., OSCE, and in many respects having to do with public broadcasting, they failed to listen.

Anti-trafficking, this has been a big disappointment. Now, Moldova has done enough recently to get themselves raised back from tier three up to tier two, but since I began working with the Moldovan government in 1999, 2000 to help them draft legislation against trafficking in persons, and more needs to be done on this. It's a problem on both sides of the river. It's sort of been, sort of, like squeezing balloons. First, the traffic went toward Western Europe and the Balkans. As the international community and authorities got a handle on that, it moved toward the east and south. But it's something where clearly the authorities can and should, must do much more.

Corruption and the judicial system is still a big problem, despite a decade and a half of promises of reform from many administrations and work with many international organizations. Some things have been done but not as much has been done as needs to be. And until this is tackled, it's corrosive of trust of citizens in government, and it prevents effective reform in many other areas.

On the economy and business climate, it's a patchy picture here. Moldova has gotten recently good remarks from the IMF and World Bank and is doing a number of things correct in their economy. However, the web of economic reforms is still patchy, and there are problems with implementation, especially in things that are important to the creation of a favorable business and investment climate and allowing small businesses to pop up, especially outside of the capital, and this needs to be implemented.

Given some of these difficulties, you saw Fitch where it recently downgraded the Moldovan economic outlook from positive to stable, because there are some fundamental weaknesses behind this good picture. The biggest one is that there is not enough domestic jobs, enough domestic business, enough domestic investment being created. The figure I had is about 33 percent of the Moldovan GDP comes from remittances from Moldovans who work abroad. The figure, according to the Moldovan press recently, hit $1 billion submitted back to Moldova in remittances for 2008. That's before the end of the year, so it's going to be well over $1 billion.

It's good to have the money coming in, but it's not stable. What if the people stop sending money home? What if their families go out to join them? The problem is getting someone to change this and put the Moldovan economy on a more stable basis, because the money comes back to Moldova, people use it for consumption, which means that Moldova has a highly unfavorable trade balance. The current account is highly disbalanced but offset by the remittances.

But the people pay taxes in Moldova so the government budget is more than filled, and so you go to either the executive branch or the legislative branch and they say, "What's the problem? We have a surplus in the government budget this year, and as far as out as we can see if it stays the same. If it doesn't stay the same, the economic foundations could be worrisome."

Overall, looking at Moldova, much has been done that is good, and a lot needs to be encouraged. Things need to be corrected, to be sure, but this is by no means -- by no means we wish to paint a dismal picture. What I would recommend, as an individual, simply for my own country, is, first of all, to provide continued and consistent high-level engagement and support with conditionality. I think the Millennium Challenge Account has been a good approach, it's been useful. Other elements of support and conditionality have been useful, and we can see positive results from this. In particular, in Transdnistria, there needs to be sustained, high-level attention. This is not something that can come up in a meeting every once in a while, then we forget about it and low-level -- working-level people deal with it and don't get any attention.

This is an important question for some of our interlocutors, and, therefore, it needs to be an attention that gets consistent -- or an issue that gets consistent attention from us at a level that can communicate authoritatively and take decisions.

Most particularly, I would advocate, including this issue, regularly in high-level U.S.-Russian Federation dialogues. It's an important issue to Moscow, and we will not influence what Moscow thinks about it unless we raise it with Moscow at an appropriate level and conduct a dialogue at that level. Otherwise, we won't be taken seriously.

Thank you very much. Thank you for the opportunity. BOND: Thank you so much, Dr. Hill.

I'm going to open it up to questions now, but I'd like to start by putting a question to our panelists.

It seems to me from what you said that it's going to be extraordinarily important to have an election this spring that shows the support of the Moldovan people for the government and the elected officials and strengthens their hand in dealing with the Transdnistria problem, as well as advancing reforms.

Dr. Hill mentioned monitoring, election monitoring, long and short term, as a way to influence the outcome of those elections so that they're free and fair. Do you have other ideas on things the United States, Europe, multilateral organizations, like the OSCE, can do to help assure that free and fair outcome?

AMB. CHIRTOACA: Definitely, the election from March 2009 will be a moment of truth for our democratic system, but I would like to remind you that since the beginning of our period of independent existence, Moldova always had a very good record concerning the organization of free and, more or less, fair elections and criticism from the international observers. I've been focused mostly on the use of administrative state power resources, which is, basically, we understand that this is raising awareness but since the beginning of the '90s.

So we always have been, as I mentioned, monitored (inaudible) special missions sent to Moldova by the OSCE, by the Council of Europe, by the European Union, even by commonwealths of independent states. It always has been monitored very, very closely.

Definitely, this is already a part of Moldova. Even despite we are in transition, this is a part of our democratic culture. Moldovans are a civil society, one of the most maybe success story. I think it was the creation in 2005 of association of civil society organizations that are taking -- well, ensuring this kind of monitoring, not only the capital but all over Europe -- sorry, Sigmund Freud (inaudible)-- all over Moldova.

So from that point of view, I think everything will be OK. We understand how important. We are scrutinized very closely. The European (inaudible) of Moldova depends on the quality of democracy, and this is not political wrestling, this is a reality, and this is understood politically, responsible presenting of political class that has made really, really a big test for Moldova.

I have a feeling that we'll have already some changes in (inaudible) to conflict settlement even earlier, and we did not exclude that (inaudible) in December. That meeting will be kind of benchmark, it is a benchmark for Russian diplomacy in trying just to make some efforts in using the current situation as an argument in the dialogue with the best, but I will not collaborate too much on this topic. We'll see. Initiatives that we do, we are not inclined to any concession anymore.

This is a problem of the future of Moldovan state. The future of real sovereignty and independence. We'll see what Russian Federation will propose, and a package approach is conceded as the main element of our strategy. But definitely take good democracy and efficient democracy can help us to solve our (inaudible) conflict.

Thank you.

MR. BOND: Thank you.

MR. LUPAN: Indeed, the 2009 elections are important in the view of the future of Moldova, because that is what the European Union actually said, that we will support Moldova, but we want to see free and fair elections. This is an important element for our future support as a country.

I think that we should look -- and we are looking as the civil society and some experts from the civil society -- are looking at the events of 2009 from the perspective -- not from that perspective of negative problems that are existing, on which I have focused on parts, but from the perspective of the future of the country, independent of which political party wins the elections, this is the important thing.

The important thing is that these elections should be free and fair, and then we will speak about the developments, and then we can speak about the proper developments. This is a first step now that is necessary. The problem that we see here is that for the moment there are no sufficient signs that these will be free and fair elections, and these will be changed. And what and who can do for Moldova, what can be done for Moldova and who can do it?

Speaking about monitoring, the long-term monitoring of the OSCE starts one month ahead of elections, if I'm right, if I still remember from my previous OSCE -- two months, all right -- from my previous OSCE experience. Because I was also working for the OSCE myself and monitored the elections in several countries.

Two months is not enough. Two months is not enough, because it is not a matter of time ahead of the elections, it's a matter of preparations for the elections at the beginning of the campaign, and the campaign will not start two months ahead of the elections. It will be well-prepared to have a lot -- but there is one positive thing that we can and should look at.

There is an OIC mission in Moldova that is actually already monitoring the situation. There is an E.U. delegation in Moldova that is already monitoring the reforms and the elections. And these organisms, in conjunction with monitoring by the civil society and political parties, can be supported, you know, to monitor the pre- electoral campaign, on one hand.

On the other hand, what E.U. can do for Moldova, and why I am focusing that much on the E.U., because, actually, as I said before, the reforms that are stipulated by the E.U. are the democratic reforms that Moldova needs. And we want to become a member of the E.U.

The E.U. can support Moldova through a decision to start a negotiation process on the new agreement, and the U.S. can help Moldova in its bilateral discussions with E.U. on that matter.

What is important here, however, as I said, is to have the necessary conditionality. When Moldova -- if Moldova wants to receive such a support, then it still should implement a number of reforms, and they should be done in good faith.

This is the role that U.S. can play in its relations with the E.U. and in its relations with Moldova, particularly, the U.S. can clearly state that there is -- hopefully, there is -- and I feel there is -- there is a support for Moldova, but this support needs to be seen. There should be a feedback from Moldova as well. One should be a player, one should be a democratic player, one should show that we are a group of the same countries, that we believe in the same values as the E.U. and U.S. in democratic values. And that has to be proven. Although, of course, it is difficult for Moldova to progress on its path to democracy, and it is indeed a matter of time, and it is indeed -- nobody expects Moldova overnight to become a country but we do tend to better ourselves, and this is the message that the civil society is trying to send. And in this respect, the E.U. and the U.S. can help, and the OSCE already is helping us in the sense that it already monitors the elections.

What can be done by these organizations for countries is that it can start to, sort of, support this for the monitoring of the elections already from now, and also it should work closely with the government on the matters that are not considered to be sufficiently democratic.

MR. HILL: I would just like to add that in my experience in working with the authorities in Moldova, including the present ones in this area, is that they do desire to meet their international commitments and international norms. They also want to win the election. The key is early involvement, engagement and feedback in the area from missions that are on the ground, because the problems arise, generally, in the campaign. Election day everything will look good, but it's the conditions of the campaign which are the primary concern and where the engagement can be most effective. And I've found it can be effective, because my interlocutors were very often influenced, I thought positively, by international feedback.

MR. BOND: OK. Thank you for all of that.

One remark and then I'm going to open it to the floor to questions, and I'm going to encourage people to come forward, use a microphone here, state your name and affiliation and pose a question to our speakers.

But my comment is the dependence on remittances is not -- is a problem that other countries share. I know in Latin American, in a couple of cases, the countries have set up investment funds so that their foreign workers can actually invest in the funds as well as send money back to their families, which will be consumed. It's a way of saving for them, and it's a way of encouraging investment in the home country. I don't know if Moldova's considered that.

Now, if we have people who would like to pose a question? Please?

VLAD SPANU: My name is Vlad Spanu, and I'm the president of the Moldova Foundation here in Washington. And my question is regarding the topic of today's discussion, "Where Moldova Goes, East or West?"

So my organization, along with other organization partnerships, partnered and organized two events on post-elections Moldova. We did it (inaudible); in 2005, after the parliamentary elections; in 2007, after the local elections.

Among the conclusion of experts I brought from Moldova, from the United States was one important statement. Moldova does conduct the free and fair elections on election day, and I think the speakers and Ambassador Hill actually mentioned. But the big problem is before the elections. During this month, there are -- the state institutions prevent the competition, both the parties and for independent media.

So the question is this to all speakers: Why Moldova behaves this way? If it wants to join the democratic society, the democratic family, if all Moldova wants to play both ways, to be a semi-authoritarian country within the CIS and at the same time to declare itself a democratic country and be part of the European Union. So it's very difficult to play this way.

So my question is, what way Moldova really wants to go? The current comments are it really wants to go to join the West or to stay outside of Western family. Thank you.

AMB. CHIRTOACA: To tell the truth, I was not really very happy with the topic of our discussion but just right, OK to just to stay open about it. There's no doubt about this, no question about the strategic orientation of Moldova. It's the problem how to address the threat of Transdniestra, the Russian intervention in the different area of Soviet space and this is a problem of Moldova specificity.

Moldova is still, let's say, trapped and looking endless transition. The end of transition landed in Europe, and this is, again, I would like to state it, repeat it here, again, model of development, it's a functional democracy, efficient governance, freedom of mass media, rule of law and the (inaudible) judiciary system place a great, great values and principles. The problem is, at the institutional level, Moldova needs new capacity, (inaudible), strange people, educated people just to ensure the efficiency of functions of this democratic mechanism.

(inaudible), and I think this is nothing more than speculations concerning their orientation as a foreign policy and long, long-term strategy of my country. It reminds me a little bit Mr. Lupan saying, "What we have to do political parties and vibrant single society organization to move Moldova in the right place.

Moldova is not Milosevic Serbia with non-government organizations. Please get back to the natural functions. Please educate people, provide society with a clear vision, have more analytical and systemic approach. Do not make speculations, because we need professionals with clear strategies, and you can contribute in a very direct way unless you would like to be political fighters. Please organize 20 non-service political formations and struggle for democracy. If you'd like to be struggle for democracy, be a patriot outside Moldova and be freedom fighter inside Moldova. I think this is the best formula to be efficient and to help our country, which is still in an extraordinarily difficult situation, even now. Thank you.

MR. LUPAN: The problem that we are facing now, as a country, is that we have this situation when the attitude of the government is changing according to its preferences on the international (inaudible), according to its international relations. The relations of Moldova should not -- not in the past but especially not in the future -- should not be those factors that should be influenced, the democratic development inside the country. These are the things that are clear.

I think that specificity is often quoted by many countries when they fail to implement certain reforms or to take certain steps. Specificity of each country is not in failing to implement certain reforms but to implement them in a different way, (inaudible).

I think this issue is where Moldova goes, East or West, was very much speculated in recent years, coming again to the matter of geopolitical determinants, the fact that if we have better relations with Russia, then we should give Russia what Russia wants. The E.U. is a richer area, and we should go there, and that is why we want to be an E.U. member.

I think these sort of issues are now already going away and should be going away. I think that we should be moving to the West, and I think that the point is that if it comes to the political and geopolitical determinants, we can see that relations with Russia are not exactly progressing in the way they were planned. So that's why Moldova will be moving to West, and this is something encouraging.

But as I said again, it should not be a matter of international relations. It should be a matter of political will of the people. And that (inaudible), indeed, was already expressed in 2005 when both parties signed a joint paper on the European integration. I think this is the only way for the moment, at least. I think this is the only way we should look at it. The problems of relations with other countries, indeed, appear, and that's the role of all of us to correct our course in such a way as to ensure that European integration.

MR. HILL: I think Ambassador Chirtoaca has given a good enumeration of the standards and values that go into what is perceived as European or, generally, broader European integration or orientation. Clearly, my experience is that most Moldovans that I had dealings with were broadly oriented toward becoming a part of the larger European community, specifically the European Union.

The problem is juxtaposing this with countries to the east or to the north, because I found on a personal level relatively little hostility among Moldovans to having good relations on a personal level with either Ukraine or the Russian Federation, although they might object to policies.

But I think it's very important to focus on these and focus on what you mean by east or west or European and non-European. I'm reminded by some of the very emotional debates of 2002, 2003 when representatives of various organizations said, "No, we want a European solution to the Transdnistran problem, we don't want federalization." Well, my German colleagues were very puzzled to what respect a federation is now the European phenomenon. I mean, it was quite clear that what the people meant is they didn't want a certain kind of federation that left the country in a non-viable state. And so it's good to be very clear what you're talking about.

So I come back to that basic set of values is I think broadly shared by most of the Moldovan public, and given a chance to work at it freely, that's the direction that Moldova will go. BOND: I'd just note, before this session, I was doing some reading on Moldova, and on the 23rd of September, an association of sociologists and demographers, so-called Vox-Populi, took a referendum on Moldova's future, and 63 percent of the respondents said that they supported Moldova's eventual entry into the European Union. Only 12 percent of the country were against it.

Please, further questions? Any further questions from the audience? Please.

JONAS ROLETT: My name is Jonas Rolett from the Open Society institute.

You know, one of the things that is evident whenever there's a discussion of Moldova is that it lives in, kind of, a rough neighborhood, and a lot of issues which we've been discussing today relate directly, I think, to trying to survive in that zone.

I wanted to ask a little bit, given that there is consensus among the speakers about the direction of Moldova, a little bit about Western instruments that can, sort of, assist, push, pull Moldova in its stated direction. We know, of course, that there's the prospect, at least, of E.U. membership, and there are lots of instruments that the European Union has at its disposal to, sort of, promote reform and to assist Moldova, generally, to move in that direction. I'm wondering a little bit about, since we're here in Washington, what instruments the U.S. might have, particularly on issues related to energy, democratic consolidation, support within the spheres of international diplomacy, et cetera. Thank you.

MR. BOND: Dr. Hill, you might want to address OSCE in particular in that, in terms of how we could use the OSCE.

MR. HILL: Well, everybody turns -- OK, sure thing -- everybody turns to the American on the panel.

We've mentioned the Millennium Challenge Account, which is a way in which the current administration in Washington has found to address providing assistance based upon conditionality and rewarding performance. That is one area.

One other area that has been, I think, recently both Washington and the embassy have done is to make efforts to treat Moldova as a whole country and to try to find ways without providing any basis for legal recognition of the Transdnestr entity to provide assistance to people throughout the country, including on the left bank, which has been a way -- to do it in a way that is reinforcing of the idea that this is one country, all of the population should benefit from -- and should see -- that the population on the left bank should see benefits from association with the broader outside community.

In terms of the OSCE, I mean, I could exhaust the rest of the time with recommendations, but with the OSCE and other international bodies, the first thing is for the U.S. to provide personnel and involvement, both financing and personnel. Unfortunately, recently, the United States has been understandably preoccupied with the Middle East and South Asia, and it's been to the great detriment of our involvement with organizations that work on the ground, not only in Moldova but elsewhere through a broad swathe of Eurasia. And this is invaluable. Organizations on the ground provide direct contact, direct information, daily day-to-day back and forth with officials, both support and feedback when they have something not terribly supportive to provide.

Yes, given the current economic situation, not only in the U.S. but worldwide, it's not a great time -- it's never a great time to suggest that one needs to reverse -- instead of declining contributions, raise them. But one needs to keep in mind -- from the U.S. needs to keep in mind the great necessity of maintaining American support and American personnel in these international operations that go out on the ground and provide a direct and less structured contact with governments, civil society and people, less structured contact than you can get formally by doing it through formal, accredited, national diplomatic missions.

That's the very short list. I mean, there's undoubtedly more that I could cite.

MR. LUPAN: Just a very brief mention. As I mentioned before, one of the main (inaudible) for Moldova and for the future of Moldova is a matter of accession to the European Union. That agreement that Moldova is supposed to sign with new agreement going beyond the partnership and cooperation agreement, this is something that Moldova really wants. This is the governmental position, but it is also the position of the civil society that issued a statement on these matters now in August with relation to the events in Georgia.

This is one of the things which I have mentioned before. There is need for Moldova to receive positive signals that it will receive -- it will be treated as a European country. It will receive more attention, but it should be also conditional on reforms. And these reforms should be encouraged and supported.

When we think about the involvement of the U.S., we, indeed, can speak about the involvement with the government and with preparation of the government or, let's say, training of the governmental officials for those tasks that they need to fulfill. Because as the ambassador mentioned, there is a lack of capacity within the government, not only within the government but also within the civil society there is lack of capacities, because both are representing Moldova. Moldova, unfortunately, is underdeveloped, and that's why we cannot develop neither one nor another.

What I can add is that the civil society, at least, has some capacity, some limited capacity. It is coming out with policies and recommendations. This has been done on 23rd of September with another opinion of the experts with regard to the Transdnestr problem. This was done in August when the civil society experts came out with their opinion on the events in Georgia and the impact on Moldova. They have called the government to cooperate on -- eventually on a study for the Moldovans' future security. These are the methods that, unfortunately, cannot be done without support.

The training and the preparations, good advice would be sometimes very helpful. With regard to energy worldwide, as I mentioned, there is a slight chance, but it does exist, that in winter Moldova could face energy cuts, particularly in gas. I don't know what would be the best solution for this problem, if it will happen at all. Last time, Moldova was supplied gas from Ukraine. I'm not sure this will happen this time. If it happens, Moldova needs to be prepared for contingencies, and in this respect perhaps we should look at other options and you're asking, look at other options to support Moldova in energy field through its neighbors, through Ukraine, through eventually Romania, although relations with Romania are not great.

But this probably can be U.S. support, this probably can be European support for Moldova, and, therefore, it might be under certain circumstances accepted even if it comes through Romania.

And I think that one of the real instruments that already exists in the field of democracy but encourages Moldova and that makes Moldova move ahead with all sorts of reforms is the Council of Europe. I think this instrument should be used continuously for further monitoring and, of course, advice for Moldova with regard to those reforms that I have mentioned that are necessary for Moldova. And OSCE here, as well, has necessary instruments. U.S. is present in this organization, in OSCE, I mean. It can support such projects for Moldova, as Moldova would need.

AMB. CHIRTOACA: I would just briefly about the conditionality as one of the tools and driving force behind democratic reforms in the transitional countries. Definitely, there is a big difference between central European countries. I mean, (inaudible) Baltic for Baltic's union and Bulgaria, Romania. They've been promised a clear (inaudible) for new integration, which is not the case of Moldova.

I agree with the idea, we are negotiating now, so since '98 we have partnership and cooperation agreements with E.U., just as right that we conceded to sign another association and civilization agreement, and maybe and definitely for this negotiation we'll start after the 2009 new elections. That's why, again, this is so important to mention it.

And it's not (inaudible) of E.U. conditionality, so-called Copenhagen criteria, words because, again, the integration of Moldova's pursuit as a national idea with a large commitment, with reliable polls, even sociological polls, in terms of (inaudible) more than 70 percent of population. We have much more modest indicators (inaudible) around one set of population in favor with (inaudible). This is all about to be neutral, to have a constitutional (inaudible) of public policy and debate inside the society. We are dependent on natural gas 100 percent. This is our national security concern. I do not have very negative perception of winter problems. I do not think that there will be difficulties in the relationship with Ukraine and Russia ally provoked a couple of years ago. They, sort of, (inaudible) policy of Moscow.

Anyway, we have to be justified, and this is a very good sign, so we have good relations with Azerbaijan corporations, and we are looking at a good terminal. We invite the MCC American corporation to take part in the reconstruction of well terminal on (inaudible) to develop the infrastructure. It's all about MCC complex strategy. It's reconstruction of infrastructure roads, qualitative (inaudible) on public health, and we consider that here in the United States of America plays a great role, because this is roughly $300 million to $350 million will be granted to local and American corporations, and this is an economic and business platform for further development for some more, different involvement, and this is an (inaudible) for attracting investments and to ensure there are growing economic, stable, growing, economic development of my country.

And, of course, Transdnistria, this is a permanent, open and transparent dialogue with the Department of State with other bodies that are involved in a way (inaudible) in a frozen conflict. That means I can assure you this is the biggest part of our job (inaudible) diplomats (inaudible) in Washington, D.C.

We understand that (inaudible) limited capacity for small countries. It has a clear geopolitical dimension, has a clear strategic (inaudible) who are witnessing the emerging new security world in Europe, and, of course, we would like to move closer to more stable zone, and we'd like to use this moment of opportunity, but, again, it's still very risky.

Of course, we need assistance, partnership and five plus two exactly for U.S. (inaudible) of European Union, especially after Nicolas Sarkozy mediation in Georgia crisis. This is a new fact that gives new dynamics, and we would like to use them in the most positive and constructive way just to get closer to the Transdnistria conflicts (inaudible). Thank you.

MR. BOND: Thank you very much, Mr. Ambassador.

I'd like to turn the floor over to John Finerty, who is -- and deserves the credit for organizing this session today and has done all the work to put this program together.

JOHN FINERTY: Thank you. I'll try to be brief here.

I was interested in something Ambassador Hill mentioned about the, sort of, business interests in the left bank of Transdnistria being more conciliatory, and I think this had a lot to do with E.U. borders, just the mission there and cutting down on some of the black marketing things like this. And some of us on the staff (inaudible).

It seems to me, though, that if you have the right coalition of forces where Russia decided for one reason or another to go along with the settlement, to get out of the way of a settlement, and if the suggestion is that your government has made, Mr. Ambassador, concessions, if you will, to resolve this situation, that could be done.

I don't have in front of me the legislation that goes back to 2005 on the principles of the Transdnistria situation. It seems to me, though, there is little there that would -- it leaves too much space for the folks who operate in Transdnistria.

Would that legislation have to be changed?

AMB. CHIRTOACA: This time I will start and we'll go right to the left.

No, the legislation will not be changed. We consider it will provoke or destabilize the situation, and this legislation has been voted on the basis large consensus among all the political parties in our parliament. Nobody will revise or give back or just put under the impression it's basic, but this is the basic principles. So the problem is flexibility, and there's always a certain degree of flexibility will be thin interpretation.

But this is a package of (inaudible). We are speaking about a large autonomy of Transdnistria region populated mostly by ethnic Moldovans, and the rest of the Russian-speaking -- but the biggest minority is the Ukrainian-speaking minority and then Bulgarian and Russian. So there is no basis for any kind of other approach. But this is a negotiated status -- special status of the region all about. That's why this is a main element I mentioned in my presentation of the future negotiations.

Regarding the OSCE (inaudible) left bank (inaudible), this is a (inaudible) all a perception of a confidence -- consolidating the future confidence measures. And when Transdnistria business, this is the kind of (inaudible) in eastern part of Moldova. So we'll be involved in (inaudible) projects financed by MCC. It was involved in the United States government. This is (inaudible) create and form new channels of communication. And the E.U. result of that is supportive. The E.U. would like also an opinion and would like also just to assist financially and to take part in this project and communication.

(inaudible) before all these events. Now, this is a little bit -- well, it's a different situation, but these principles remain as the basic elements of our conflict settlement. LUPAN: With business interests in 2005 law, hypothetically speaking, indeed, they do not contradict each other, in my personal opinion. The point is that this law clearly states that it was for certain business interests. What does it actually mean by that? It means that what Moldova already started to implement, the return of the Transdnistrian enterprise under its control within the economics has yielded some posted results in the sense that there is less, at least, speculation about what and who does in Transdnistrian region and with business interests. They have been reduced.

There is a certain reduction of illegal business in Transdnistria, and that is the point. The point is, legally or illegally, legal or illegal business. It does not block, basically, the development of business. That's what we should aim for, and I think this is the point where we should come and we are coming to the development of business in Moldova, as a whole. The development of business in Moldova as a whole should set some standards that would allow for both Moldovan and Transdnistrian business to develop freely without harm and actually promote business, because that would be, of course, helpful for the whole country, and it would provide more taxes and better incomes and so on and more tax.

MR. HILL: OK. I told the Moldovan government in 2005, when they were considering the law, that I thought it restricted their flexibility in negotiating unduly, and I still think that, but it's not a fatal restriction. And, you know, laws can be amended if situations change and if circumstances change.

Business on the left bank, I didn't say the businessmen were good guys. I did say they were interested in the Western European, North American market and had been more successful in left bank -- or right bank, excuse me, western Moldovan enterprises, which are still oriented largely toward the Russian and Ukrainian market. But the point here is that the interest of many of the entrepreneurs on the left bank is pointing toward being able to conduct commerce on the greater European market, and this offers an opportunity for creating conditions that would encourage them to integrate politically into a Moldovan community.

As a matter of fact, following the 2005 law, the negotiations and the package, all significant Transdnierstran enterprises have registered as economic agents of the Republic of Moldova. They receive Moldovan seal stamps, documentation for trade with the European Union. They even receive preferences, E.U. preferences operating as economic agents of the Republic of Moldova. Integration here on the economic side has proceeded far in advance of any political integration within the country.

What worries the businessmen, what is right now the -- they don't trust the political institutions in Moldova, and what has been given by Moldovan authorities, they say, "Well, the Moldovan authorities could take away again with the stroke of a pen," and they want a political guarantee and some sort of political system or autonomy or something that guarantees their ability to defend these preferences. And that's, basically, in very, very blunt terms what one of the most fundamental issues in the negotiations. There are others. My whole point in this was, though, that there is an element on the left bank that actually is favorably inclined toward integration in Moldova, and the Moldovan government has been at times very skillful in using this phenomenon, and it's a phenomenon that I would encourage, both all to use because it's a way of narrowing the differences between the two banks rather than concentrating on what divides them. And there are other things in the historical memory that prove divisive.

I know we're reaching the end. I'd like to say one more thing, just to get back to the assistance and what outsiders can do and other things. We can give all sorts of advice as to what various authorities in Moldova, whether in Chisinau or Tiraspol, should do.

The thing that strikes me, though -- something worth keeping in mind, because I'm not sure I have the ultimate answer to it -- is when you give advice, then someone locally has to carry it out. And if what you have in the country is a population composed of elderly people in villages, pensioners and their grandchildren, with the adult working population working abroad and sending money back, you have the ultimate capacity problem, and it's one that I've seen increasingly and consistently going on in Moldova.

And one of the things, whether authorities in Moldova or those that help from outside, need constantly to keep in mind is a way of encouraging the development of businesses, industries and jobs in Moldova that attract and keep talented young and middle-aged people in the country that provides the basic capacity base for doing all of the things that the country can do. It's not something that can be solved quickly, and it's not something that can be attacked directly through a single program, but it runs now as an undercurrent that affects, at least in my estimation and my experience in the country, it affects almost all initiatives that either domestic authorities or international bodies in other countries involved from the outside have to deal with is simply not that the people aren't talented but there just aren't enough of them, because too many are working abroad because there aren't the opportunities at home.

Thanks very much.

MR. BOND: I mean, it's sort of circular, but by integrating into Europe and meeting conditions of European integration, you will create an environment in which people (inaudible). But that's the direction the country obviously has to go.

Well, we are out of time, and I want to thank our speakers and their participation today. Also thank our audience for posing questions.

And all of this will be transcribed and available on our Web site in about 48 hours, I'm told, on our Helsinki Commission Web site. Thank you very much.

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

19 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Bahrain News Agency

September 18, 2008 Thursday 12:00 AM ESTAL BALOOSHI MEETS THAI WOMEN UNION PRESIDENT*LENGTH: 282 words

MANAMA, SEPT 18 (BNA)-- MINISTER OF SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT DR FATIMA AL BALOOSHI RECEIVED YESTERDAY THAILANDS WOMEN UNION PRESIDENT.

Al balushi affirmed that the kingdom of bahrain continues to work towards reinforcing ideals of human rights and respecting it, along with combating aspects of violations to these rights. this she said was being undertaken through cooperation with various international efforts exerted towards that. moreover, al balushi also discussed the latest report issued by the us state department on combating human trafficking placing bahrain in tier 2 which exerts great efforts in this field. this she said proved the new transformation in the kingdom in light of the democratic progress which is aimed at reinforcing human rights supported by his majesty hamad bin isa al khalifas reforms. al balushi said that the kingdom had established specialised national bodies and organisation to follow up on this issues from all aspects that include political, security and psychological for those effected by it. she said that these organisations set up specialized programs for such a phenomena which includes representatives from civil society organisations. al balushi stated that dar al aman was opened to shelter women and children who are victims of psychological, physical and social abuse whether they were bahrainis or not. on her part the thai women union president lauded the steps taken by the kingdom of bahrain in this field especially with the opening of dar al aman which caters for the needs of those women and children who are abused. she said that such efforts reflected the kingdoms interest in combating human trafficking and protecting human rights. hs/18-sep-2008 18:46

LOAD-DATE: September 19, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireJOURNAL-CODE: BNA

Copyright 2008 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved
ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2008 by Bahrain News Agency Distributed by UPI

20 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Global Insight

September 10, 2008

Rights Panel Draws Attention to Abuses of Foreign Labour in Kuwait

BYLINE: Sara Hassan

SECTION: In Brief

LENGTH: 387 words

The Kuwaiti National Assembly's human-rights committee has called for an emergency debate to deal with the abuse of foreign workers throughout the emirate. Among the many abuses of workers by employers and labour contractors documented by the committee in its preliminary report submitted to the assembly on Monday (8 September) were visa trading, excessively low wages, non-payment of wages, sub-standard working conditions, overworking employees, black-mailing employees with threats of dismissal and deportation, and the holding onto of workers' passports. The committee's report blamed the government for its failure to properly monitor labour conditions and enforce existing laws and regulations which could have stopped some of the abuses.

In particular, the report pointed out that the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labour had failed in its responsibility for ensuring that employers paid the wages of their workers on a regular basis and provided their employees with appropriate working conditions. The committee has called for the urgent implementation of a series of measures to secure the rights of workers, salaries, working hours, and appropriate time off. Long-term solutions to Kuwait's humanitarian problems would include the revision of several laws, an independent body of labour and a public shareholding company to recruit foreign employees fairly and legally. The worker abuses cited in the committee's provisional report mainly apply to blue-collar foreign labourers, such as those in the construction sector. In contrast, most white-collar workers are relatively well treated, and have very comfortable--and in some cases, affluent--lives.

Significance: The human-rights committee's provisional report claims that widespread abuses of large segments of foreign workers in Kuwait contribute to antisocial behaviour and other crime, such as drug trafficking. Furthermore, the report points out that the mistreatment of foreign workers has tarnished Kuwait's image abroad, citing in particular the criticisms of the country in the U.S. State Department's Human Trafficking Report, which places Kuwait among countries in its lowest category ("Tier 3"). However, given the antagonistic relationship between the government and the National Assembly, it is doubtful that there will be any rapid remedial actions.

LOAD-DATE: September 10, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

All Rights Reserved

21 of 445 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

August 29, 2008 Friday

ISRAEL: MIGRANT WORKERS HOTLINE BATTLES SEX TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: Mona AlamiLENGTH: 1015 wordsDATELINE: JERUSALEM, Aug 29 2008

Israel continues to be a major destination for women trafficked into the sex industry. It is also a site where many migrants from developing countries endure intense labor exploitation.

Romm Lewkowicz, a spokesman from Israel's Hotline for Migrant Workers, said "Israel was only upgraded to Tier 2 last year," referring to the U.S. State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons report.

The State Department divides countries into three tiers. Tier 1 is for countries that have successfully implemented measures to control trafficking; most Western countries fall into this category. Tier 2 is for countries that are trying to eradicate this modern day slavery but still fail to meet the necessary standards. Tier 3 is reserved for countries that have not addressed the issue at the most basic level.

In 2006 Israel was on the U.S. State Department's Watch List for people trafficking.

"This position falls between Tier 2 and Tier 3. The U.S. applies economic sanctions to those countries which fall into Tier 3, but as we have a strong economic relationship with the U.S., Israel was given a warning and placed in a slightly higher category," Lewkowicz said.

The Israeli government has also faced sharp criticism from the U.S. for its binding work visa policy, which effectively binds foreign migrants to the employer stated on their visa. The migrants come mostly from developing countries and former Soviet Eastern bloc countries in order to work in construction, home care and agriculture.

"The issuance of these visas is subject to the workers staying with the same employer stated on the visa, and if this condition is broken, then the migrant worker is deemed illegal and liable for deportation without having a chance to fight the case in court," Sigal Rosen said.

This has encouraged unscrupulous employers to withhold payment and extort employees, knowing they can always replace them and not be penalized.

One of the more notorious cases was the Turks for Tanks deal of 2002. According to the deal, the Israeli military industry (Ta'as) upgraded about 200 tanks for Turkey for $687 million, in one of the country's biggest arms export deals. As part of the agreement, 800 Turkish workers were granted permits to work in construction in Israel, after being placed through the Turkish employment agency Yilmazlar.

One of Yilmazlar's contractors, Shaheen Yelmaz, arrived in Israel in 2006, dreaming of helping his father pay off his mounting debts after being promised a good job in Israel for $1,400 a month -- a fortune by Turkey's standards where unemployment is high.

On arrival, his dream job turned into a nightmare when his passport and mobile phone were taken away, and he and other Turkish workers were accommodated in squalid conditions.

"We were not allowed to leave the premises in the evenings, and were only allowed out on our day off. And we were not paid for the first three months," Yelmaz said.

The Turkish embassy was unwilling to intervene because of the lucrative deal with Israel.

Yelmaz and his fellow contractors, most of them with little education, were coerced into signing blank documents before leaving Turkey. The documents virtually ensured their dependency on Yilmazlar.

"We were also told by our Israeli employer that if we were unhappy we could leave. The police would then arrest us as illegals and we would be deported," Yelmaz said.

Following a number of similar cases, the Hotline and other Israeli human rights organizations petitioned the Israeli High Court. The court acknowledged the inequity of the system but ruled that Yilmazlar's contract with the Israeli defense industry was unique, and the company's contract with Israel was limited.

However, the court did rule in 2006 that Israel's binding visa policy in general was illegal, and ordered the state to establish an alternative. Rosen said they are still waiting for a final response from the state.

Yelmaz was subsequently deported to Turkey, $15,000 in debt, and Israel's contract with Yilmazlar was renewed.

"While the situation of indentured laborers remains serious, the [sex] trade trafficking has improved somewhat," Lewcowicz said.

"Since the U.S. State Department put Israel on its Watch List in 2006, the number of women trafficked to Israel has declined, and it is now against the law to traffic in women.

"Furthermore, the government now grants prostitutes a one-year rehabilitation visa. However, the bureaucracy involved means the granting of these visas is often problematic," Lewcowicz said.

But new problems have arisen. "Israel is no longer solely an importer of prostitutes but has become an exporter of them too. Last year we discovered a new business where Israeli women were being trafficked to the U.K. and Ireland to work in the sex industry," he said.

Prostitution has also gone underground in Israel. "Before it was openly done on the streets. Now many of the players have resorted to working from private apartments, following a police and government crackdown on the trafficking," Lewcowicz said.

According to the Jerusalem-based Task Force on Human Trafficking, approximately 1,000 of the estimated 10,000 prostitutes in Israel are minors. Immigrants from the ex-Soviet bloc countries, involved in the Russian mafia, manage about 20 percent of the trade, while the remainder are Israelis, Lewcowicz said.

A Global Terrorism Analysis report published by the Washington-based The Jamestown Foundation states that many of the trafficked women are smuggled in from Egypt's Sinai by Bedouins who have also been involved in arms smuggling. The industry has proved very lucrative for the human traffickers, with each woman sold in Israel bringing in anywhere between $50,000 to $100,000.

But the state also earns a tidy profit from the white slave trade, according to Hotline.

Service providers, such as taxi drivers transporting prostitutes, lawyers who represent the clients and landlords who rent out their premises as brothels, all pay income tax, and this ultimately arrives in the state's coffers. In some cases, corrupt police officers have also lined their pockets through bribery.

LOAD-DATE: August 29, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

22 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Mercury (South Africa)

August 28, 2008 Thursday
e1 Edition

SA on human trafficking red list

BYLINE: Graeme HoskenSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 4LENGTH: 330 words

South Africa's lack of legislation to deal with human trafficking has seen the country being placed on a United States watch list.

This was revealed during the release of the US state department's annual Trafficking in People report for 2008.

The report is a worldwide account of efforts by governments to combat human trafficking and includes countries of origin, transit and destination.

The report came as the Thai government yesterday donated more R14 000 to two Pretoria non-governmental organisations that assist women who have either been trafficked to, from or through South Africa.

The South African government recently announced it was drafting a Bill that would allow authorities to prosecute offenders for smuggling people.

South Africa has been placed on a "special watch list" along with 40 other countries that should receive special scrutiny.

The number of countries on the special watch list has increased from 32 in the 2007 report.

Countries in the report are placed on one of three levels.

The position is based on the extent of a government's actions in combating trafficking and it sees the US state department evaluating whether governments comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act.

Governments that fully comply are placed in tier one, while those that make significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in tier two.

Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed in tier three.

The Thai ambassador, Domdej Bunnag, said the trafficking of between 200 and 300 women to South Africa every year was of serious concern.

"Evidence shows there is a steady increase in the number of Thai women being trafficked into South Africa, especially to Pretoria, Johannesburg and Durban," he said.

"Other alarming increases include the number of men being trafficked to South Africa on the pretence of being given work in the construction industry ahead of the 2010 Soccer World Cup."

LOAD-DATE: August 28, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: NM

Copyright 2008 Independent News and Media Ltd
All Rights Reserved

23 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Pretoria News (South Africa)

August 28, 2008 Thursday
e1 Edition

Trafficking:SA placed on watch list

BYLINE: Graeme HoskenSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2LENGTH: 527 words

South Africa's lack of human trafficking legislation has seen the country being placed on a US watch list.

This was revealed during the release of the US State Department's annual Trafficking in People report for 2008.

The report, which covers the period of April 2007 to March 2008, is a worldwide account on efforts by governments to combat severe forms of human trafficking and includes countries of origin, transit and destination.

The report was published as the Thai government yesterday donated over R14 000 to two Pretoria NGOs which assist women who have been trafficked to, from or through SA.

The donations and the report come weeks after the South African government announced that it was drafting a bill which would allow authorities to prosecute offenders for smuggling people for various forms of exploitation.

The US State Department's report has seen South Africa being placed on a "Special Watch List" along with 40 other countries which should receive special scrutiny.

The number of countries on this list have increased from 32 in the 2007 Report. The report states that regardless of placement, which is not permanent, every country, including the US, should do more to counter human trafficking.

Countries in the report are placed on to one of the three levels.

The placement is based on the extent of a government's actions in combating trafficking and sees the US State Department evaluating whether governments fully comply with the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA).

Governments that fully comply are placed in Tier 1, while those that make significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in Tier 2. Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed in Tier 3. The "Special Watch List" is between Tier 2 and Tier 3 - and this is where South Africa has been placed.

The TVPA created the Special Watch List for countries where the number of victims of severe forms of trafficking is either significant or increasing significantly; there is a failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking from the previous year; or, where the determination that a country is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards was based on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

Domedej Bunnag, Royal Thai Embassy ambassador, said the trafficking of between 200 to 300 women to South Africa every year was of serious concern.

He said: "Evidence shows that there is a steady increase in the number of Thai women being trafficked into South Africa especially to Pretoria, Johannesburg and Durban. Other alarming increases include the number of men being trafficked to South Africa on the pretence of being given work in the construction industry ahead of the 2010 Soccer World Cup," he said.

Highlighting the recent arrest of four suspected Thai traffickers by South African and Thai police, Bunnag said the upcoming signing of a memorandum of understanding between South Africa and Thailand would go far in preventing human trafficking between the two countries.

LOAD-DATE: August 27, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: PN

Copyright 2008 Independent News and Media Ltd
All Rights Reserved

24 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

August 27, 2008 Wednesday 7:12 PM TST

Interior Ministry holds anti-human trafficking seminar

BYLINE: Rachel Chan

LENGTH: 465 words

DATELINE: Taipei, Aug. 27

The Interior Ministry opened a two-day international anti-human trafficking seminar Wednesday with the goal of consolidating a campaign against human trafficking by establishing a comprehensive government system.

"Anti-human trafficking is not only work that takes long term efforts but is also a challenge that requires international cooperation and attention," said Deputy Interior Minister Chien Tai-lang, who is also acting director-general of the National Immigration Agency.

He made the remarks in his opening speech at the seminar, titled the "2008 Anti-Human Trafficking International Workshop," which took place at the National Taiwan University Hospital International Convention Center in Taipei.

Noting that Taiwan has been listed as a Tier 2 country for the second straight year by the United States in its annual anti-human trafficking report, Chien said the ministry has completed a draft proposal on anti-human trafficking to be submitted to the Executive Yuan at the end of August and that it is expected to be enacted by the Legislative Yuan in its next session.

He added that the government is determined to fight human trafficking, evidenced by the "anti-human trafficking project" launched by the Executive Yuan in November 2006, an inter-governmental agency task force on anti-human trafficking that was established in 2007, and a chapter on anti-human trafficking that was added to the immigration law.

"I hope that Taiwan will be upgraded to a Tier 1 country because of these efforts on anti-human trafficking," Chien said.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2008 (TIF 2008), released by the U.S. Department of State June 6, places Taiwan on a list of "Tier 2" countries in terms of human trafficking, the same level it was ranked at last year.

The TIF 2008 describes Taiwan as a destination for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Taiwan is also a source of women trafficked to Japan, Australia, the United Kingdom and the U.S., according to the report.

Participants in the international seminar include officials from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security and Customs Bureau. Among them are Tatum S. King, posted in Hong Kong, Katerina Karousos from Washington, D.C. and Gabriel Gonzalez from Florida.

Other participants are representatives from the Taipei Women's Rescue Foundation, the Taiwan End Children Prostitution Association, prosecutors from the Ministry of Justice and Sandy Yeh, an associate professor of the Central Police University.

During the two-day seminar, they will exchange views on how to effectively tackle human trafficking and drug trafficking and Yeh, representing non-government organizations, will present an essay titled "The State of Taiwan's Anti-human Trafficking and the Role of NGOs."

LOAD-DATE: August 27, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

25 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

August 22, 2008 Friday

Drive vs illegal human trade strengthened

BYLINE: Emilia Narni J. David

SECTION: Pg. S1/10

LENGTH: 460 words

An intensified campaign against human trafficking was launched early this week by a nongovernmental organization with the support of the United States embassy.

Human trafficking refers to the illegal trade of humans, mostly children and women, and forcing them to work either as sex slaves or child laborers.

With nearly 2.3 million forced into "modern slavery" annually, human trafficking has become the third largest illegal cross-border crime, behind drug trafficking and illegal arms trade.

The campaign launch was led by the Visayan Forum Foundation, Inc. (VFFI).

The Philippines is considered as a source, transit and destination country for human trafficking. According to the US State Department, the victims are brought to Cote d' Ivoire, Japan, Hong Kong and Malaysia, among others. The victims number hundreds of thousands.

The Philippines has been put on the second tier of the US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The classification meant the country is complying only with the minimum standards set by the US on the protection and prevention of human trafficking.

The minimum standard includes imposing punishment to deter trafficking and sustained efforts by the government to eliminate trafficking.

In response to improving the anti-human trafficking campaign record, the Philippines enacted into law Republic Act 9208 also known as the Anti- trafficking of Persons Act 2003. There has so far been 11 convictions on trafficking.

A further downgrade to the third tier will result in the loss of non- humanitarian, non-trade assistance from the US such as development programs and educational exchange programs.

"Human trafficking is a global problem," US Ambassador to the Philippines Kristie A. Kenney said at the launch. "It is modern-day slavery and victims rarely have a voice."

Cecil Flores-Oebanda, VFFI president and executive director, noted a "massive exploitation of safe migration."

The VFFI works with other sectors to provide halfway houses for trafficking victims. The Philippine Ports Authority is building halfway houses in ports where rescued victims are hosted until they can fully reintegrate into society.

According to the International Labor Office, victims often cope with reintegration problems since their families expected them to provide money.

In the same event, Justice Undersecretary Ricardo Blancaflor of the Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking said that the campaign against human trafficking had no budget.

Despite the predicament, Ombudsman Merceditas N. Gutierrez vowed that the Office of the Ombudsman will continue to probe and prosecute any public officials found guilty of colluding with traffickers.

"There is no reason why we cannot win the war against trafficking in this lifetime," said Mr. Blancaflor.

LOAD-DATE: August 21, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation
All Rights Reserved

26 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

August 16, 2008

Fact Sheets: The Facts About Human Trafficking For Forced Labor

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE

LENGTH: 1298 words

Fact Sheets: The Facts About Human Trafficking For Forced Labor Fri, 15 Aug 2008 14:48:21 -0500

Fact Sheet Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons Washington, DC June 3, 2008

The Facts About Human Trafficking For Forced Labor

"There's a special evil in the abuse and exploitation of the most innocent and vulnerable. The victims of sex trade see little of life before they see the very worst of life—an underground of brutality and lonely fear. Those who create these victims and profit from their suffering must be severely punished. Those who patronize this industry debase themselves and deepen the misery of others. And governments that tolerate this trade are tolerating a form of slavery."

-President George W. Bush before the UN General Assembly, September 2003

A Victim's Story Rajila, age 30, left her home in India to work in Saudi Arabia based on promises of a good salary and free housing from a company that supplies laborers for hospitals. But what seemed like a dream opportunity turned out to be a nightmare. Rajila, together with other foreign women, was forced to work 12-hour shifts, six days a week. She was never paid. The "free" housing was excruciatingly confining, and, when the women returned from work, they were locked in their rooms. Once a week they were escorted to the local market to purchase groceries and other necessities. She and other Muslim laborers from India were not allowed to practice their faith in local mosques. Rajila left Saudi Arabia taking with her no accumulated salary from three and a half years of uninterrupted work.¹

What is Human Trafficking" Trafficking in persons is modern-day slavery. Every year, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders; millions more are enslaved in their own countries. The common denominator in all trafficking scenarios is the use of force, fraud or coercion to exploit a person for commercial sex or for the purpose of subjecting a victim to involuntary servitude, debt bondage, or forced labor. The use of force or coercion can be direct and violent, or psychological.

The Causes of Labor Trafficking Most instances of forced labor occur as unscrupulous recruiters and employers take advantage of gaps in law enforcement to exploit vulnerable workers. These workers are made more vulnerable to forced labor practices because of unemployment, poverty, crime, discrimination, corruption, political conflict, and cultural acceptance of forced labor. Immigrants are particularly vulnerable, but individuals are also often forced into labor in their own countries.

Bonded Labor One form of force or coercion is the use of a bond, or debt, to keep a person in subjugation. This is referred to in law and policy as "bonded labor" or "debt bondage." It is criminalized under U.S. law and included as a form of exploitation related to trafficking in the UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress, and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children. Many workers around the world fall victim to debt bondage when they assume an initial debt as part of the terms of employment; others inherit debt in more traditional systems of bonded labor. Traditional bonded labor in South Asia enslaves huge numbers of people in this way from generation to generation; nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) estimate that the number of bonded laborers in India alone ranges from 20 million to 65 million.

Involuntary Servitude People are trapped in involuntary servitude when they fear that serious physical harm or legal coercion, such as deportation, would result from an attempt to escape their conditions. Victims are often economic migrants and low-skilled laborers who are trafficked from less developed communities to more prosperous and developed places. Many victims experience physical and verbal abuse, breach of an employment contract, and may perceive themselves to be in captivity. Too often, they are.

Involuntary Domestic Servitude Domestic workers may be trapped in servitude through the use of force or coercion, such as physical (including sexual) or emotional abuse. Children are particularly vulnerable to domestic servitude in private homes, which is often unregulated by public authorities. In some wealthier countries of East Asia and the Persian Gulf, there is great demand for domestic servants, who are frequently forced into conditions of involuntary domestic servitude.

Child Labor Most international organizations and national laws legally allow older children to engage in light work. However, the worst forms of child labor are being targeted for eradication by nations around the globe. Among these hazardous types are the sale and trafficking of children for bonded and forced labor, and the forced conscription of children into armed conflict. In this brutal practice, national armies and rebel militias illegally recruit—sometimes through abduction or force—male and female children as combatants, porters, spies, domestics, and sex slaves.

What Consequences Do Victims Face? Victims of trafficking for forced labor are modern-day slaves. They experience permanent physical and psychological harm, isolation from their families and communities, reduced opportunities for personal development, and restricted movement. Victims are often wary of law enforcement and psychologically dependent on their traffickers. Child victims are denied access to education, which reinforces the cycle of illiteracy and poverty that facilitates their exploitation.

What is the United States Doing to Combat Human Trafficking for Forced Labor?

* The 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act and the 2003 and 2005 Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Acts mandate U.S. Government efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

* The Department of State issues an annual Trafficking in Persons Report that assesses foreign government actions to combat trafficking, including protecting the victims of forced labor and punishing their exploiters. The 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report includes a number of countries on Tier 3 for their lack of efforts to address forced labor in their countries.

* These countries include Algeria, Burma, Kuwait, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Syria.

* The Trade and Development Act of 2000 mandates efforts to eliminate the worst forms of child labor, including the trafficking of children and forced child labor, as a criterion for countries receiving trade benefits.

* The Department of Labor (DOL) maintains a list of products that are believed to have been made using forced child labor and produces an annual report on how countries are combating the worst forms of child labor.

* In Fiscal Year 2007 alone, the United States Government spent more than $79 million to assist governments and NGOs on anti-trafficking efforts. More than 70 percent of that amount focused at least in part on labor trafficking.

Funded programs include:

* A partnership between the Department of State and International Justice Mission to utilize local laws and law enforcement to rescue victims of forced labor in India.

* A USAID project in Uganda that provides direct support to several organizations that shelter children who were exploited for labor purposes or are at risk for exploitation.

* A collaboration between the Department of Labor and the International Labor Organization to improve El Salvador's capacity to enforce laws against exploitative child labor and protect victims of trafficking.

* A Department of Health and Human Services program that supports efforts by the Phoenix, AZ chapter of the International Rescue Committee to reach out to victims of forced labor in the Latino community.

1 Human Rights Watch. Bad Dreams: Exploitation and Abuse of Migrant Workers in Saudi Arabia. July 2004. <http://hrw.org/mideast/saudi/labor>

LOAD-DATE: August 18, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: STD

Copyright 2008 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

27 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Manila Times (Philippines)

August 11, 2008 Monday

US-trained cops lead PNP's drive versus human trafficking

BYLINE: By Maricel V. Cruz, Reporter

LENGTH: 377 words

Forty-three police personnel have completed a United States-sponsored training on law enforcement operations against human trafficking conducted by the Philippine National Police Training Service in partnership with the U.S. International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Program ICITAP.

This developed as PNP Chief Director General Avelino Razon Jr. underscored the need for the national police to address issue on human trafficking through proper training of policemen.

"Trafficking in persons is among the top law enforcement issues that the PNP is addressing through proper training of police investigators, community relations officers and beat patrol officers," Razon said.

Police Director German Doria, PNP director for Human Resource and Doctrine Development (DHRDD), said ICITAP provided a combination of technical assistance and training intended to support the institutionalization of "PNP's Transformation Plan." by designing and delivering a comprehensive police assistance program.

"ICITAP also assists in developing a plan for the model police station concept; hopefully, we can fully implement this concept throughout the country," Doria said.

The ICITAP is facilitated by its manager, Richard Miller.

The national police's Transformation Plan includes Model Police Training, which is divided into two tiers. The first tier consists of Instructor Development, Community Policing, Basic or First Line Supervision, Ethics, Human Rights, Crime Scene Investigation and Civil Disturbance Management.

Tier two of the training involves Crimes Against Women and Children, Trafficking in Persons, Terrorism Overview, Mid-Level Management, Internal Affairs, Basic Criminal Investigations and Media Relations.

Tier one was conducted for Marikina, Quezon, Baguio, Boracay, Kalibo, Puerto Princesa, Zamboanga, Marawi and Sorsogon stations. The Maritime Group and the PNP Training Service were also included. The training was concluded in June 2008 while tier two of the training is expected to conclude in December.

At present, ICITAP has three projects including the training for ten model police stations throughout the Philippines, a boat project and training for the Maritime Group and basic and advanced training for PNP officers in Jolo, Sulu.

LOAD-DATE: August 12, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Global News Bites

28 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Global Insight

August 6, 2008

Bill to Punish Worker Abuse Introduced in Kuwait

BYLINE: Rehab Al MahfudhSECTION: In BriefLENGTH: 280 words

Kuwait is looking to introduce punishments for the abuse of foreign labour as a result of increased criticism from the United States and violent protests by mostly Bangladeshi workers, which erupted last week. Head of the Kuwait Society for Human Rights, Ali al-Baghli, stated that there was a good chance that the bill would pass; the bill still needs to be approved by Kuwait's parliament, its government, and the ruling emir. The bill, which was introduced by the Kuwaiti parliament's human-rights committee, sets a jail term of 15 years for offences which include forced labour, and abusing workers, according to Reuters. In its annual Trafficking in Persons Report (TIPS) published in June, the U.S. State Department placed Kuwait in the bottom "tier 3" ranking of global efforts to tackle human trafficking. Kuwait witnessed violent protests last week from Asian workers demanding better pay and improved working conditions. As a result, the Kuwaiti government agreed to set a minimum wage (see Kuwait: 5 August 2008). Furthermore, State Minister for Cabinet Affairs, Faisel Al-Hajji, warned that the government would take strict actions against any company which fails to comply with the government's new regulations, which will include taking legal action against the company and freezing its recruitment files.

Significance: Kuwait's current labour laws fail to grant expatriate workers adequate legal protection or ensure their basic rights, such as fair compensation and an abuse-free working environment. Wide-scale abuse triggered massive protests by Asian workers in Kuwait which turned violent, and resulted in the arrest and deportation of hundreds of people last week.

LOAD-DATE: August 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

29 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Kuwait Times

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

July 23, 2008 Wednesday

Rights body slams rampant visa trading in Kuwait

BYLINE: Ahmad Al-Khaled, Kuwait Times

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 787 words

Jul. 23--KUWAIT -- The Head of the Kuwait Society for Human Rights Ali Al-Baghli spoke out yesterday against the deterioration of human rights in Kuwait. He was particularly referring to the pervasive illegal trade in visas, which he said is carried out by all segments of the Kuwaiti society. "Some members of parliament, government workers and members of the ruling family are all visa traders," he charged.

Cleaning workers contracted by a private company to work at the Ministry of Health went on a strike three days ago followed by gas station attendants who staged a strike on Monday. The two incidents are the most recent in a string of walkouts staged over the past year by the state's low-paid expat laborers. "This is a red line and a last shout to resolve the issue," Al-Baghli said. "We are all witnessing protests by laborers who do not get their salaries even though their salaries are minuscule and that is due to the greed of some Kuwaitis," he added. "These companies trade in human beings," Al-Baghli said, making sure not to blame all Kuwaitis for the greed of some corrupt Kuwaiti embezzlers and unscrupulous businesses.

Al-Baghli lay blame on the government and MPs for Kuwait's recent drop to Tier 3 on the US list of countries not doing enough to combat human trafficking. "There is a lack of response from government entities such as the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor as well as the Ministry of Interior and the National Assembly...the parliament does not take human rights seriously," he lamented. "We have not seen any productive action by the parliament to stop these injustices against workers.

Al-Baghli noted that some MPs had gone so far as to accuse some of their colleagues in parliament of being party to labor abuses. The Human Rights Society called upon the Cabinet and the Assembly to change the government's contract bidding laws which are loosely arranged and not monitored. "There should be a minimum wage adhered to for workers in these companies and a mechanism to check on companies to make certain they are paying their workers. Their contracts stipulate salaries at KD 60 per month while i n reality workers get paid KD 20. The rest goes in the pockets of the companies and influential individuals who protect the companies," said Al-Baghli, who called for a minimum wage to start at KD 80 to 100.

Al-Baghli pointed out towards the hesitancy on the part of Minister of Social Affairs and Labor Bader Al-Duwaila to meet with the society. "We requested a meeting with the minister in writing on the 10th of June but he has not yet met with us and now they are saying he is out of the country," said Al-Baghli, who noted that the group had previously met with the previous minister of social affairs and labor who gave the group all of ten minutes to state their grievances over the state of human and labor righ ts in Kuwait. "We will meet with the prime minister so he can help us solve the issue," he said.

Speaking out against the Ministry of Social Affairs and Labor's newly-announced nine guidelines to establishing NGOs in Kuwait, Al-Baghli said: "The Kuwaiti constitution's 43rd amendment gives us the right to establish NGOs and unions." He urged Kuwaitis to reject the guidelines, saying, "The Kuwait Human Rights Society calls on all NGOs and the civil society to stand against these rules and reject them because they are unconstitutional, illegal and irrational.

He cited the guideline requiring a one-year probationary period for NGOs as an example of the irrationality of the rules. Additionally, he cited the rule which does not allow membership in more than one NGO. "I am a lawyer by profession and am a member of the Lawyers Society. By this rule I cannot be a member of the Human Rights Society as well, and this is unreasonable," Al-Baghli said, adding flatly: "With these guidelines there will be no new NGOs in Kuwait.

Putting the guidelines in a historical context, Al-Baghli said, "NGOs have withstood other viscous campaigns. In the 1980s during the unconstitutional dissolution of parliament, they dissolved some NGOs and forced some to appoint boards handpicked by the government rather than allowing organizations to elect representatives." Calling the new guidelines 'unreasonable', he said, "We should reject them because there is no excuse for them.

To see more of The Kuwait Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.kuwaittimes.net/>. Copyright (c) 2008, Kuwait Times Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: July 24, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20080723-KU-Rights-body-slams-rampant-visa-trading-in-Kuwait-0723

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: KU

Copyright 2008 Kuwait Times

30 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Latina Viva

July 23, 2008 Wednesday 6:55 AM EST

Report on Slavery Today

LENGTH: 252 words

Jul. 23, 2008 (delivered by Newstex) -- © Every year the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons puts out a report on human trafficking in order to raise awareness on this modern form of slavery. Part of the report sorts international governments according to how much their efforts conform to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000. Now this is a US law, not an international law, but tracking this is one way the US tries to raise awareness on the topic, recognize the efforts of other countries, and encourage other governments to do more. Countries are classified in four . "Tier 1 countries aren't perfect, but they meet what are called the minimum standards for combating human trafficking in the U.S. law that governs how we prepare the report." -Ambassador Mark Lagon, Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons The only Tier 1 country in Latin America is Colombia.

That's it. All other Latin American nations are in Tier 2. The ambassador mentions significant improvement in Mexico, Venezuela, and Brazil. As for the US, it does not situate itself in the tier system, but does report to congress and make records public on domestic performance in fighting this heinous abuse. Human Trafficking is the third largest global , and Latin America, while not the most vulnerable, is still a major source for this market that buys and sells men, women, and children. It's worth and increasing our understanding. Newstex ID: CREA-0054-26859793

LOAD-DATE: July 23, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

NOTES: The views expressed on blogs distributed by Newstex and its re-distributors ("Blogs on DemandÆ") are solely the author's and not necessarily the views of Newstex or its re-distributors. Posts from such authors are provided "AS IS", with no warranties, and confer no rights. The material and information provided in Blogs on DemandÆ are for general information only and should not, in any respect, be relied on as professional advice. No content on such Blogs on DemandÆ is "read and approved" before it is posted. Accordingly, neither Newstex nor its re-distributors make any claims, promises or guarantees about the accuracy, completeness, or adequacy of the information contained therein or linked to from such blogs, nor take responsibility for any aspect of such blog content. All content on Blogs on DemandÆ shall be construed as author-based content and commentary. Accordingly, no warranties or other guarantees will be offered as to the quality of the opinions, commentary or anything else offered on such Blogs on DemandÆ. Reader's comments reflect their individual opinion and their publication within Blogs on DemandÆ shall not infer or connote an endorsement by Newstex or its re-distributors of such reader's comments or views. Newstex and its re-distributors expressly reserve the right to delete posts and comments at its and their sole discretion.

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Blog

Copyright 2008 Newstex LLC
All Rights Reserved
Newstex Web Blogs
Copyright 2008 Latina Viva

31 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Channel NewsAsia

July 21, 2008 Monday 4:14 PM GMT

Singapore rejects US assessment of its record on human trafficking

SECTION: SINGAPORE NEWS

LENGTH: 509 words

SINGAPORE: Singapore has rejected the US State Department's assessment that Singapore does not meet the "minimum standards" of the US Trafficking Victims Protection Act 2000. It described the assessment as "unjustified."

Deputy Prime Minister and Home Affairs Minister Wong Kan Seng said Singapore's laws are tough but fair and its approach to crime has been uncompromising. This applies as much to human trafficking as it does to any other crime.

Mr Wong made these points in his response to a written Parliamentary question from MP for Marine Parade GRC Dr Fatimah Lateef.

Dr Lateef had asked how Singapore views the Tier 2 placement the US State Department had given the republic, alongside Thailand and Cambodia, in its 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Mr Wong said Singapore's approach to human trafficking is not different from how it deals with crime in general.

Prostitution by anyone under 18 years of age is illegal. Also illegal is child sex tourism and the organisation or promotion of tours overseas for child sex. The penalties for all these offences are stiff.

Turning to another key focus of the report was Singapore's treatment of foreign domestic workers (FDW) working here.

Mr Wong pointed out that every FDW enters Singapore voluntarily via proper channels and is issued with a work permit. They should, therefore, not be included in a report on human trafficking.

Even so, Singapore has many measures in place to protect FDWs against exploitation. For instance, the Ministry of Manpower (MOM) conducts random interviews with FDWs working for the first time in Singapore during their initial months of employment.

This means there are ample opportunities for a FDW to contact the authorities if she is forced, deceived or coerced into employment against her will before and after she starts work.

Mr Wong also pointed out that the number of substantiated FDW abuse cases handled by the Police fell from 157 cases in 1997 to 68 cases in 2007, in spite of an increasing FDW population.

From 2004 to 2007, MOM successfully prosecuted a total of 13 errant employers for failing to pay wages due to their FDWs. Five of them were eventually jailed.

Stressing that instances of FDW abuse are not widespread, Mr Wong said the frequency of abuse should be seen in the context of the total number of FDWs in Singapore, which is some 180,000 as of 2007.

He said reports of isolated cases of abuse should not obscure the fact that the majority of foreign workers in Singapore are reasonably well-treated.

Summing up, Mr Wong said: "Singapore has often been criticised for being too tough in law enforcement. To be criticised instead for being too soft in the US State Department's TIP Report is strange indeed.

"Our Police will continue to work against trafficking as they do against all crimes. They are answerable to the Singapore people who will judge how they perform.

"In this regard, it is fortunate that the public at least is better informed and has a better understanding of the realities on the ground and can separate fair fact from unfair conjecture."

LOAD-DATE: July 21, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 MCN International Pte Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

32 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Taxindiaonline News

July 17, 2008 Thursday

LENGTH: 1462 words

JULY 17, 2008

Anti-Smuggling Conclave: Customs honchos discuss everything except human trafficking!

By Shailendra Kumar, Editor

LAST Friday, the CBEC top brass and the honchos of its anti-smuggling formations across the country deplaned in hordes at Ahmedabad. Purpose - CBEC Chairman wanted to have an overview of Cross-border National Security issues and the preparedness of the Indian Customs to the emerging challenges. Laudable indeed! One normally does not get to see such brain-straining conclaves in Customs and Excise unless some international organisation organises a meet in India to touch upon these sensitive issues. The CBEC bosses in the past have been known for their obsessive involvement in just the transfer-related functionality of the Board. But here is a new young crop of thinkers who deserve kudos for taking a day off the beaten track of routine works and deliberate on future challenges and a realistic roadmap for the Customs.

Nice, lucid and informative presentations were made by a large assortment of officers. And the topics which were elaborated on ranged from our porous borders with Nepal, Myanmar and Bangladesh and a vast coastline and riverine border with Sri Lanka and Bangladesh. Smuggling through legal routes - ports, airports and land customs stations - were also highlighted. The tools like risk management system and NIDB were praised for their efficacies. Joint Sea Patrol (JSP) system being followed in Maharashtra and Gujarat with the Navy, Coast Guard and State Police was also discussed. A close coordination with other key agencies working on borders like BSF and IB was re-emphasised. The need for modern logistical support was looked into. DRI focussed on some of the key areas like FICN, drugs and arms smuggling and also talked about some of the milestones of its achievements. True, DRI has of late grown in its stature because of its consistently remarkable seizures and impressive varieties of the cases, proving to be useful inputs for other enforcement agencies.

One of the important issues which emerged and discussed at length was the lacklustre existence of Customs (Preventive) structures. Although they exist but they exist merely to exist! They do not command fear among smuggling syndicates nor respect among other agencies which do expect vital inputs from them. The need for a complete revamp of these formations was acknowledged by all but a few and one may see these changes coming into effect before the present Chairman retires next year.

Member (Customs) hammered the much talked about issue of scanning of transshipment cargo for security reasons. The prevailing practice is that once the goods land at Nhava Sheva, they are simply shipped to the respective ICDs where they are examined or scanned before out of charge is given. What happens on way to the ICDs is not known or much feared for the nuisance potential of a bad cargo. Thus, Member (Cus) suggestion was well taken by many of the officers.

What TIOL would like to suggest here is that it would be more ideal if the Customs creates a separate cell for freight intelligence and the same can be shared with various formations and other agencies. Let it be a focussed domain of expertise and let the officers develop skills and also suggest modern measures to be adopted to ensure that only safe cargo could reach our ICDs. Let's recall a series of blasts at Delhi ICD a couple of years back when war junks were imported as iron scraps and some of the dying grenades had created scary noise! Such a unit can also work on different methods of sealing such containers and ensuring that they are not substituted on their way.

The JSP concept is another area where I would like to draw the attention of the policy makers. When it has been tangibly successful in Maharashtra and Gujarat what stops the CBEC from introducing the same for other coastline down south. India shares very sensitive borders with Sri Lanka. LTTE is one terrorist outfit which also aspires to control the maritime border. A good deal of smuggling of drugs, arms and other goods also takes place in this area. Therefore, it is important that the CBEC takes up the issue with the States along this coastline and put in place a modern JSP module.

Another area where the CBEC and the Ministry of Home may like to focus is the long stretch between the jurisdiction of West Bengal Preventive and the Vizag Customs. A major maritime border with Bangladesh is unprotected. It offers a risk-free avenue to organised smuggling syndicates and India needs to plug this hole.

Interestingly, the HR aspect was also discussed at length. But what is more interesting is that it was discussed without having the Member (P & V) present there. Therefore, it was an exercise in futility as the Member (P) would only get a written inputs rather than facing difficult queries from many querists. The staffing of preventive outfits has become a major issue in the past few months. The Member(P) appears to be having an outdated impression about the role of preventive outfits and that is why a quick analysis of the recent transfer orders reveals that he has left many posts of these formations unfilled. For instance, more than a dozen posts of AD in DRI's far-flung formations, the cutting-edge, have been left unfilled. Similarly, many Customs (Preventive) formations are understaffed or in many cases if somebody has been posted, the officers have not been relieved for joining there. Here the blame must be shared by the Member (Customs) also as he being directly accountable for their performance should have taken up the cudgels on their behalf. But he seems to be least sensitised about such ground-level issues of his field formations. Or, I heard somebody saying he is 'over-sensitised'!

Let me now move to some of the major tracks which this high-profile conclave should have discussed and shown vision in tune with a 21st century roadmap for the Customs. When I first heard of such a meet being organised, my expectations had gone up and I also thought that the CBEC honchos would certainly touch upon the issue of legal and illegal trade in human beings. Customs being a border management organisation does witness legal trade in skilled and unskilled labour. It rather witnesses illegal trade in much larger magnitude. But since it does not have any jurisdiction it keeps quiet. In view of the recent developments like the USA putting India on watch list for inflated human trafficking and the UN Study indicating serious scaling up this problem in India, this conclave should have at least called for merger of immigration department with the Customs. This would help the airport customs to keep an effective eye on the changing patterns of immigration trade. India being the second largest labour surplus country would see more scaling up of labour in the coming decades, and Customs can have much larger role to play in making it a licit export. I remember the Customs earlier used to have a 'Visa Desk' to keep a watch on profiles of passengers to curb drug smuggling. But this system was discontinued for reasons not known to many.

Let's take a look at this trade. Smuggling of people across national borders has become a lucrative illegal activity, as well as the extremely murky side, people-trafficking, especially of women who are enslaved typically as prostitutes. In the recent years it has become a highly organised crime. Worldwide, about 10 lakh people are trafficked across borders each year. A major chunk is accounted by women and children. More than a lakh people are trafficked from India as well. As many as 30,000 Nepalese are trafficked into India. The same number comes from Bangladesh. In fact India has emerged as a transit country not only for drugs but also human trafficking as these 'human goods' are transported to much lucrative destinations in the West and Middle East. Once can imagine the kind of money involved in this trade from one recent case in which one Member of Parliament was found involved in this racket.

Keeping in mind the growing magnitude of human trafficking India needs to legislatively and administratively gear up to meet this international challenge. This is one crime which earns bags of bad name for India's growing stature as a modern and tech-savvy economy. It is being put on watch list by many European countries and our Govt does need to get hurriedly sensitised about it. The domestic trafficking issue should be left to the police to handle, and cross-border trafficking jurisdiction should come to the Customs which is administratively and intelligence-wise better equipped to handle and manage our borders. I hope our top national security advisors would pay adequate attention to this issue before it becomes a full-blown HIV!

LOAD-DATE: July 17, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

33 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Radio Free Europe

July 7, 2008

Weak Laws, Energy Wealth, Contribute To Rise In Sex Trade

BYLINE: Radu Busneag, Khadija Ismaylova

SECTION: NEWS STORIES AND DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1597 words

Oksana, a young Moldovan woman, begins her story in a depressingly familiar way.

"I was friends with one girl and she offered me a job as a house painter in Moscow. I was 18 years old and I agreed because she was my best friend, my childhood friend," she says, her voice low and listless. "When we arrived in Moscow, I saw a pimp give her 15,000 rubles and a passport saying, 'Thank you for the human goods.' I said, 'What?' She said, 'Sorry about that, Oksana.' She sold me."

Like thousands of women throughout the former Soviet Union confronted by grinding poverty and bleak futures, Oksana's leap of faith landed her in the worst hell imaginable -- betrayed by a close acquaintance and sold into a violent, helpless life as a sex slave in the Russian capital.

"I spent one year there," Oksana continues. "I was humiliated, baited with dogs; my legs are still bruised. My veins were cut, I was forced to swallow stones, I was threatened with guns by clients because I refused to do certain things. I was beaten to a pulp; they treated me horribly. I lost 20 or 25 kilograms. A year later, one man helped me, he gave me $200, gave me some clothes, helped me as much as he could. He said, 'Run as fast as you can and don't look back.' I lived on the street for three years after that because I was scared. I was scared of everybody."

Nearly five years later, Oksana is out of harm and back in Moldova. But the impact of her experience will never leave her. Her message to young Moldovan women seeking employment abroad is both sad and knowing: "Girls, trust no one."

Follow The Money

The International Labor Organization (ILO) estimates that as many as 12.3 million people worldwide have been sold into modern-day slavery -- men, women, and children forced into labor and sexual servitude against their will and with little hope of recourse.

Some 80 percent of cross-border trafficking victims are women and girls sold into the commercial sex trade. Trafficking routes traditionally follow economic trends, and for many years, women from the former Soviet Union were sold and shuttled to places like Turkey, the United Arab Emirates, Western Europe, and the United States.

Now, however, the rising tide of energy wealth within the Commonwealth of Independent States has forged new slavery routes, with Russia, Azerbaijan, and Kazakhstan as their prime destinations.

Eva Biaudet, the special representative in fighting human trafficking for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), told journalists during a recent visit to Baku that the rapid economic growth in oil-rich Azerbaijan was translating into higher numbers of minors, foreign laborers, and sex workers trafficked into the country -- particularly from Central Asia.

"In this kind of economic situation there's always a dark side," says Biaudet. "It's our experience that in this kind of construction boom, trafficking in human beings can also be very easy for traffickers in labor exploitation. There's so much need for workers that they can bring them from China or from neighboring countries."

Above The Law?

For organizations like the OSCE, the U.S. State Department, and the United Nations, a perennial challenge is urging local governments to accept an active role in stemming trafficking networks and punishing ringleaders rather than their victims. For now, it is often the trafficked person who is the first to be arrested or otherwise punished in trafficking cases.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, introducing this year's State Department trafficking report in June, said that although more countries are addressing sex trafficking through prosecution and convictions, "the petty tyrants who exploit their laborers rarely receive serious punishment. We see this as a serious shortcoming."

In some trafficking cases, a reluctance to pursue traffickers is interpreted as evidence of government involvement. Sevil is a Baku woman who spent eight horrifying months as an enslaved sex worker in Istanbul -- once forced, on her birthday, to service 60 clients. She says her Azerbaijani trafficker, a woman, had routinely boasted of close ties to officials in Azerbaijan's government.

"She said, 'You think I'm in this by myself, but I have serious links with high-level officials. I can just pay someone to have you eliminated,'" Sevil says.

'Enormous Farce'

Azerbaijani officials reject any involvement in trafficking rings, and point to recent legislative initiatives as evidence of the government's determination to rout trafficking.

But experts like Alovzat Aliyev, the director of the Baku-based Center for Legal Assistance to Migrants, says as many as 60 percent of people arrested on trafficking charges are set free or given light punishments with no jail time -- despite a 5- to 15-year minimum sentence outlined in the country's criminal code.

Since 2004, all of Azerbaijan's antitrafficking efforts are coordinated by the Interior Ministry -- a situation that Aliyev says is inefficient at best, and criminal at worst.

"There's no effect, because all of the different parts -- the department for combating trafficking, the national coordinator, the victims' shelter -- are subordinated to a single ministry," Aliyev says. "This situation paves the way for corruption. Tasks should be distributed. Other ministries should be involved in combating trafficking, and there should be cooperation with NGOs."

In the first five months of 2008, criminal cases were opened against 45 trafficking suspects in Azerbaijan. Biauudet of the OSCE has expressed concern that most of those arrested are women and not those controlling the massive wealth and power backing the criminal rings. Aliyev alleges that criminal sweeps purposely avoid the most powerful clientele of sex-trafficking rings.

"There hasn't been a single case where a government official has been arrested for trafficking," he says. "It means that this enormous farce has been created to protect the officials who are the patrons of this slavery business, rather than to combat human trafficking."

The Price Of Inaction

Some countries, however, are beginning to feel the consequences of government inaction on trafficking. Moldova in June earned the dubious distinction of becoming the only European country to be added to a trafficking blacklist compiled by the U.S. State Department.

In its annual survey of 170 countries, the State Department dropped Moldova to a Tier 3 rating, its lowest category in terms of government efforts to fight human trafficking. The report says the demotion reflects Chisinau's "failure to tackle trafficking-related corruption as reflected in the handling of several high-profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking."

The new designation means that the United States may decide to withhold certain types of aid and impose sanctions unless Moldova takes steps to improve official steps against trafficking.

Michael Horowitz, a senior fellow at the Washington-based Hudson Institute think tank and a key figure in U.S. antitrafficking efforts, was behind the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which passed in 2000 and set the stage for the State Department's three-tier rating system.

Horowitz says the mechanism has proved effective because it makes a direct cause-and-effect link between antitrafficking efforts by local governments and U.S. policy affecting those governments.

"The power of the rating system has really changed government significantly," says Horowitz. "Because if you're in Tier 3, you're in a confrontation with the United States, where we suspend all cultural exchange funds, you lose nonhumanitarian aid, we vote against you for any access to the World Bank or the IMF, if the country is complicit in either sex trafficking or forced-labor trafficking. Countries now understand that relations with America are significantly contingent on what they do on this trafficking issue."

'The Great Issue Of The 21st Century'

On the local end of the antitrafficking battle are a network of NGOs who often say they get little in the way of government or global support. Oksana Alistratova heads a victims' protection NGO in Moldova's breakaway region of Transdnister, whose unresolved political status has made operations easy for sophisticated criminal rings trafficking drugs, weapons, and humans.

Despite receiving more than 1,000 calls a year from trafficking victims, Alistratova says her group has almost no money with which to help women seeking an escape from the sex trade.

"Our organization at present doesn't have the resources to build a center. We don't have a single center for victims in Transdnister," says Alistratova. "We even wanted to do it in our office -- to make at least one room where a person could get some rest or wait while we resolve some problems, or find them temporary housing. But that's a little dangerous. We don't always know what these people are tangled up in. Sometimes, as we know perfectly well, people lie and act like trafficking victims when they're actually traffickers themselves."

Since starting her work in 2006, Alistratova has secured the safe return of 30 women. Her organization helps them find housing, psychological counseling, and work. It's an uphill battle, however, and one that critics say needs far greater coordination and political will on all levels. "The great issue of the 21st century," says Michael Horowitz, "is the emancipation and empowerment of women."

Copyright (c) 2006. RFE/RL, Inc. Reprinted with the permission of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, 1201 Connecticut Ave., N.W. Washington DC 20036. www.rferl.org

LOAD-DATE: July 8, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

JOURNAL-CODE: RF

34 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Radio Free Europe

July 7, 2008

Weak Laws, Energy Wealth Fuel Rise In Sex Trade

BYLINE: Radu Benea, Khadija Ismaylova

SECTION: NEWS STORIES AND DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1597 words

Oksana, a young Moldovan woman, begins her story in a depressingly familiar way.

"I was friends with one girl and she offered me a job as a house painter in Moscow. I was 18 years old and I agreed because she was my best friend, my childhood friend," she says, her voice low and listless. "When we arrived in Moscow, I saw a pimp give her 15,000 rubles and a passport saying, 'Thank you for the human goods.' I said, 'What?' She said, 'Sorry about that, Oksana.' She sold me."

Like thousands of women throughout the former Soviet Union confronted by grinding poverty and bleak futures, Oksana's leap of faith landed her in the worst hell imaginable -- betrayed by a close acquaintance and sold into a violent, helpless life as a sex slave in the Russian capital.

"I spent one year there," Oksana continues. "I was humiliated, baited with dogs; my legs are still bruised. My veins were cut, I was forced to swallow stones, I was threatened with guns by clients because I refused to do certain things. I was beaten to a pulp; they treated me horribly. I lost 20 or 25 kilograms. A year later, one man helped me, he gave me $200, gave me some clothes, helped me as much as he could. He said, 'Run as fast as you can and don't look back.' I lived on the street for three years after that because I was scared. I was scared of everybody."

Nearly five years later, Oksana is out of harm and back in Moldova. But the impact of her experience will never leave her. Her message to young Moldovan women seeking employment abroad is both sad and knowing: "Girls, trust no one."

Follow The Money

The International Labor Organization (ILO) estimates that as many as 12.3 million people worldwide have been sold into modern-day slavery -- men, women, and children forced into labor and sexual servitude against their will and with little hope of recourse.

Some 80 percent of cross-border trafficking victims are women and girls sold into the commercial sex trade. Trafficking routes traditionally follow economic trends, and for many years, women from the former Soviet Union were sold and shuttled to places like Turkey, the United Arab Emirates, Western Europe, and the United States.

Now, however, the rising tide of energy wealth within the Commonwealth of Independent States has forged new slavery routes, with Russia, Azerbaijan, and Kazakhstan as their prime destinations.

Eva Biaudet, the special representative in fighting human trafficking for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), told journalists during a recent visit to Baku that the rapid economic growth in oil-rich Azerbaijan was translating into higher numbers of minors, foreign laborers, and sex workers trafficked into the country -- particularly from Central Asia.

"In this kind of economic situation there's always a dark side," says Biaudet. "It's our experience that in this kind of construction boom, trafficking in human beings can also be very easy for traffickers in labor exploitation. There's so much need for workers that they can bring them from China or from neighboring countries."

Above The Law?

For organizations like the OSCE, the U.S. State Department, and the United Nations, a perennial challenge is urging local governments to accept an active role in stemming trafficking networks and punishing ringleaders rather than their victims. For now, it is often the trafficked person who is the first to be arrested or otherwise punished in trafficking cases.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, introducing this year's State Department trafficking report in June, said that although more countries are addressing sex trafficking through prosecution and convictions, "the petty tyrants who exploit their laborers rarely receive serious punishment. We see this as a serious shortcoming."

In some trafficking cases, a reluctance to pursue traffickers is interpreted as evidence of government involvement. Sevil is a Baku woman who spent eight horrifying months as an enslaved sex worker in Istanbul -- once forced, on her birthday, to service 60 clients. She says her Azerbaijani trafficker, a woman, had routinely boasted of close ties to officials in Azerbaijan's government.

"She said, 'You think I'm in this by myself, but I have serious links with high-level officials. I can just pay someone to have you eliminated,'" Sevil says.

'Enormous Farce'

Azerbaijani officials reject any involvement in trafficking rings, and point to recent legislative initiatives as evidence of the government's determination to rout trafficking.

But experts like Alovzat Aliyev, the director of the Baku-based Center for Legal Assistance to Migrants, says as many as 60 percent of people arrested on trafficking charges are set free or given light punishments with no jail time -- despite a 5- to 15-year minimum sentence outlined in the country's criminal code.

Since 2004, all of Azerbaijan's antitrafficking efforts are coordinated by the Interior Ministry -- a situation that Aliyev says is inefficient at best, and criminal at worst.

"There's no effect, because all of the different parts -- the department for combating trafficking, the national coordinator, the victims' shelter -- are subordinated to a single ministry," Aliyev says. "This situation paves the way for corruption. Tasks should be distributed. Other ministries should be involved in combating trafficking, and there should be cooperation with NGOs."

In the first five months of 2008, criminal cases were opened against 45 trafficking suspects in Azerbaijan. Biauudet of the OSCE has expressed concern that most of those arrested are women and not those controlling the massive wealth and power backing the criminal rings. Aliyev alleges that criminal sweeps purposely avoid the most powerful clientele of sex-trafficking rings.

"There hasn't been a single case where a government official has been arrested for trafficking," he says. "It means that this enormous farce has been created to protect the officials who are the patrons of this slavery business, rather than to combat human trafficking."

The Price Of Inaction

Some countries, however, are beginning to feel the consequences of government inaction on trafficking. Moldova in June earned the dubious distinction of becoming the only European country to be added to a trafficking blacklist compiled by the U.S. State Department.

In its annual survey of 170 countries, the State Department dropped Moldova to a Tier 3 rating, its lowest category in terms of government efforts to fight human trafficking. The report says the demotion reflects Chisinau's "failure to tackle trafficking-related corruption as reflected in the handling of several high-profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking."

The new designation means that the United States may decide to withhold certain types of aid and impose sanctions unless Moldova takes steps to improve official steps against trafficking.

Michael Horowitz, a senior fellow at the Washington-based Hudson Institute think tank and a key figure in U.S. antitrafficking efforts, was behind the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which passed in 2000 and set the stage for the State Department's three-tier rating system.

Horowitz says the mechanism has proved effective because it makes a direct cause-and-effect link between antitrafficking efforts by local governments and U.S. policy affecting those governments.

"The power of the rating system has really changed government significantly," says Horowitz. "Because if you're in Tier 3, you're in a confrontation with the United States, where we suspend all cultural exchange funds, you lose nonhumanitarian aid, we vote against you for any access to the World Bank or the IMF, if the country is complicit in either sex trafficking or forced-labor trafficking. Countries now understand that relations with America are significantly contingent on what they do on this trafficking issue."

'The Great Issue Of The 21st Century'

On the local end of the antitrafficking battle are a network of NGOs who often say they get little in the way of government or global support. Oksana Alistratova heads a victims' protection NGO in Moldova's breakaway region of Transdnister, whose unresolved political status has made operations easy for sophisticated criminal rings trafficking drugs, weapons, and humans.

Despite receiving more than 1,000 calls a year from trafficking victims, Alistratova says her group has almost no money with which to help women seeking an escape from the sex trade.

"Our organization at present doesn't have the resources to build a center. We don't have a single center for victims in Transdnister," says Alistratova. "We even wanted to do it in our office -- to make at least one room where a person could get some rest or wait while we resolve some problems, or find them temporary housing. But that's a little dangerous. We don't always know what these people are tangled up in. Sometimes, as we know perfectly well, people lie and act like trafficking victims when they're actually traffickers themselves."

Since starting her work in 2006, Alistratova has secured the safe return of 30 women. Her organization helps them find housing, psychological counseling, and work. It's an uphill battle, however, and one that critics say needs far greater coordination and political will on all levels. "The great issue of the 21st century," says Michael Horowitz, "is the emancipation and empowerment of women."

Copyright (c) 2006. RFE/RL, Inc. Reprinted with the permission of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, 1201 Connecticut Ave., N.W. Washington DC 20036. www.rferl.org

LOAD-DATE: July 18, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

JOURNAL-CODE: RF

35 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

July 7, 2008 Monday

WEAK LAWS, ENERGY WEALTH, CONTRIBUTE TO RISE IN SEX TRADE

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1583 words

DATELINE: PRAGUE, Czech Republic

The following information was released by Radio Free Europe / Radio Liberty:

Oksana, a young Moldovan woman, begins her story in a depressingly familiar way.

"I was friends with one girl and she offered me a job as a house painter in Moscow. I was 18 years old and I agreed because she was my best friend, my childhood friend," she says, her voice low and listless. "When we arrived in Moscow, I saw a pimp give her 15,000 rubles and a passport saying, 'Thank you for the human goods.' I said, 'What?' She said, 'Sorry about that, Oksana.' She sold me."

Like thousands of women throughout the former Soviet Union confronted by grinding poverty and bleak futures, Oksana's leap of faith landed her in the worst hell imaginable -- betrayed by a close acquaintance and sold into a violent, helpless life as a sex slave in the Russian capital.

"I spent one year there," Oksana continues. "I was humiliated, baited with dogs; my legs are still bruised. My veins were cut, I was forced to swallow stones, I was threatened with guns by clients because I refused to do certain things. I was beaten to a pulp; they treated me horribly. I lost 20 or 25 kilograms. A year later, one man helped me, he gave me $200, gave me some clothes, helped me as much as he could. He said, 'Run as fast as you can and don't look back.' I lived on the street for three years after that because I was scared. I was scared of everybody."

Nearly five years later, Oksana is out of harm and back in Moldova. But the impact of her experience will never leave her. Her message to young Moldovan women seeking employment abroad is both sad and knowing: "Girls, trust no one."

Follow The Money

The International Labor Organization (ILO) estimates that as many as 12.3 million people worldwide have been sold into modern-day slavery -- men, women, and children forced into labor and sexual servitude against their will and with little hope of recourse.

Some 80 percent of cross-border trafficking victims are women and girls sold into the commercial sex trade. Trafficking routes traditionally follow economic trends, and for many years, women from the former Soviet Union were sold and shuttled to places like Turkey, the United Arab Emirates, Western Europe, and the United States.

Now, however, the rising tide of energy wealth within the Commonwealth of Independent States has forged new slavery routes, with Russia, Azerbaijan, and Kazakhstan as their prime destinations.

Eva Biaudet, the special representative in fighting human trafficking for the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), told journalists during a recent visit to Baku that the rapid economic growth in oil-rich Azerbaijan was translating into higher numbers of minors, foreign laborers, and sex workers trafficked into the country -- particularly from Central Asia.

"In this kind of economic situation there's always a dark side," says Biaudet. "It's our experience that in this kind of construction boom, trafficking in human beings can also be very easy for traffickers in labor exploitation. There's so much need for workers that they can bring them from China or from neighboring countries."

Above The Law?

For organizations like the OSCE, the U.S. State Department, and the United Nations, a perennial challenge is urging local governments to accept an active role in stemming trafficking networks and punishing ringleaders rather than their victims. For now, it is often the trafficked person who is the first to be arrested or otherwise punished in trafficking cases.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, introducing this year's State Department trafficking report in June, said that although more countries are addressing sex trafficking through prosecution and convictions, "the petty tyrants who exploit their laborers rarely receive serious punishment. We see this as a serious shortcoming."

In some trafficking cases, a reluctance to pursue traffickers is interpreted as evidence of government involvement. Sevil is a Baku woman who spent eight horrifying months as an enslaved sex worker in Istanbul -- once forced, on her birthday, to service 60 clients. She says her Azerbaijani trafficker, a woman, had routinely boasted of close ties to officials in Azerbaijan's government.

"She said, 'You think I'm in this by myself, but I have serious links with high-level officials. I can just pay someone to have you eliminated,'" Sevil says.

'Enormous Farce'

Azerbaijani officials reject any involvement in trafficking rings, and point to recent legislative initiatives as evidence of the government's determination to rout trafficking.

But experts like Alovzat Aliyev, the director of the Baku-based Center for Legal Assistance to Migrants, says as many as 60 percent of people arrested on trafficking charges are set free or given light punishments with no jail time -- despite a 5- to 15-year minimum sentence outlined in the country's criminal code.

Since 2004, all of Azerbaijan's antitrafficking efforts are coordinated by the Interior Ministry -- a situation that Aliyev says is inefficient at best, and criminal at worst.

"There's no effect, because all of the different parts -- the department for combating trafficking, the national coordinator, the victims' shelter -- are subordinated to a single ministry," Aliyev says. "This situation paves the way for corruption. Tasks should be distributed. Other ministries should be involved in combating trafficking, and there should be cooperation with NGOs."

In the first five months of 2008, criminal cases were opened against 45 trafficking suspects in Azerbaijan. Biaudet of the OSCE has expressed concern that most of those arrested are women and not those controlling the massive wealth and power backing the criminal rings. Aliyev alleges that criminal sweeps purposely avoid the most powerful clientele of sex-trafficking rings.

"There hasn't been a single case where a government official has been arrested for trafficking," he says. "It means that this enormous farce has been created to protect the officials who are the patrons of this slavery business, rather than to combat human trafficking."

The Price Of Inaction

Some countries, however, are beginning to feel the consequences of government inaction on trafficking. Moldova in June earned the dubious distinction of becoming the only European country to be added to a trafficking blacklist compiled by the U.S. State Department.

In its annual survey of 170 countries, the State Department dropped Moldova to a Tier 3 rating, its lowest category in terms of government efforts to fight human trafficking. The report says the demotion reflects Chisinau's "failure to tackle trafficking-related corruption as reflected in the handling of several high-profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking."

The new designation means that the United States may decide to withhold certain types of aid and impose sanctions unless Moldova takes steps to improve official steps against trafficking.

Michael Horowitz, a senior fellow at the Washington-based Hudson Institute think tank and a key figure in U.S. antitrafficking efforts, was behind the Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which passed in 2000 and set the stage for the State Department's three-tier rating system.

Horowitz says the mechanism has proved effective because it makes a direct cause-and-effect link between antitrafficking efforts by local governments and U.S. policy affecting those governments.

"The power of the rating system has really changed government significantly," says Horowitz. "Because if you're in Tier 3, you're in a confrontation with the United States, where we suspend all cultural exchange funds, you lose nonhumanitarian aid, we vote against you for any access to the World Bank or the IMF, if the country is complicit in either sex trafficking or forced-labor trafficking. Countries now understand that relations with America are significantly contingent on what they do on this trafficking issue."

'The Great Issue Of The 21st Century'

On the local end of the antitrafficking battle are a network of NGOs who often say they get little in the way of government or global support. Oksana Alistratova heads a victims' protection NGO in Moldova's breakaway region of Transdnister, whose unresolved political status has made operations easy for sophisticated criminal rings trafficking drugs, weapons, and humans.

Despite receiving more than 1,000 calls a year from trafficking victims, Alistratova says her group has almost no money with which to help women seeking an escape from the sex trade.

"Our organization at present doesn't have the resources to build a center. We don't have a single center for victims in Transdnister," says Alistratova. "We even wanted to do it in our office -- to make at least one room where a person could get some rest or wait while we resolve some problems, or find them temporary housing. But that's a little dangerous. We don't always know what these people are tangled up in. Sometimes, as we know perfectly well, people lie and act like trafficking victims when they're actually traffickers themselves."

Since starting her work in 2006, Alistratova has secured the safe return of 30 women. Her organization helps them find housing, psychological counseling, and work. It's an uphill battle, however, and one that critics say needs far greater coordination and political will on all levels. "The great issue of the 21st century," says Michael Horowitz, "is the emancipation and empowerment of women."

LOAD-DATE: July 7, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

36 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 27, 2008 Friday 7:39 PM TST

NGOs, government agencies discuss anti-human trafficking law

BYLINE: Emmanuelle Tzeng @

LENGTH: 449 words

DATELINE: Taipei, June 27

The first hearing on the possible enactment of an anti-human trafficking law was held at the Legislative Yuan Friday, with a view to addressing the problem of human trafficking in Taiwan and guaranteeing the rights of victims.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2008, released earlier this month by the United States Department of State, listed Taiwan as a "Tier 2" country, describing it as a destination for men, women and children trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and sexual exploitation.

According to the report, Taiwan is also a source of women trafficked to Japan, Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States.

@The hearing, held by Kuomintang legislator Wu Yu-sheng, gathered an alliance of 11 non-governmental organizations and governmental agencies, as well as a representative of a group of lawyers who drafted a non-governmental version of an anti-human trafficking law.

In late 2007, the Executive Yuan announced a plan of action to tackle human trafficking in Taiwan, to protect victims and punish perpetrators.

However, it requires special legislation in order to attain these goals, one of participants at the hearing stated.

"A specialized law is needed to precisely define the meaning of human trafficking, formulate punishments that can deter criminals, and to protect both foreigners and nationals," said Cynthia Kao, executive director of the Taipei Womens Rescue Foundation, during the hearing.

With this in mind, the non-governmental alliance presented a draft anti-human trafficking law that covers crimes of sexual and forced labor exploitations and organ harvesting.

The National Immigration Agency will also present its own version of the draft law in the near future.

Other hearings on the possible enactment of the law will be held during the next few months, and the discussions on the draft bills will be given priority in the Legislative Yuan's Internal Affairs Committee, Wu said.

@Taiwan was ranked among the "Tier 1" countries in the U.S. report from 2001 to 2004, which indicated that the country had fully complied with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking. However, it was downgraded to "Tier 2" in 2005, and placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" in 2006, partly because foreign workers' rights in Taiwan are not fully protected by the Labor Standards Law.

@The United Nations defines human trafficking as the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harboring or receipt of persons, by means of threat or the use of force or other forms of coercion. The U.N. also includes in its definition of human trafficking the use of abduction, fraud, deception and the abuse of power to recruit or transfer people for the purpose of exploitation.

LOAD-DATE: June 27, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

37 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Global Insight

June 25, 2008

U.S. Human-Trafficking Report Condemned by Gulf States

BYLINE: Sara HassanSECTION: In BriefLENGTH: 229 words

States from the six-member Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) have protested over a new U.S. report on human trafficking within which they are accused of being slow to clamp down on the problem. The report issued by the State Department kept Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar, and Oman on a blacklist of countries which have failed to deal with human trafficking within the borders; however, the report claimed that substantial progress had been made in Bahrain and the United Arab Emirates. GCC foreign ministers who met in Saudi Arabia last week called on the U.S. State Department "to revise its unfriendly policy" towards member countries, saying that information had been manipulated for "political ends" according to Agence France-Presse (AFP). Senior advisor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Mark Logan, called the performance of several nations in the Gulf a "matter of concern and disappointment".

Significance: Questions relating to human trafficking and the protection of rights have been a sensitive issue in Gulf-U.S. relations and have been the subject of previous diplomatic discord. The new report, which is mandated by an act of Congress, claims that the four blacklisted countries have failed international reporting standards and that some immigrants continue to face conditions of "involuntary servitude" and even sexual exploitation within the individual nations.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

38 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

June 18, 2008

House Vietnam Caucus, Vietnamese Leaders to Press for Human Rights Reforms Ahead of Prime Minister Visit

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 540 words

June 18, 2008

Contact: Ryan Goodwin (202) 225-3765

House Vietnam Caucus, Vietnamese Leaders to Press for Human Rights Reforms Ahead of Prime Minister Visit

WHO: Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-CA), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-CA), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Frank Wolf (R-VA), Ranking Member of the Subcommittee on State and Foreign Operations

Vietnamese Groups

Boat People SOS

Committee for Religious Freedom in Vietnam

International Committee for Freedom

others to be added

WHEN: Thursday, June 19, 2008

10:30 AM

WHERE: Cannon Terrace

(alongside Cannon House Office Building)

BACKGROUND:

In advance of the expected visit of Vietnam Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung, the bipartisan House Vietnam Caucus, along with several Vietnamese community leaders will hold a "need to reform" press conference to highlight the horrific human rights abuses in Vietnam. The members will also call upon President Bush to make human rights a focal point of the agenda in the meetings with the Vietnam Prime Minister. "Massive human rights violations perpetrated by the Government of Vietnam will not be forgotten, overlooked or trivialized. We will continue to highlight these abuses-which are ongoing today-in an attempt to offer encouragement, solidarity and hope to the victims and pressure the government to reform," said Vietnam Caucus Co-Chair, Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ).

"The Vietnam Human Rights Act which will help to promote democracy, religious freedom and human rights reforms is supported by leading Vietnamese human rights groups and has already overwhelmingly passed the House. The Government of Vietnam can make the legislation unnecessary by simply providing fundamental human rights protections to its own citizens," said Rep. Smith, the author of the legislation. Specifically, Smith's bill (HR 3096), which passed the House last September would prohibit increased U.S. non-humanitarian assistance to the Government of Vietnam unless there is verifiable evidence that the Vietnamese Government has made substantial progress toward the release of its political and religious prisoners, respecting the right to freedom of religion, returning properties, allowing free and open access to refugee programs, respecting the human rights of members of all ethnic minority groups, and taking appropriate steps to end trafficking in persons. Smith's legislation also authorizes $4 million over two years for organizations and individuals that promote human rights in Vietnam, authorizes over $10 million to help stop the Vietnamese Government's jamming of Radio Free Asia, and requires the State Department to issue an annual report on the progress of human rights reform in Vietnam.

The press conference will also focus on Vietnam's horrendous record of human trafficking. In the most recent Trafficking in Persons Report released by the State Department earlier this month, Vietnam is designated as a "Tier 2" country of concern and a primary source country for women and children trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor. "Vietnam has an egregious record of abuse, both in sex and labor trafficking and they do little to protect the victim or prosecute the criminal," said Smith.

###

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: DOH

39 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

June 17, 2008

House Vietnam Caucus, Vietnamese Leaders to Press for Human Rights Reforms Ahead of Prime Minister Visit

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 540 words

June 17, 2008

Contact: Ryan Goodwin (202) 225-3765

House Vietnam Caucus, Vietnamese Leaders to Press for Human Rights Reforms Ahead of Prime Minister Visit

WHO: Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-CA), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-CA), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Frank Wolf (R-VA), Ranking Member of the Subcommittee on State and Foreign Operations

Vietnamese Groups

Boat People SOS

Committee for Religious Freedom in Vietnam

International Committee for Freedom

others to be added

WHEN: Thursday, June 19, 2008

10:30 pm

WHERE: Cannon Terrace

(alongside Cannon House Office Building)

BACKGROUND:

In advance of the expected visit of Vietnam Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung, the bipartisan House Vietnam Caucus, along with several Vietnamese community leaders will hold a "need to reform" press conference to highlight the horrific human rights abuses in Vietnam. The members will also call upon President Bush to make human rights a focal point of the agenda in the meetings with the Vietnam Prime Minister. "Massive human rights violations perpetrated by the Government of Vietnam will not be forgotten, overlooked or trivialized. We will continue to highlight these abuses-which are ongoing today-in an attempt to offer encouragement, solidarity and hope to the victims and pressure the government to reform," said Vietnam Caucus Co-Chair, Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ).

"The Vietnam Human Rights Act which will help to promote democracy, religious freedom and human rights reforms is supported by leading Vietnamese human rights groups and has already overwhelmingly passed the House. The Government of Vietnam can make the legislation unnecessary by simply providing fundamental human rights protections to its own citizens," said Rep. Smith, the author of the legislation. Specifically, Smith's bill (HR 3096), which passed the House last September would prohibit increased U.S. non-humanitarian assistance to the Government of Vietnam unless there is verifiable evidence that the Vietnamese Government has made substantial progress toward the release of its political and religious prisoners, respecting the right to freedom of religion, returning properties, allowing free and open access to refugee programs, respecting the human rights of members of all ethnic minority groups, and taking appropriate steps to end trafficking in persons. Smith's legislation also authorizes $4 million over two years for organizations and individuals that promote human rights in Vietnam, authorizes over $10 million to help stop the Vietnamese Government's jamming of Radio Free Asia, and requires the State Department to issue an annual report on the progress of human rights reform in Vietnam.

The press conference will also focus on Vietnam's horrendous record of human trafficking. In the most recent Trafficking in Persons Report released by the State Department earlier this month, Vietnam is designated as a "Tier 2" country of concern and a primary source country for women and children trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor. "Vietnam has an egregious record of abuse, both in sex and labor trafficking and they do little to protect the victim or prosecute the criminal," said Smith.

###

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: DOH

40 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

June 17, 2008

MEDIA ADVISORY REVISED: House Vietnam Caucus, Vietnamese Leaders to Press for Human Rights Reforms Ahead of Prime Minister Visit

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 540 words

June 17, 2008

Contact: Ryan Goodwin (202) 225-3765

House Vietnam Caucus, Vietnamese Leaders to Press for Human Rights Reforms Ahead of Prime Minister Visit

WHO: Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-CA), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Zoe Lofgren (D-CA), Vietnam Caucus Co-chair

Rep. Frank Wolf (R-VA), Ranking Member of the Subcommittee on State and Foreign Operations

Vietnamese Groups

Boat People SOS

Committee for Religious Freedom in Vietnam

International Committee for Freedom

others to be added

WHEN: Thursday, June 19, 2008

10:30 AM

WHERE: Cannon Terrace

(alongside Cannon House Office Building)

BACKGROUND:

In advance of the expected visit of Vietnam Prime Minister Nguyen Tan Dung, the bipartisan House Vietnam Caucus, along with several Vietnamese community leaders will hold a "need to reform" press conference to highlight the horrific human rights abuses in Vietnam. The members will also call upon President Bush to make human rights a focal point of the agenda in the meetings with the Vietnam Prime Minister. "Massive human rights violations perpetrated by the Government of Vietnam will not be forgotten, overlooked or trivialized. We will continue to highlight these abuses-which are ongoing today-in an attempt to offer encouragement, solidarity and hope to the victims and pressure the government to reform," said Vietnam Caucus Co-Chair, Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ).

"The Vietnam Human Rights Act which will help to promote democracy, religious freedom and human rights reforms is supported by leading Vietnamese human rights groups and has already overwhelmingly passed the House. The Government of Vietnam can make the legislation unnecessary by simply providing fundamental human rights protections to its own citizens," said Rep. Smith, the author of the legislation. Specifically, Smith's bill (HR 3096), which passed the House last September would prohibit increased U.S. non-humanitarian assistance to the Government of Vietnam unless there is verifiable evidence that the Vietnamese Government has made substantial progress toward the release of its political and religious prisoners, respecting the right to freedom of religion, returning properties, allowing free and open access to refugee programs, respecting the human rights of members of all ethnic minority groups, and taking appropriate steps to end trafficking in persons. Smith's legislation also authorizes $4 million over two years for organizations and individuals that promote human rights in Vietnam, authorizes over $10 million to help stop the Vietnamese Government's jamming of Radio Free Asia, and requires the State Department to issue an annual report on the progress of human rights reform in Vietnam.

The press conference will also focus on Vietnam's horrendous record of human trafficking. In the most recent Trafficking in Persons Report released by the State Department earlier this month, Vietnam is designated as a "Tier 2" country of concern and a primary source country for women and children trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor. "Vietnam has an egregious record of abuse, both in sex and labor trafficking and they do little to protect the victim or prosecute the criminal," said Smith.

###

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: DOH

41 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Irish Times

June 16, 2008 Monday

Human trafficking

SECTION: OPINION; Pg. 15LENGTH: 423 words

SLAVERY WAS one form of human bondage that most people thought had ended with its abolition in Britain and the US in the 19th century. In the 21st century, however, it has assumed a new guise. Modern-day slavery involves the trafficking of men, women and children to work as forced labour in factories, farms and brothels. Earlier this month the US State Department published its annual human trafficking report, now regarded as the most comprehensive review of how 170 countries are tackling the problem. It makes depressing reading.

The report placed Ireland in the second of three performance tiers, based on an assessment of its record in prosecuting offenders, in protecting victims and in preventing abuses. This means the Government has failed to meet the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but is making significant efforts to do so. In the 19th century Daniel O'Connell was at the forefront of the campaign to abolish slavery. Today Ireland is a far more affluent country and its recent economic success has been underpinned by immigrant labour. But its low rating on this global human trafficking index is a national embarrassment.

There are, however, some mitigating factors. During the time the rating review was undertaken, Ireland had no comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation in place. It now has. On June 7th, the Criminal Law (Human Trafficking) Act 2008, which makes trafficking of adults and children for labour or sexual exploitation illegal, came into effect. In addition, a bill to give greater protection to victims of trafficking, which the Oireachtas is debating, has been given legal effect on a temporary basis. Although not perfect, these measures should go some way towards better equipping Ireland to meet the human trafficking challenge.

Ireland's human trafficking crimes may well be seen as small in a global context. But they should be a cause of major concern. Academic studies have concluded that between 2000 and 2006, 76 victims of trafficking were brought here for sexual exploitation, though this figure is widely believed to be an underestimate. Another study estimates that between July 2005 and December 2007, there were some 46 cases of suspected labour trafficking. The lack of adequate legislation has greatly reduced the State's capacity to curb human trafficking, with no prosecutions or convictions reported for 2007. But with new legislation in place, it is critically important that Ireland secures a return to the top tier of countries in countering human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

42 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 16, 2008 Monday

Curbing human trafficking: S'pore falls short, says US; Despite Penal Code changes, Republic has not fully met international norms

BYLINE: Arlina Arshad

LENGTH: 586 words

SINGAPORE still falls short of international standards to fight human trafficking, despite recently amending the Penal Code so those who sexually exploit minors overseas - as well as child-sex tour organisers and promoters - can be jailed.

Based on the US State Department's annual Trafficking In Persons Report released recently, Singapore is among 70 nations placed in 'Tier 2', alongside countries like Cambodia and Thailand.

Those in this tier do not fully comply with minimum international standards of protecting migrant workers from conditions of forced labour or other forms of trafficking in persons, even if they are making 'significant efforts' to do so.

This year, the report acknowledged Singapore's 'significant efforts' to criminalise trafficking, notably the Penal Code changes in February.

But the country fell short because it did not prosecute or convict any trafficking offenders during this period.

The report also noted that Singapore lacks measures to protect trafficking victims, including maids subjected to forced labour conditions.

Of the 28 human-trafficking reports investigated by the Ministry of Home Affairs (MHA), 27 were dropped due to lack of substantiating evidence, the report noted. One is still under investigation.

The ministry disputed these cases cited by the report, saying they were 'disputes of various natures' but not trafficking offences. It could not provide further details.

The report also said 130 people were arrested for pimping and abetting vice offences, and 15 pimps and 30 vice-abettors were prosecuted for living on the earnings of prostitutes or operating brothels, or both.

But the ministry spokesman said the instances of women being duped into vice were 'few and far between'.

'None of the prostitutes were found to be forced or lured into prostitution under false pretences, constituting trafficking in persons' offences,' she said.

'The misperception that lack of prosecution arising from the reported cases was due to ineffective enforcement must be corrected.'

The US State Department's report evaluates countries' efforts in fighting the trafficking of people forced into servitude or the sex trade every year.

It includes countries deemed to have a 'significant' number of victims, or at least 100, and they are put into four levels - Tiers 1 and 2, a Tier 2 Special Watchlist, and the blacklisted ones in Tier 3.

A total of 154 countries were rated this year, based on research conducted between April last year and this March.

Singapore has been in Tier 2 since the report's 2001 launch, except in 2003, when it was excluded, and 2006, when it made it to Tier 1.

Activists say the problem lies with Singapore's narrow definition of 'trafficking'.

Women who may have been brought here under false pretences and then forced to work as prostitutes or abused labourers, for example, often end up classified as immigration offenders, not victims.

'It means that the traffickers get away with the crime and the victims of trafficking risk being prosecuted,' said Ms Constance Singam, president of the Association of Women for Action and Research.

And as far as maids are concerned, United Nations Development Fund for Women Singapore president Saleemah Ismail said maids are also reluctant to seek legal recourse as complainants have to remain in Singapore, without any source of income, for the entire duration of the case.

'These migrant domestic workers are often the only breadwinners back home...For many, it is a cost they cannot afford,' she said.

arlina@sph.com.sg

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Singapore Press Holdings Limited
All Rights Reserved

43 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 16, 2008 Monday

More Filipinas turn to embassy

LENGTH: 299 words

THE number of Filipinas turning to their embassy claiming they were lured here with promises of good jobs but ended up working as prostitutes has shot up in the last few years.

The Philippine Embassy's First Secretary and Consul Neal Imperial said there were 212 cases last year, 125 cases in 2006, and 59 in 2005. This year's cases are still being compiled.

Of the 212 cases last year, only three women filed police reports resulting in convictions. None of the convictions were for human trafficking.

Singapore's Home Affairs Ministry has maintained in the past that the existence of vice activities does not mean that there is human trafficking in Singapore.

The police have a dedicated unit that looks into vice issues, including trafficking of women for commercial sexual exploitation.

Mr Imperial said the numbers, though, may just be the tip of the iceberg as many may not have come forward for fear of being viewed as violators of immigration or labour laws, rather than victims. They also do not want to be stuck here without work while the cases are in court.

On its part, the Philippines, itself a Tier 2 country like Singapore, was also chastised in the US State Department's annual Trafficking In Persons Report for demonstrating 'weak efforts to prosecute trafficking cases and convict trafficking offenders'.

The report noted some of the problems actually start in the Philippines.

A 'significant number' of Filipinos are subjected to conditions of 'involuntary servitude' or trafficked abroad for commercial sexual exploitation to countries.

Said Mr Imperial: 'Human trafficking is a scourge that has no place in this day and age. We hope to strengthen our cooperation with the Singapore Government to stop this transnational crime and prevent more women...from being exploited.'

ARLINA ARSHAD

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

44 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 15, 2008 Sunday

Illegal rallies not the way, says Syed Hamid

BYLINE: Lee Shi-Ian

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 8

LENGTH: 286 words

KUALA LUMPUR: The opposition was warned not to politicise the fuel price hike through illegal gatherings which can worsen the situation and threaten public order.

Home Minister Datuk Seri Syed Hamid Albar said the hike in oil prices was a global issue and the government was finding ways to reduce the impact on the people.

"Organising gatherings without a permit is an offence and police are empowered to take action," Syed Hamid said on about Friday's illegal rally in Kampung Baru.

Several thousand people marched more than a kilometre from the Kampung Baru mosque to the Pas headquarters in Jalan Raja Laut to protest the fuel price hike.

"These rallies are not only illegal but it causes traffic congestion and disrupts businesses in the area.

"At the same time, it causes alarm among the tourists," Syed Hamid said, after attending the police family day celebrations at Taman Titiwangsa yesterday.

"This in turn affects the country's economy. Those who wish to organise gatherings and rallies should apply for a permit.

"Demonstrations and rallies will not solve the problem."

On the global assessment by "Trafficking in Persons Report 2008" where Malaysia had been placed on the Tier 2 Special Watch List of countries, he said this reflected the government's commitment in battling human trafficking.

The report was released by the United States Department of State and Malaysia is among 40 countries that have been placed on the Tier 2 Special Watch List.

These countries are under scrutiny for sex trafficking by force, fraud and coercion, and the treatment of migrant labour subjected to "involuntary servitude, peonage, debt bondage, or slavery".

Malaysia's record had improved as in the 2007 report it was in Tier 3.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

45 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 14, 2008 SaturdayTO STEM HUMAN TRAFFICKING, GOVT BANS FOREIGNERS WORKING AS CLUB HOSTESSES, MASSEURS*LENGTH: 297 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 14

In its battle against human trafficking in the country, the government will disallow applications to employ foreigners as club hostesses and masseurs.

Home Minister Datuk Seri Syed Hamid Albar said the move was to make Malaysia free of human trafficking which inadvertently, led to women working as prostitutes and guest relations officers.

He said the government's surveillance and action in that matter was very effective, with the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007.

"Malaysia is now second among 40 countries listed in the Special Watch List of the United States Department of State, which have succeeded in reducing human trafficking activities," Syed Hamid told reporters after officiating the Royal Malaysian Police Family Day at Taman Tasik Titiwangsa here today.

On the influx of Africans who make the country a transit point for drug distribution and 'black money' activities, he said those found involved in crime were imprisoned while those without travel documents were deported.

He said that while some entered the country as students, others married locals with a view to using them as couriers to smuggle drugs overseas.

"We have made some arrests. Some (Africans) were imprisoned and others sent to their country of origin. We have also rescued some women," said Syed Hamid, adding that his ministry had asked other countries to station Malaysian narcotics officers at specific places for surveillance and inspection.

"Yesterday, I announced the possibility of our cooperation with other countries to station our narcotics offices in their countries," he said. Syed Hamid said there were foreign missions here, which had special officers for narcotics.

"We want to ensure that our country is safe from drug smuggling and that foreigners coming here feel safe," he stressed.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

46 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Jordan Times (Amman)

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Business News

June 12, 2008 Thursday

Government to respond to report on trafficking in persons

BYLINE: Hani Hazaimeh, Jordan Times, AmmanSECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 676 words

Jun. 12--AMMAN -- The government is preparing an official response to a US State Department report on trafficking, which placed Jordan on the Tier 2 Watch List, a Labour Ministry official told The Jordan Times on Sunday.

The eighth annual "Trafficking in Persons Report 2008", issued last week, said the Kingdom was put on the watch list for its "failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons over the previous year, particularly in the area of law enforcement against trafficking for forced labour".

"National labour laws do not apply to domestic or agriculture workers, including allegations of physical and sexual abuse," the report indicated.

But a union official said the government has made substantial amendments to the Labour Law, which is currently being examined by Parliament.

Although the proposed draft does not fully meet the union's ambition, President of the General Trade Union of Workers in Textile, Garment and Clothing Fathallah Emrani said it addresses several loopholes in the previous version.

"The draft entitles expatriate workers to subscribe to local unions as well as allow QIZ employers to establish their own syndicates," Emrani told The Jordan Times.

Criticising the mechanism of collecting information on which the report was based, Emrani said they were not contacted by anyone while the report was being compiled.

The union is closest to the workers and keeps close supervision on their conditions, taking action whenever the rights of expatriate labourers are violated, he noted.

The report said there were continuing reports of abusive conditions in some QIZ factories, "but the number decreased from the preceding year".

Emrani noted that the union managed to solve 2,994 disputes between QIZ workers and their employers in 2007, adding that they had signed 14 agreements with QIZ employers to enhance transportation, medical coverage and food for their employees.

The report noted that although the government "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking... it is making significant efforts to do so".

It noted that authorities resolved 77 per cent of the 2,479 complaints lodged through the National Human Rights Centre hotline, including some for conditions of forced labour, but pointed out that "the government did not provide evidence of any prosecution, conviction or jail sentences for forced labour of domestic workers".

The report also indicated that "through training of labour inspectors, almost all QIZ workers are reportedly in possession of their passports, and the number and severity of violations of workers' rights decreased substantially".

Referring to the case of 176 Vietnamese workers who complained that their employer forced them to work 14-18 hours per day, withheld their passports, and did not give them their promised wages, the report said the government returned their passports and assisted workers who wished to be repatriated to return home.

The report also criticised other countries like China, Russia, India and Egypt for failing to take adequate steps to address trafficking.

Four Arab countries were listed on Tier 3 for failing to take adequate steps to end the transportation of mainly women and children for forced labour, indentured servitude and sex.

"The 170-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, a modern-day form of slavery. Its findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons," according to the US State Department website.

To see more of the Jordan Times or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to <http://www.jordantimes.com/>. Copyright (c) 2008, Jordan Times, Amman Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

ACC-NO: 20080612-JT-TRAFFICKING-HUMAN-20080612

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: JT

Copyright 2008 Jordan Times (Amman)

47 of 445 DOCUMENTS

ARMINFO News Agency

June 10, 2008 Tuesday

US Department of State: The Government of Armenia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking

LENGTH: 169 wordsDATELINE: Yerevanm June 10. ArmInfo.

"The Government of Armenia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking ", says the Annual Report by the US Department of State "2008 Trafficking in Persons Armenia" (TIER 2 Watch List). "The Government of Armenia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Armenia is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for a fourth consecutive year because its efforts to increase compliance with the minimum standards were assessed based on its commitments to undertake future actions over the coming year, particularly in the areas of improving victim protection and assistance. While the government elevated anti-trafficking responsibilities to the Ministerial level, adopted a new National Action Plan, and drafted a National Referral Mechanism, it has yet to show tangible progress in identifying and protecting victims or in tackling trafficking complicity of government officials," the Report says.

LOAD-DATE: June 10, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

Copyright 2008 ARMINFO News Agency
All Rights Reserved

48 of 445 DOCUMENTS

June 9, 2008 Monday

Girl, 12, in care after trafficking investigation

SECTION: IRELAND

LENGTH: 395 words

The Nigerian girl was discovered by gardaí when they carried out a search at a house in west Dublin last Thursday.

It is understood the girl does not have parents in Ireland and was taken into custody under the Immigration Act. The minor has been handed over to the HSE, which has placed the girl into care.

A Garda source said the circumstances of how she arrived in the country would be investigated.

The search was one of a number of raids carried out by the gardaí as part of an operation led by the Police Service of Northern Ireland (PSNI).

Two men were arrested in Co Antrim on Thursday, one of whom was charged on Friday with facilitating unlawful immigration.

A spokesman for the PSNI said: "The charges relate to a proactive operation by the Police Service of Northern Ireland organised crime department, assisted by An Garda Síochána National Immigration Bureau, against organised immigration crime."

He said: "The 51-year-old man and a man aged in his late 30s were arrested by police during the search of two houses in the Lisburn area on Thursday morning. The latter has been released pending a report to the PPS (Public Prosecution Service).

He said that a number of searches were carried out by gardaí in counties Louth, Dublin, Meath and Kildare. The PSNI spokesman said that a 12-year-old Nigerian girl was discovered in Castleknock.

"It should be noted that the charges do not relate to this specific discovery, although the searches were carried out as part of the Police Service of Northern Ireland investigation."

Speaking yesterday, a Garda spokesman confirmed a 12-year-old Nigerian was found in the search: "She was discovered in a house in Castleknock and is now in the care of the HSE."

He said she was taken into care as a result of the operation into human trafficking, but was not saying she had been trafficked into the country.

The man charged in Northern Ireland is due to appear in court again tomorrow.

The operation comes as a US government report, published last week, named, for the first time, Ireland as a destination country for victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced labour.

The US State Department's Trafficking in Persons annual report, placed the republic in the second of three "tiers", suggesting the Government was not complying with minimum standards for the elimination of the crime, but was making efforts to do so.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Thomas Crosbie Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

49 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 8, 2008 Sunday

Kenya; Human Trade Record Better - Report

BYLINE: The Nation

LENGTH: 406 words

The US state department has removed Kenya from its "watch list", saying that the country last year made progress in fighting widespread human trafficking for purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour.

The US state department says in a new report that Kenya's improved performance has resulted in its grade being raised one notch in the department's annual global survey of trafficking in humans.

In 2007, Kenya was placed on a US "watch list" of countries in which the most severe forms of trafficking are said to be rampant or significantly increasing.

"The government of Kenya does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," the 2008 survey says.

"However, it is making significant efforts to do so. Kenya's anti-trafficking efforts improved markedly over the reporting period, particularly through greater investigations of suspected trafficking cases."

Public officials

But corruption among law enforcement agencies and other public officials continues to hinder efforts to bring traffickers to justice, the report says. "Some anti-trafficking activists made credible claims that, in certain areas, police officers were complicit in trafficking activities," it adds.

Kenya continues to be a "source, transit and destination" country for trafficked men, women and children, the state department points out. It says Kenyan children are trafficked within the country as forced labourers and for "commercial sexual exploitation, including involvement in the coastal sex tourism industry."

The report describes child sex tourism at the coast as "rampant," with up to 15,000 girls involved.

Children from Uganda, Somalia and other African countries are also being brought against their will to Mombasa, Nairobi, Kisumu and Nakuru, the report adds.

"Most trafficked girls are coerced into working as barmaids, where they are vulnerable to sexual exploitation, or are forced directly into prostitution," according to the state department. Kenyan women and girls are, meanwhile, trafficked to the Middle East, other African countries, Europe and North America for "enslavement in massage parlours and brothels" and for other forms of exploitation, the report says.

It cites the case of "Lucy," a Kenyan woman who met a German tourist in his late 1960s at a beach resort. Through "presents and pampering," he convinced her to visit him in Germany where he took away her passport and forced her into prostitution.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2008 AllAfrica, Inc.

50 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

June 8, 2008 Sunday 5:51 AM EST

HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: Report from the Assam Tribune brought to you by HT Syndication.

LENGTH: 395 words

DATELINE: Guwahati

Guwahati, June 8 -- The United State's action in placing India along with China on its watch list for not doing enough in combating human trafficking, once again brings to the fore this deep rooted problem. Though human trafficking is a global phenomenon, it is very acute in India. Along with a host of factors; the economic growth too is accentuating the problem of human trafficking.

It is quite disconcerting that the report released by the US State Department on Wednesday revealed that the Indian authorities are not fully complying with the minimum standards for elimination of human trafficking. The report also pointed out that bonded labour is rampant in India, with clothing and brick making being two major booming industries in which forced labour, debt bondage and hazard condition are common. Commercial sexual exploitation, and forced labour are the main driving force behind human trafficking. The US report also slammed the weak implementation of policies and corrupt officials for failure to effectively confront the scourge. Along with several parts of the country, the North -eastern region has the dubious distinction of being an area where human trafficking is rampant. Taking advantage of poverty, illiteracy and unemployment, well organized groups are luring away women and minors outside the region. Most of such victims of human trafficking are sold off in the red light areas of Mumbai, Delhi and Siliguri. Human trafficking in the North East has reached an alarming proportion. Nothing worthwhile is being done to prevent it. At times the authorities do swing into action. However, only the agents are arrested while the kingpins remain elusive. To check this menace the authorities along with voluntary organizations should identify the vulnerable areas. Awareness camps should be conducted to ensure that the agents of human traffickers cannot dupe the gullible people. The authorities should also initiate action to end complicity of law enforcing officials in trafficking. Strong deterrent action must be taken against those engaged in this heinous criminal activity. Rehabilitation schemes should be formulated to put life back in track for the rescued victims of human trafficking. The society must come forward and assist the authorities in tackling this menace.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from the Assam Tribune.

-684369

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

51 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Sunday Times (Australia)

June 8, 2008 Sunday
1 EditionA-G toughens on human trade*SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 2LENGTH: 277 words

INTERIM Attorney-General Aiyaz Sayed-Khaiyum says human trafficking is an issue that needs to be dealt with following the US State Department annual trafficking persons report that listed Fiji among the tier-three nations.

According to the report, the political and economic crisis following the 2006 coup and inadequate funding provided to police and the Immigration Department paved an intolerable state of trafficking in the country.

The report also cited that the Government was not doing enough under the law to prosecute and convict offenders.

Mr Sayed-Khaiyum said human trafficking was a matter that should have been addressed sometime ago.

"Fundamentally, we can address the issue of human trafficking by way of appropriate legislation in place and also by way of having proper policing mechanism in place.

"This obviously requires resources and there are a number of matters that need to be addressed in as far as priority is concerned by the Government and this is one of them and we will get to it.

"In as far as countries that are concerned about human trafficking and have the resource to assist, we welcome their assistance.

"Shunning us because simply it wasn't done in the past is not a positive way to deal with the situation. Take for example, we are now signatories to the UN Convention Against Corruption, we are getting assistance and it is on its way and we appreciate the assistance of the agencies or those that have agreed to help."

Similarly, in human trafficking, Mr Sayed-Khaiyum said if there are countries willing to help Fiji with resources, the Government welcomed them.

He said human trafficking was an area of concern to the Government.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: TRN

52 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Sunday Times (Australia)

June 8, 2008 Sunday
1 EditionA-G toughens on human trade*SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 2LENGTH: 277 words

INTERIM Attorney-General Aiyaz Sayed-Khaiyum says human trafficking is an issue that needs to be dealt with following the US State Department annual trafficking persons report that listed Fiji among the tier-three nations.

According to the report, the political and economic crisis following the 2006 coup and inadequate funding provided to police and the Immigration Department paved an intolerable state of trafficking in the country.

The report also cited that the Government was not doing enough under the law to prosecute and convict offenders.

Mr Sayed-Khaiyum said human trafficking was a matter that should have been addressed sometime ago.

"Fundamentally, we can address the issue of human trafficking by way of appropriate legislation in place and also by way of having proper policing mechanism in place.

"This obviously requires resources and there are a number of matters that need to be addressed in as far as priority is concerned by the Government and this is one of them and we will get to it.

"In as far as countries that are concerned about human trafficking and have the resource to assist, we welcome their assistance.

"Shunning us because simply it wasn't done in the past is not a positive way to deal with the situation. Take for example, we are now signatories to the UN Convention Against Corruption, we are getting assistance and it is on its way and we appreciate the assistance of the agencies or those that have agreed to help."

Similarly, in human trafficking, Mr Sayed-Khaiyum said if there are countries willing to help Fiji with resources, the Government welcomed them.

He said human trafficking was an area of concern to the Government.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: TRN

53 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Sunday Times (Australia)

June 8, 2008 Sunday
1 EditionA-G toughens on human trade*SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 2LENGTH: 277 words

INTERIM Attorney-General Aiyaz Sayed-Khaiyum says human trafficking is an issue that needs to be dealt with following the US State Department annual trafficking persons report that listed Fiji among the tier-three nations.

According to the report, the political and economic crisis following the 2006 coup and inadequate funding provided to police and the Immigration Department paved an intolerable state of trafficking in the country.

The report also cited that the Government was not doing enough under the law to prosecute and convict offenders.

Mr Sayed-Khaiyum said human trafficking was a matter that should have been addressed sometime ago.

"Fundamentally, we can address the issue of human trafficking by way of appropriate legislation in place and also by way of having proper policing mechanism in place.

"This obviously requires resources and there are a number of matters that need to be addressed in as far as priority is concerned by the Government and this is one of them and we will get to it.

"In as far as countries that are concerned about human trafficking and have the resource to assist, we welcome their assistance.

"Shunning us because simply it wasn't done in the past is not a positive way to deal with the situation. Take for example, we are now signatories to the UN Convention Against Corruption, we are getting assistance and it is on its way and we appreciate the assistance of the agencies or those that have agreed to help."

Similarly, in human trafficking, Mr Sayed-Khaiyum said if there are countries willing to help Fiji with resources, the Government welcomed them.

He said human trafficking was an area of concern to the Government.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: TRN

54 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 7, 2008 Saturday

Guyanese minister denies number of people trafficked "significant"

LENGTH: 725 words

Text of report by Guyana Chronicle website on 6 June

[Report: "Manickchand: Guyana shouldn't be on US trafficking-in-persons radar"]

Guyana should not be on the US State Department's radar when it comes to trafficking in persons (TIP) as there are no "significant" numbers of persons being trafficked in this country, according to Minister of Human Services & Social Security, Priya Manickchand.

Stabroek News contacted the minister for her initial reaction to the recent US report on TIP which has for the second consecutive year placed Guyana on their Tier 2 Watch List.

In a brief comment the minister said that Guyana should not even be in that tier and while the report says that official reports of human trafficking may be limited, it said "most trafficking appears to take place in remote mining camps in the country's interior."

However, Minister Manickchand said that while Guyana may be facing other problems, such as it pertains to labour, the country does not have any TIP problems that warrants being focused on by the US report.

The report knocked Guyana for its limited progress in law enforcement efforts against traffickers over the last year. It was pointed out that while the government prohibits all forms of trafficking through its comprehensive Combating of Trafficking in Persons Act, which became law in 2005, it is yet to "produce an anti-trafficking conviction under this 2005 law." The report stated that in June 2007, the government initiated six trafficking investigations, which is level with the number of investigations reported for 2006.

"There were no government efforts to investigate or address labour trafficking crimes, despite NGO reports of exploitation and abuse in the nation's mining and timber camps." And it said the prosecution of most trafficking cases is done by untrained police officers and the cases are routinely adjourned or dismissed.

Stabroek News attempted to get a comment from Minister of Home Affairs Clement Rohee about these concerns but when a call was placed to his office his secretary stated that while he was in office he was unavailable. This reporter was asked to leave a name and a detailed message along with a telephone number and a promise was made to get the message to the minister and have him return the call. A call was not returned.

Meanwhile the report recommended that the country increase efforts to investigate, prosecute, convict, and sentence trafficking offenders. Also the government should confront trafficking complicity by public officials; utilize proactive police strategies such as brothel raids to rescue victims from trafficking situations; provide greater victim assistance; and expand anti-trafficking training for police and magistrates.

According to the report Guyana is a "source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour." It said that Amerindian girls are trafficked to brothels near the mining camps and to coastal areas for sexual exploitation and domestic servitude. "Young Amerindian men are exploited under forced labour conditions in mining and logging camps. Some women and girls trafficked into brothels in the interior are from northern Brazil.

Reporting from other nations suggest that Guyanese women and girls are trafficked for sexual exploitation to neighbouring countries such as Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago, Brazil, Suriname, Venezuela, and that Guyanese men and boys are subject to labour exploitation in construction and agriculture in these same countries," the report said.

Further, the report said that the government has sustained a modest level of victim assistance during the reporting period.

"The government operates no shelters for trafficking victims, but it included limited funding for anti-trafficking NGOs in its 2008 budget," the report said.

The country was commended for its sensitisation programme on the issue. And government's increased prevention efforts during the reporting period was mentioned as according to the report senior government officials "publicly condemned human trafficking, and the government conducted a widespread educational and awareness-raising campaign, which reached more than 50 communities and 5,000 citizens across the country."

Source: Guyana Chronicle website, Georgetown, in English 6 Jun 08

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

55 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Irish Times

June 7, 2008 Saturday

US trafficking report critical of State efforts

BYLINE: RUADHÍN Mac CORMAIC, Migration Correspondent

SECTION: IRELAND; Other Stories; Pg. 5

LENGTH: 445 words

A US STATE Department report into human trafficking has for the first time named Ireland as a destination country for victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced labour.

The latest annual Trafficking in Persons report, which is regarded as the most comprehensive global compendium of trafficking trends, places the Republic in the second of three "tiers", indicating that the Government is not complying with minimum standards for the elimination of the crime but is making significant effort to do so.

While previous editions referred to trafficking to Ireland only as a "potential problem", the 2008 report states: "Ireland is a destination country for women, men and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour."

The report coincides with the coming into force today of the Criminal Law (Human Trafficking) Act 2008. This makes the trafficking of adults and children for labour or sexual exploitation illegal under Irish law for the first time and criminalises the use of services of victims of trafficking.

Due to the clandestine nature of the trade and the absence until now of a specific offence, it has not been possible to estimate the numbers of people trafficked into Ireland. Ruhama, a group that works with prostituted women, has reported significant numbers of cases in the past seven years.

The report notes that while Irish officials have shown "considerable political will" in the drafting of new anti-trafficking legislation, "key deficiencies in the areas of prosecution, protection and prevention remain".

The report recommends formal policies and procedures to ensure victims are given protection and assistance and a visible "demand-reduction" campaign in Ireland.

The Government has sought to address victim protection since the report was researched, with provisions in the Immigration, Residence and Protection Bill, making its way through the Oireachtas. However, support groups insist those provisions must go further.

While welcoming the new trafficking law, Gerardine Rowley of Ruhama said: "The Government has not yet dealt adequately with victim protection and assistance."

Colm O'Gorman, executive director of Amnesty International Irish Section, said the level of protection proposed remained "weak and conditional". While the 45-day recovery and reflection period to victims was welcome, he questioned the Bill's stipulation that any extension is dependent on co-operation with the Garda.

The Department of Justice said the report was out of date and its reservations had been overtaken by events, but its reference to Ireland's significant efforts to combat trafficking was appreciated.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 The Irish Times
All Rights Reserved

June 7, 2008 Saturday

Ireland a target for human traffickers

SECTION: IRELAND

LENGTH: 261 words

As the Government's anti-trafficking legislation comes into effect today, the US Government's global assessment of the problem shows Ireland's efforts are no longer considered sufficient.

In 2006, the US State Department's trafficking in persons (TIP) report named Ireland in the first tier of countries for its efforts in fighting the illegal transportation of vulnerable people.

However, in its 2008 report, Ireland falls into the second tier.

The TIP report claimed women from Eastern Europe, Nigeria and other parts of Africa, South America and Asia have been trafficked into Ireland for forced prostitution. People have also been trafficked for forced labour.

The US State Department says Ireland does not fully comply with the minimum standards for eliminating trafficking.

It says Ireland's prosecution efforts were hampered by a lack of comprehensive legislation during the rating period and claims that was why there were no prosecutions for the offence in 2007.

The Criminal Law (Human Trafficking) Act 2008, which comes into force today, creates separate offences including, trafficking in children for the purpose of their labour or sexual exploitation or the removal of their organs and trafficking in adults for their sexual or labour exploitation or the removal of their organs.

Ruhama, which works with women in prostitution, welcomed the portrayal of Ireland's efforts in combating human trafficking in the TIP Report as well as the US Government's call for Ireland to fully comply with minimum standards by enacting comprehensive anti trafficking legislation.

LOAD-DATE: June 7, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

57 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 6, 2008 Friday

Taiwan vows to step up anti-human trafficking efforts

LENGTH: 246 words

Text of report in English by Taiwanese Central News Agency website

[By Sofia Wu]

Taipei, June 5 (CNA) - The National Immigration Agency (NIA) will cooperate with other government institutions and non-government organizations (NGOs) to upgrade the efficacy of its anti-human trafficking efforts, an official said Thursday.

The NIA official made the remarks after the US Department of State released an annual report on trafficking in persons a day earlier, in which Taiwan was placed for the second consecutive year on a list of "Tier 2" countries for human trafficking, noting that Taiwan authorities do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

Pointing out that prevention of human trafficking involves many complex operations, the official said cross-department coordination as well as assistance from NGOs and other private associations are necessary to effectively combat trafficking in humans.

To upgrade operational efficiency, the official said, the immigration law has been updated to include a special chapter on prevention of human trafficking and protection of those who have fallen victim to such criminal actions.

Starting this year, the official said the Executive Yuan will launch a three-year project aimed at building shelters for victims of human trafficking deals and commissioning NGOs to help those victims.

Source: Central News Agency website, Taipei, in English 1603 gmt 5 Jun 08

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

58 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 6, 2008 Friday 11:53 PM TST

CLA to set up 24-hour hot line for disgruntled migrant workersBYLINE: Sofia WuLENGTH: 254 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, June 6

The Council of Labor Affairs (CLA) will set up a round-the-clock hot line next year to offer counseling for disgruntled migrant workers around the country, a CLA official said Friday.

Chen Yi-min, director of the CLA's Vocational Training Bureau, revealed the plan after the U.S. Department of State released an annual report on human trafficking, titled "The Trafficking in Persons Report 2008" Wednesday, which, for the second consecutive year, kept Taiwan on the "Tier 2" list of countries that it deems should do more to prevent human trafficking for forced labor and sexual exploitation.

According to Chen, all of the country's 25 city and county governments have offered free hot line services for foreign laborers. But all of those phone services operate only during office hours.

"We are planning to set up a round-the-clock hot line patterned after the one for domestic violence victims that has only three numbers and is easy to remember," Chen said, adding that the new service is expected to be in place early next year and will provide better protection for migrant workers.

Chen said that although the U.S. report identifies several flaws in Taiwan's prevention of human trafficking and protection of foreign laborers, it also recognizes Taiwan's continued efforts to improve services for them.

Among the services lauded in the report were free telephone services at Taoyuan and Kaohsiung international airports, Taiwan's two main gateways, as well as coordinating with 11 NGOs to shelter human trafficking victims.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

59 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 6, 2008 Friday 9:40 PM TST

Group warns of increase in teenage males in sex trade

BYLINE: Flor WangLENGTH: 251 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, June 6

The number of teenage boys in Taiwan engaged in the sex trade has increased at an alarming rate, the Garden of Hope Foundation warned Friday.

Citing police statistics, Cheng Min-ching, a senior researcher at the foundation, reported that teenage males were involved in some 30 percent of the total sex trade cases in Taiwan uncovered by law enforcement officers last year, up from one percent in 1999.

Cheng attributed the rise in male teenagers selling sex to the widespread use of the Internet.

Most of the policemen were able to detain teenage male prostitutes by disguising themselves as clients and "fishing" for them on the Internet, Cheng said.

The researcher believed, however, that the teenage male and female prostitutes are actually the victims and should be protected, and argued that law enforcement authorities, rather than going after the patrons who are the real offenders, were arresting the victims.

The way Taiwan's laws deal with prostitutes and their patrons has for the first time sparked attention in the United States, she said, which observed that many women from Southeast Asian countries are sold to Taiwan and forced into prostitution here.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2008 (TIP 2008) , released Wednesday by the U.S. Department of State, kept Taiwan on the same "Tier 2" list of countries for human trafficking that it was on last year.

The report describes Taiwan as a destination for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

60 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 6, 2008 Friday 4:45 PM TST

NGO urges government to step up anti-human trafficking efforts

BYLINE: Rachel ChanLENGTH: 584 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, June 6

In response to a human trafficking report released by the United States, a Taipei-based non-government organization urged the government Friday to upgrade the efficacy of its anti-human trafficking efforts.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2008 (TIP 2008) released Wednesday by the U.S. Department of State places Taiwan on a list of "Tier 2" countries for human trafficking, the same level it held last year.

It describes Taiwan as a destination for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Taiwan is also a source of women trafficked to Japan, Australia, the United Kingdom and the U.S., according to the report.

The Anti-Human Trafficking Association, founded in 2007 by 11 NGOs, said in a news conference Friday that the report indicates that there is still a lot to be done by the Taiwanese government to prevent human trafficking and to protect the rights of the victims.

It made four recommendations: to pass and implement a comprehensive anti-trafficking law as soon as possible; to apply the Labor Standards Law to foreign workers employed as private nursing caregivers or domestic helpers, who are especially vulnerable to labor exploitation; to strengthen communication among government agencies and enhance international cooperation; and to collaborate with local NGOs.

"To combat sex and labor exploitation, we strongly urge the government to prioritize the passage of the anti-human trafficking law," said Sandy Yeh, president of the Taipei Women's Rescue Foundation -- one of the organizers of the Anti-Human Trafficking Association.

She noted that although Taiwan has formal victim identification procedures and provides training in these procedures, immigration officers, police, prosecutors and other law enforcement authorities still often classify victims of human trafficking as illegal immigrants or runaway foreign workers with illegal laborer status, and consequently many trafficking victims are detained, prosecuted, fined or jailed, and ultimately deported.

"In order to help the trafficking victims and bring the human traffickers to justice, we have to identify victims using a broad definition and increase penalties for human trafficking significantly," Yeh said.

The TIP 2008 report says that the majority of victims are treated simply as illegal immigrants or illegal laborers and housed in formal, long-term detention facilities that are sometimes plagued by overcrowding and poor sanitation.

Regina Fuchs, a German sociologist working in Taiwan, said it is precisely the exploitation, the failure to enforce laws protecting the rights of workers and the restricted mobility of legal laborers that has caused the notorious increase in the number of runaways and illegal workers in recent years.

"Justice delayed is justice denied," she said. "The government must take immediate steps to confront and resolve these issues."

Lee Li-feng, secretary-general of the End Child Prostitution, Child Pornography and Trafficking of Children for Sexual Purposes Taiwan (ECPAT Taiwan), said the TIP 2008 report points out for the first time the problem that even though

Taiwan has an extraterritorial law criminalizing the sexual exploitation of children by Taiwanese traveling abroad, it did not take other steps during the reporting year to reduce demand for child sex tourism.

"The government, especially the Tourism Bureau, should step up its campaign of public service announcements to combat child sex trafficking and tourism," she said.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

61 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 6, 2008 Friday 11:03 AM TST

Immigration agency vows to step up anti-human trafficking efforts

BYLINE: Sofia WuLENGTH: 222 words

(repeat)

Taipei, June 5 (CNA) The National Immigration Agency (NIA) will cooperate with other government institutions and non-government organizations (NGOs) to upgrade the efficacy of its anti-human trafficking efforts, an official said Thursday.

The NIA official made the remarks after the U.S. Department of State released an annual report on trafficking in persons a day earlier, in which Taiwan was placed for the second consecutive year on a list of "Tier 2" countries for human trafficking, noting that Taiwan authorities do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

Pointing out that prevention of human trafficking involves many complex operations, the official said cross-department coordination as well as assistance from NGOs and other private associations are necessary to effectively combat trafficking in humans.

To upgrade operational efficiency, the official said, the immigration law has been updated to include a special chapter on prevention of human trafficking and protection of those who have fallen victim to such criminal actions.

Starting this year, the official said the Executive Yuan will launch a three-year project aimed at building shelters for victims of human trafficking deals and commissioning NGOs to help those victims.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

62 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Daily Mirror (Sri Lanka)

June 6, 2008 Friday 4:22 PM EST

Lanka trying to eliminate trafficking: US report

BYLINE: Report from Daily Mirror brought to you by HT Syndication.

LENGTH: 487 words

DATELINE: Colombo

Colombo, June 6 -- Sri Lanka has been placed on the Tier 2 Watch List of a US report for failing to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons over the previous year, particularly in the area of law enforcement.

The US Trafficking in Persons Report released by the State department on Wednesday said that the government had failed to arrest, prosecute, or convict any person for trafficking offences and continued to punish some victims of trafficking for crimes committed as a result of being trafficked.

At the same time, Sri Lanka protected some victims of trafficking, including Sri Lankan nationals trafficked abroad and it also appointed a focal point on trafficking in persons in July, who convenes a monthly anti-trafficking working group to develop and coordinate anti-trafficking policy, the report said.

The 2008 report, released by US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, covers more countries than ever -- 170 total. It is the most comprehensive global compendium of human trafficking trends and efforts by foreign governments to eliminate this crime. And as required by Congress, the Trafficking in Persons Report examines both labour slavery and sex trafficking.

"The Government of Sri Lanka does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report noted.

The US report urges Sri Lanka to significantly improve record of prosecutions, convictions, and sentences; institute a formal procedure to identify victims of trafficking among vulnerable groups, such as women arrested for prostitution; ensure that victims of trafficking are not arrested, punished or automatically deported for acts committed as a result of being trafficked; and further train law enforcement officers on victim identification and protection.

The report says Sri Lanka is a source and destination country for men and women trafficked for the purposes of involuntary servitude and commercial sexual exploitation. Sri Lankan men and women migrate willingly to Kuwait, Jordan, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Lebanon, the United Arab Emirates, Singapore, Hong Kong, Malaysia, and South Korea to work as construction workers, domestic servants, or garment factory workers.

It also says that the LTTE continued to recruit, sometimes forcibly, children for use as soldiers in areas outside of the Sri Lankan government's control adding that even government security forces may also be complicit in letting a pro-government paramilitary organisation recruit, sometimes forcibly, child soldiers. The report says of particular concern are ongoing reports that women arrested on suspicion of being trafficked into Sri Lanka for the purpose of sexual exploitation were asked to pay fines in exchange for release from prison and were usually deported thereafter.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Daily Mirror.

-683398

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Wijeya Newspaper Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

63 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Fiji Times (Australia)

June 6, 2008 Friday
1 EditionFiji on human trafficking watch list*SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 3LENGTH: 213 words

FIJI has failed to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking, according to the US State Department Eighth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report released yesterday.

The report cited the political and economic crisis that followed the 2006 coup coupled by the inadequate funding given to the Fiji Police Force and the Immigration Department paved an intolerable state of trafficking in the country.

This situation was aggravated by the laxity of authorities to arrest, prosecute and convict trafficking offenders.

The report also noted that there was no proactive system adopted by police and law enforcement agencies to identify victims of human trafficking.

The report recommended that the Fiji Government work with international organisations and civil society to fight to commercial exploitation of children and also train law enforcers to identify and protect victims.

Fiji, which was on the Tier Two watch list last year was relegated to Tier 3 in the latest survey.

Immigration director Viliame Naupoto said he would need time to read the report. He is attending a workshop on People Smuggling and Human Trafficking in Malaysia.

Defence, National Security and Immigration Minister Ratu Epeli Ganilau preferred to comment after reading the report.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: FIJ

64 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Fiji Times (Australia)

June 6, 2008 Friday
1 EditionFiji on human trafficking watch list*SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 3LENGTH: 213 words

FIJI has failed to comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking, according to the US State Department Eighth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report released yesterday.

The report cited the political and economic crisis that followed the 2006 coup coupled by the inadequate funding given to the Fiji Police Force and the Immigration Department paved an intolerable state of trafficking in the country.

This situation was aggravated by the laxity of authorities to arrest, prosecute and convict trafficking offenders.

The report also noted that there was no proactive system adopted by police and law enforcement agencies to identify victims of human trafficking.

The report recommended that the Fiji Government work with international organisations and civil society to fight to commercial exploitation of children and also train law enforcers to identify and protect victims.

Fiji, which was on the Tier Two watch list last year was relegated to Tier 3 in the latest survey.

Immigration director Viliame Naupoto said he would need time to read the report. He is attending a workshop on People Smuggling and Human Trafficking in Malaysia.

Defence, National Security and Immigration Minister Ratu Epeli Ganilau preferred to comment after reading the report.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewspaperJOURNAL-CODE: FIJ

65 of 445 DOCUMENTS

ABC Premium News (Australia)

June 5, 2008 Thursday 3:20 PM AEST

Fiji, PNG on child trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: Radio Australia's Campbell Cooney

LENGTH: 201 words

Fiji and Papua New Guinea have been added to a United States blacklist of countries trafficking in people.

The 'Tier 3' blacklist is contained in the US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report.

The report analyses efforts in 170 countries to combat trafficking for forced labour, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The report claims Fiji is a source country for children trafficked for sexual exploitation and a destination for women from China and India for forced labour and exploitation.

It also claims Papua New Guinea is the destination for women and children from Malaysia, the Philippines, Thailand and China for sexual exploitation in cities, towns and isolated logging and mining camps.

Remaining on the 'Tier 3' list are Sudan, Syria, Algeria, Iran, Burma and Cuba, while Malaysia and Bahrain have been removed.

In introducing the report, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said human trafficking deprived people of their human rights and dignity and "bankrolls the growth of organised crime".

"The petty tyrants who exploit their labourers rarely receive serious punishment," she said.

"We and our allies must remember that a robust law enforcement response is essential."

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

66 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 5, 2008 Thursday 2:30 PM GMT

US says Cambodia needs to more to fight trafficking

LENGTH: 282 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH, June 5 2008

The United States said Thursday that Cambodia still needs to do more to fight human trafficking, even though an annual State Department report said the nation had made progress.

The United States this year upgraded Cambodia to Tier 2 on its yearly human trafficking report, after the country increased law enforcement and passed new legislation to crack down on the crime.

Cambodia, which has a reputation as a haven for sex offenders, had ranked below the second tier since 2004 -- raising the risk that Washington could impose sanctions or other punitive measures.

US embassy charge d'affaires Piper Campbell told a press conference that trafficking remains a problem here.

"Trafficking in Cambodia is indeed still prevalent. It's obvious in combating human trafficking that you have to take a multi-dimensional approach that involves education, legislation, law enforcement and also support for victims," he said.

However, some victims claim that they have suffered abuse under the new anti-trafficking legislation.

Chan Dina, head of the Cambodian Prostitute's Union (CPU) which represents about 300 sex workers, said prostitutes have been robbed, beaten and raped by police since a crackdown on brothels began in March.

"The closures abuse the rights of sex workers. They do not want to work the sex industry, but they are destitute, that is why they have decided to do so," Chan Dina told AFP Thursday.

Deputy Prime Minister Sar Kheng told reporters at the press conference that prostitutes abused by police should come forward.

"We ask that they provide evidence to us," Sar Kheng said.

Some 300 prostitutes rallied Wednesday to protest the police abuse amid Cambodia's human trafficking campaign.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

67 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 5, 2008 Thursday 11:53 PM TST

Immigration agency vows to step up anti-human trafficking efforts

BYLINE: Sofia WuLENGTH: 217 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, June 5

The National Immigration Agency (NIA) will cooperate with other government institutions and non-government organizations (NGOs) to upgrade the efficacy of its anti-human trafficking efforts, an official said Thursday.

The NIA official made the remarks after the U.S. Department of State released an annual report on trafficking in persons a day earlier, in which Taiwan was placed for the second consecutive year on a list of "Tier 2" countries for human trafficking, noting that Taiwan authorities do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

Pointing out that prevention of human trafficking involves many complex operations, the official said cross-department coordination as well as assistance from NGOs and other private associations are necessary to effectively combat trafficking in humans.

To upgrade operational efficiency, the official said, the immigration law has been updated to include a special chapter on prevention of human trafficking and protection of those who have fallen victim to such criminal actions.

Starting this year, the official said the Executive Yuan will launch a three-year project aimed at building shelters for victims of human trafficking deals and commissioning NGOs to help those victims.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

68 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 5, 2008 Thursday 11:53 PM TST

Immigration agency vows to step up anti-human trafficking efforts

BYLINE: Sofia WuLENGTH: 217 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, June 5

The National Immigration Agency (NIA) will cooperate with other government institutions and non-government organizations (NGOs) to upgrade the efficacy of its anti-human trafficking efforts, an official said Thursday.

The NIA official made the remarks after the U.S. Department of State released an annual report on trafficking in persons a day earlier, in which Taiwan was placed for the second consecutive year on a list of "Tier 2" countries for human trafficking, noting that Taiwan authorities do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

Pointing out that prevention of human trafficking involves many complex operations, the official said cross-department coordination as well as assistance from NGOs and other private associations are necessary to effectively combat trafficking in humans.

To upgrade operational efficiency, the official said, the immigration law has been updated to include a special chapter on prevention of human trafficking and protection of those who have fallen victim to such criminal actions.

Starting this year, the official said the Executive Yuan will launch a three-year project aimed at building shelters for victims of human trafficking deals and commissioning NGOs to help those victims.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

69 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 5, 2008 Thursday 1:02 PM TST

Taiwan remains on U.S. 'Tier 2' list for human trafficking

BYLINE: Chiehyu Lin and Y.F. Low

LENGTH: 472 words

DATELINE: Washington, June 4

For the second consecutive year, the United States has placed Taiwan on a list of "Tier 2" countries for human trafficking, noting that Taiwan authorities do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2008 released Wednesday by the U.S. Department of State describes Taiwan as a destination for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation.

Taiwan is also a source of women trafficked to Japan, Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States, the report says.

"Many foreign workers remain vulnerable to trafficking because legal protections, oversight by authorities and enforcement efforts are inadequate," it states.

The report recommends that Taiwan pass and implement a comprehensive anti-trafficking law prohibiting and punishing all severe forms of trafficking and extend full Labor Standard Law protections to all categories of foreign workers, including domestic helpers and caregivers.

The report also suggests that Taiwan fully implement a recent Immigration Law amendment to extend its protections to trafficking victims and ensure that law enforcement personnel, prosecutors and judges consistently follow formal trafficking victim identification procedures to prevent the prosecution of trafficking victims.

Taiwan should establish procedures for referring victims to shelters, improve incentives for victims to assist in the prosecution of traffickers, and increase police efforts to investigate trafficking crimes and to identify trafficking victims, the report says.

In addition, Taiwan should launch a campaign to discourage child sex tourism by people from Taiwan and improve cooperation with the governments of labor source countries, the report recommends.

The 2008 report rates 170 countries and regions and places them on three lists, based primarily on the extent of government action to combat trafficking.

Governments that fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking are placed on the "Tier 1" list, while those that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in "Tier 2."

Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed on the "Tier 3" list and may be subject to certain sanctions.

Taiwan was ranked among the "Tier 1" countries from 2001 to 2004, but was downgraded to "Tier 2" in 2005.

In 2006, Taiwan was placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking. The U.S. government removed Taiwan from the watch list and ranked it among "Tier 2" countries again in 2007 in view of the country's significant efforts to tackle the problem.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

70 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 5, 2008 Thursday 1:02 PM TST

Taiwan remains on U.S. 'Tier 2' list for human trafficking

BYLINE: Chiehyu Lin and Y.F. Low

LENGTH: 472 words

DATELINE: Washington, June 4

For the second consecutive year, the United States has placed Taiwan on a list of "Tier 2" countries for human trafficking, noting that Taiwan authorities do not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking but are making significant efforts to do so.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2008 released Wednesday by the U.S. Department of State describes Taiwan as a destination for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation.

Taiwan is also a source of women trafficked to Japan, Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States, the report says.

"Many foreign workers remain vulnerable to trafficking because legal protections, oversight by authorities and enforcement efforts are inadequate," it states.

The report recommends that Taiwan pass and implement a comprehensive anti-trafficking law prohibiting and punishing all severe forms of trafficking and extend full Labor Standard Law protections to all categories of foreign workers, including domestic helpers and caregivers.

The report also suggests that Taiwan fully implement a recent Immigration Law amendment to extend its protections to trafficking victims and ensure that law enforcement personnel, prosecutors and judges consistently follow formal trafficking victim identification procedures to prevent the prosecution of trafficking victims.

Taiwan should establish procedures for referring victims to shelters, improve incentives for victims to assist in the prosecution of traffickers, and increase police efforts to investigate trafficking crimes and to identify trafficking victims, the report says.

In addition, Taiwan should launch a campaign to discourage child sex tourism by people from Taiwan and improve cooperation with the governments of labor source countries, the report recommends.

The 2008 report rates 170 countries and regions and places them on three lists, based primarily on the extent of government action to combat trafficking.

Governments that fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking are placed on the "Tier 1" list, while those that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in "Tier 2."

Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed on the "Tier 3" list and may be subject to certain sanctions.

Taiwan was ranked among the "Tier 1" countries from 2001 to 2004, but was downgraded to "Tier 2" in 2005.

In 2006, Taiwan was placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking. The U.S. government removed Taiwan from the watch list and ranked it among "Tier 2" countries again in 2007 in view of the country's significant efforts to tackle the problem.

LOAD-DATE: June 8, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

71 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

June 5, 2008 Thursday 1:02 PM EST

India on US human trafficking watch list for fifth year

BYLINE: Report from Indo-Asian News Service brought to you by HT Syndication.

LENGTH: 812 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 5 -- The US has placed India on its second worst category of human trafficking watch list for the fifth year in a row for allegedly failing to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat the problem.

"India is a source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation," an annual US State Department report released Wednesday said, placing New Delhi on the Tier-2 Watch List.

"The government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. However, it is making significant efforts to do so," said the 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report released by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"Despite the reported extent of the trafficking crisis in India, government authorities made uneven efforts to prosecute traffickers and protect trafficking victims," it said, suggesting: "Internal forced labour may constitute India's largest trafficking problem."

Rice said the goal of the report covering 170 countries "is to shine a light on recent accomplishments and encourage governments in their resolve to confront those who prey on the weakest and most vulnerable members of society".

"Together, we are confident that this modern, growing abolitionist movement will continue to rescue, rehabilitate, and restore the lives of those from whom so much has been taken," she said.

Denying a reporter's suggestion that India and China had not been moved to the worst Tier 3 as the US was trying to forge economic ties with them, Mark Lagon, director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons said: "With respect to India and China, these are both very serious cases."

"We're quite blunt in the report. Frankly, we're quite blunt in our extensive diplomatic dialogue with these countries," he said noting: "There are some positive developments in each."

"India has made efforts on the child labour front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labour Minister Oscar Fernandes joined in a raid." Lagon said. "But India still doesn't recognise bonded labour as human trafficking. It has weak anti-corruption efforts and prosecutions are too few."

Asked if in view of this, he felt comfortable that both India and China are still on Tier-2 Watch List, he said: "Indeed, indeed."

The report said India is also a destination for women and girls from Nepal and Bangladesh trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation. Nepali children are also trafficked to India for forced labour in circus shows.

Indian women are trafficked to the Middle East for commercial sexual exploitation, the report said. There are also victims of labour trafficking among the thousands of Indians who migrate willingly every year to the Middle East, Europe, and the US for work as domestic servants and low-skilled labourers.

Men and women from Bangladesh and Nepal are trafficked through India for forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation in the Middle East. Indian nationals travel to Nepal and within the country for child sex tourism.

In India itself, men, women, and children are held in debt bondage and face forced labour working in brick kilns, rice mills, agriculture, and embroidery factories, the report said.

While no comprehensive study of forced and bonded labour has been completed, NGOs estimate this problem affects 20 to 65 million Indians, it said. Women and girls are trafficked within the country for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced marriage.

Children are subjected to forced labour as factory workers, domestic servants, beggars, and agriculture workers, and have been used as armed combatants by some terrorist and insurgent groups, it said.

Describing lack of punishment of traffickers as "a critical challenge", the report recommended an expansion of central and state government law enforcement capacity to conduct intrastate law enforcement activities against trafficking.

India's efforts to protect victims of trafficking varied from state to state, but remained inadequate in many places during the year, the report said.

Calling India's efforts aimed at the prevention of trafficking in persons as "inadequate", the report said: "The government did not report new or significant prevention efforts addressing the prominent domestic problems of trafficking of adults for purposes of forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation."

It also did not report any efforts to reduce the demand for commercial sex acts, the State Department report said. Similarly, the government failed to take any steps to raise awareness of trafficking for nationals travelling to known child sex tourism destinations within the country. India has not ratified the 2000 UN Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Protocol.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service.

HTS ak 080605

-681701

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

72 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 5, 2008 Thursday 11:35 AM GMTCambodia on Tier 2 in 2008 human trafficking: U.S. report*SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 356 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH June 5

The United States released its annual report Thursday on 2008 trafficking in persons and placed Cambodia on the Tier 2 Watch List.

The report, released by the U.S. Embassy in Phnom Penh, said Cambodia had made some improvements and increased engagement in combating the continued, serious problem of trafficking in persons.

The report recommends Cambodia continue implementation of anti-trafficking legislation and improve the number of prosecutions and convictions among others.

Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Interior Sar Kheng said he welcomed the report and hoped Cambodia will not fall back in its classification to Tier 3 or Tier 4, instead, he said Cambodia will catch Tier 1 in the future.

In a separate 2008 TIP Report, released by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Washington on Wednesday, it said Cambodia is a source and destination country for trafficked persons.

"Women and girls are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation to Thailand and Malaysia. Some Cambodian women who migrated to Taiwan as the result of brokered international marriages were subsequently trafficked for prostitution," it said.

"Sex trafficking of women and girls, including ethnic Vietnamese, occurs within the country, from rural areas to the urban areas of Phnom Penh, Siem Reap, and Sihanoukville," the report added.

"Cambodia is a destination for Vietnamese women and girls trafficked for prostitution. Cambodia is also a destination country for foreign child sex tourists, with increasing reports of Asian men traveling to Cambodia in order to have sex with underage virgin girls," it said.

Countries determined to have a significant number of trafficking victims are assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" are classified as Tier 1.

And countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards, are classified as Tier 2, whereas countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

73 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

June 5, 2008 Thursday

Israel's human-trafficking record little improved - US

BYLINE: RUTH EGLASHSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 4LENGTH: 599 words

Israel has failed to adequately punish the perpetrators of international human trafficking and must significantly increase its law enforcement and victim protection services if it is to improve its status in the US State Department's annual Trafficking in Person's Report, according to the document's 2008 version, which was released on Wednesday.

"Israel does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," the report reads, and subsequently has remained in the second level, or Tier 2, along with 69 other countries - including Lebanon, Yemen, Ethiopia and Thailand.

However, while Israel failed to reach the desired Tier 1, the report does say that the government is making significant efforts against trafficking - such as increased convictions for sex trafficking offenses and a campaign to prevent incidences of slavery.

The Trafficking in Person's Report is the most comprehensive worldwide study on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons and its assessments are based on material collected from local government and nongovernment organizations. When it was first compiled in 2000, Israel was placed in the lowest category. Since then Israel's status has improved due to new legislation and the willingness of the authorities to recognize the problem.

"Though the [Israeli] government prepared some indictments for forced labor, it did not criminally prosecute or convict any employer or recruitment agent for labor trafficking," the 2008 report reads. "In addition, the government still does not provide forced labor victims with adequate protection services, such as appropriate shelter, or medical and psychological assistance."

The State Department recommends that Israel "significantly increases its efforts against forced labor, including prosecutions, convictions and sentences for practices such as unlawful withholding of passports and charging fraudulent recruitment fees; significantly increase prosecutions and punishments of internal trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation; and extend comprehensive protection services to victims of forced labor."

"The report clearly shows Israel's central problem in its approach to combating trafficking," said Romm Lewkowicz, spokesman of the Hotline for Migrant Workers, a grass-roots organization that provides assistance to thousands of foreign workers living in Israel. "While legislation is clearly progressing there is still little awareness and prevention."

He also highlighted the fairly new phenomenon of Israeli women being trafficked abroad for commercial sexual exploitation, which is referred to in the State Department report. According to the report, there have been cases of Israeli women being taken to Canada, Ireland and England.

"One of the main problems is that the authorities are busy chasing the classic trafficking cases," Lewkowicz said, "when in fact the new and more common form of trafficking involves forced labor, the trafficking of Chinese women for prostitution and forcing Israeli women to go abroad."

The Isha L'Isha-Haifa Feminist Center, which is extremely active in combating human trafficking and contributed to the 2008 Trafficking in Person's Report, believes that another barrier to Israel reaching Tier 1 status is the "inactivity of the Interior Ministry."

The NGO's anti-trafficking project coordinator, Rita Chaikin, said Wednesday that the ministry refused to provide adequate assistance to female victims of trafficking, such as visas to stay here for rehabilitation services and, in some more extreme cases, citizenship.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2011

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo: THE US State Department recommends that Israel 'significantly increase prosecutions and punishments of internal trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation' (Credit: Israel Sun)

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 The Jerusalem Post
All Rights Reserved

74 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Kazakhstan General Newswire

June 5, 2008 Thursday 1:06 PM MSKKazakhstan making significant efforts to eliminate trafficking, U.S. Department of State*LENGTH: 243 wordsDATELINE: Astana June 5

U.S. Department of State praised efforts of Kazakhstan to eliminate human trafficking.

According to the press release from the U.S. embassy in Kazakhstan, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice releasing the 8th Annual Trafficking in Persons Report said that Kazakhstan has been placed on a Tier 2 "Watch List" in 2007.

The fact demonstrates that Kazakhstan has made efforts to eradicate problems associated with human trafficking, according to the press release.

According to the press release, "Kazakhstan demonstrated increasing efforts to combat trafficking over the previous year, specifically by improving efforts to convict and sentence traffickers to time in prison."

"The number of 154 traffickers convicted in 2007 significantly increased, and the majority of convicted traffickers served adequate sentences in prison. The government also took steps to address government officials' complicity in trafficking. Kazakhstan allocated nearly $35,000 for victim assistance during 2007," according to the press release.

Kazakhstan is recommended to "continue efforts to investigate, prosecute, convict, and punish government officials complicit in trafficking; continue efforts to ensure that convicted trafficking offenders are punished adequately through time in prison; provide some financial assistance for existing trafficking shelters; increase the number of victims referred to NGOs for assistance by government officials," according to the press release.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: NewswireJOURNAL-CODE: 0000000113

75 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Radio Free Europe

June 5, 2008

U.S.: Human-Trafficking Report Finds Key Criminals Often Go Unpunished

SECTION: NEWS STORIES AND DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1015 words

The U.S. State Department has issued its annual report on human trafficking in 170 countries, citing Iran and Moldova as among those with the worst records of fighting the problem.

helps determine whether the United States imposes sanctions or other punishments on countries that are seen as not doing enough to fight the practice. The report puts countries in one of three levels, or "tiers," that represent how well the United States views such efforts: Tier 1 for those doing a good job, down to Tier 3 for those doing an unacceptable job.

Virtually all of the nations of Eastern, Central, and Southeastern Europe are in Tier 2, while Russia and Tajikistan are on the so-called "watch list" of Tier-2 countries because they could slip to Tier 3. Uzbekistan is among four countries that have moved up. It used to be designated as a Tier-3 country, and now is on the Tier-2 "watch list." Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan are in Tier 2, except for Turkmenistan, which is listed as a "special case" because of the lack of information from the country.

Georgia is classified as Tier 1, while Armenia and Azerbaijan are on Tier-2 "watch lists."

Afghanistan is classified as Tier 2.

Iraq and Kosovo are listed as "special cases" due to their political transitions.

On May 29, the UN issued a report declaring that the rate of crimes against people and property in the Balkans has improved to the point that the Balkans are considered safer than Western Europe. But the State Department report says human trafficking remains a problem in the Balkans, particularly in Moldova.

"Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time, reflecting its government's failure to tackle trafficking-related corruption, as reflected in the handling of several high-profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking," said Mark Lagon, the State Department's senior adviser on trafficking in persons. "This failure created a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall."

May Lose Financial Assistance

Lagon said the State Department hopes the new government in Moldova will root out corrupt officials, improve the country's weak law enforcement, and make other efforts to protect victims of human trafficking.

Until then, Moldova -- along with Fiji and Papua New Guinea -- may lose some U.S. financial assistance that isn't involved in trade or humanitarian aid.

In releasing the report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice noted that since the United States began issuing the annual reports in 2000, an increasing number of governments around the world have given greater attention to the problem of human trafficking.

"Today -- because of our efforts, the efforts of our allies, and reports like the one we are releasing today -- there is much greater global awareness about the brutality of human trafficking," she said. "Globally, human trafficking is a multidimensional threat. It deprives people of their human rights and dignity, it increases global health risks, it bankrolls the growth of organized crime, and it undermines the rule of law."

But Rice said the more governments delve into the problem, the more trouble they find. Certainly, she said, traffickers have always found ways to kidnap and transport people for labor and prostitution, and there's never been a shortage of victims in regions such as Southeastern Europe, India, China, and the Philippines.

But Rice said that even in countries where such practices are uncovered, the people responsible for this 21st-century slavery too often go free.

"For the first time, in this year's report we closely examined prosecution data and made a disturbing discovery," Rice said. "Although more countries are addressing sex trafficking through prosecution and convictions, the petty tyrants who exploit their laborers rarely receive serious punishment. We see this as a serious shortcoming, and as we move our efforts forward, we and our allies must remember that a robust law enforcement response is essential."

NGOs Not Properly Trained

What's equally disturbing is that nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) -- which frequently offer the first refuge for victims who manage to escape the traffickers -- aren't trained or otherwise equipped to handle the victims.

Lagon said that last winter he met two young Romanian women at a shelter in Bucharest for survivors of sex trafficking in Western Europe. They finally escaped to the care of an NGO in the West, then were repatriated to the Bucharest shelter. But Lagon said that once the two women were back in their native country, one was eventually found to have an advanced case of tuberculosis, and the other was suffering from severe syphilis.

"Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were repatriated? The time loss made their conditions immensely worse," Lagon said. "Despite increased attention by law enforcement to sex trafficking, we are not seeing -- as the findings of this report [show] -- significant victim protection and victim services provided. This trend has to be reversed or we'll never be able to help significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized must be restored to their full humanity."

Lagon said the purpose of the report is to diagnose the problem of human trafficking and, from year to year, to track progress -- or lack thereof -- in combating it. In compiling the report, he said, he's highlighted five trends in worldwide human trafficking that need special attention by governments.

"Weak prosecution of labor-trafficking offenses. Secondly, weak trafficking-victim protection. Third, forced labor creeping into new growth industries. Fourth, domestic servitude, and luckily problems there are gaining recognition," Lagon said. "And fifth, closing a window of vulnerability for migrant workers is an imperative."

But Lagon said the thread that unites these five trends is something even more disturbing -- the demand for slave laborers and sex workers.

Copyright (c) 2006. RFE/RL, Inc. Reprinted with the permission of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, 1201 Connecticut Ave., N.W. Washington DC 20036. www.rferl.org

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

JOURNAL-CODE: RF

76 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 5, 2008 Thursday

2008 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT RELEASED, UKRAINE RATED TIER TWOBYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 404 wordsDATELINE: KIEV, Ukraine

The following information was released by the U.S. Embassy in Kiev:

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report at the State Department in Washington DC on Wednesday, June 4. As directed by the U.S. Congress, the State Department prepares reports for all countries in the world. The goal of these reports is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery.

The current report lists Ukraine as a Tier 2 country. This is because although the Government of Ukraine is making significant efforts to eliminate trafficking, it still does not fully comply with the minimum standards.

The report determines that Ukraine is making modest but tangible progress in improving the punishment of convicted traffickers, prosecuting labor trafficking, training the judiciary and carrying out prevention activities. For example, the Interior Ministry reported that the number of prosecutions for labor trafficking increased from three in 2006 to 23 in 2007.

The report also mentions that although local governments have made some progress on victim assistance, there was little evidence of efforts to curb trafficking complicity of government officials and of concrete steps to protect and assist trafficking victims at the national level.

The Embassy currently works with the government of Ukraine to combat trafficking in persons. We are committed to helping Ukraine increase its efforts to meet anti-trafficking standards.

U.S. Government programs to help Ukraine improve its anti-trafficking efforts include: USAID support to anti-trafficking NGOs that provide counseling, job-skills training, employment referral, and awareness campaigns to inform the public about trafficking. USAID assistance has helped over 2,000 victims of trafficking reintegrate into Ukraine. The Embassy is also helping the Ministry of Interior strengthen investigation and information technology capabilities of their anti-trafficking department. The U.S. Embassy also actively participates in the working group on visa and document fraud in human trafficking that has been recently established by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

The complete text of the 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report can be found in English at www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2008. The chapter on Ukraine can be found in Ukrainian at ky-iv.usembassy.gov/files/080604_TIP_Report_2008_Ukraine_Ukr.html

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 States News Service

77 of 445 DOCUMENTS

UNI (United News of India)

June 5, 2008 Thursday 2:48 PM EST

INDIA ON US WATCHLIST FOR FAILURE TO COMBAT HUMAN TRAFFICKING: REPTBYLINE: Report from UNI brought to you by HT Syndication.LENGTH: 368 wordsDATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 5 -- The Bush Administration has placed India on its 'Tier 2 Watchlist' for the fifth consecutive year for its failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat human trafficking in the last one year.

US anti-trafficking director Mark Lagon said yesterday that India made some progress but remained on the watch list because of its failure to recognise bonded labour as a form of trafficking.

"The Government of India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," said the US State Department's annual report on human trafficking which was released here yesterday.

"Despite the reported extent of the trafficking crisis in India," it pointed out, "government authorities made uneven efforts to prosecute traffickers and protect trafficking victims."

The report wants India to expand central and state government law enforcement capacity to conduct intrastate law enforcement activities against trafficking.

It also wants India to consider expanding the central Ministry of Home Affairs 'nodal cell' on trafficking to coordinate law enforcement efforts to investigate and arrest traffickers who cross state and national lines and significantly increase law enforcement efforts to punish labour trafficking offenders.

The 2008 report rated the anti-trafficking performance of 153 countries around the world and 14 were placed in the lowest category, Tier Three, which made them subject to possible US sanctions.

Some major US allies, including Saudi Arabia were put in Tier Three for the fourth consecutive year, along with fellow Arab states Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Syria, Algeria.

Burma, Cuba, Iran, Sudan and North Korea - all countries whose human rights records have been subject to strong US criticism, were also listed in Tier Three while Moldova, Fiji and Papua-New Guinea were added to the category for the first time.

US intelligence estimated that some 800,000 people were trafficked across international borders each year, 80 per cent of them women, and that millions more were exploited within their home countries.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from UNI.

-686521

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 UNI
All Rights Reserved

78 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2008 Thursday 11:03 PM EST

CAMBODIA PLACED ON TIER 2 IN 2008 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 469 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PENH, Cambodia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Cambodia's Tier 2 placement in the eighth annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons (TIP: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2008/>) Report is an improvement over last year's Tier Two Watch List designation. This ranking reflects the Cambodian government's increased engagement in combating the continued, serious problem of trafficking in persons.

U.S. Embassy Charg  d'Affaires Piper A. W. Campbell and Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Interior H.E. Sar Kheng discussed Cambodia's 2008 TIP Report tier ranking at a press conference on June 5. Charg  Campbell stated, "I commend Prime Minister Hun Sen, His Excellency Sar Kheng as the Head of the National Task Force on Human Trafficking, and everyone else involved with the Royal Government of Cambodia's efforts to combat human trafficking for their achievements over the past year. These achievements would not have been possible without a strong commitment at the highest levels of the government, and we look forward to continued joint work addressing this serious problem."

Over the past year, Cambodia has created a national anti-trafficking task force to improve the interagency response to trafficking and coordination with civil society, increased law enforcement action against traffickers and complicit officials, issued a comprehensive anti-trafficking in persons law, and undertaken prevention activities. High-level government officials have strongly supported anti-trafficking efforts, including by publicly promoting a "zero tolerance" policy for officials profiting from or colluding in trafficking in persons.

While noting improvements in Cambodia's anti-trafficking efforts, the report recommended that the country continue implementation of anti-trafficking legislation; significantly improve the number of prosecutions, convictions, and punishments of trafficking offenders; and make greater efforts to prosecute, convict, and criminally punish public officials complicit in trafficking.

The 170-country Trafficking in Persons Report, which is mandated by the U.S. Congress and is released annually at this time of year, is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons. Its findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons. The United States estimates that each year, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders, which does not include millions trafficked within their own countries. Human trafficking victims can be subjected to labor exploitation or sexual exploitation, or both.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the 2008 TIP Report on Wednesday, June 4 in a public event in Washington, D.C.

LOAD-DATE: June 9, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

79 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2008 Thursday 1:36 PM EST

U.S. STATE DEPARTMENT RELEASES TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 261 wordsDATELINE: TASHKENT, Uzbekistan

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On June 4, the U.S. Department of State released the eighth annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

The 170-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons, or modern day slavery. The United States estimates that each year approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders. This number does not include millions trafficked within their own country. The report's findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons.

Uzbekistan has taken concrete steps to counter trafficking in persons this year, as demonstrated by its progress from tier three classification last year to tier two watch list classification in this year's report. The government passed legislation that seeks not only to prevent and combat this type of exploitation, but also to protect and assist those who have been victims of human trafficking. Uzbekistan has adopted two International Labor Organization conventions relating to defining and preventing child labor. Further, its efforts to increase awareness through media campaigns and conferences demonstrate a growing commitment to addressing trafficking.

The Trafficking in Persons Report is mandated by the U.S. Congress and serves as the primary diplomatic tool for combating human trafficking around the world. The full text of the report is available on the State Department's website: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip>.

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

80 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2008 Thursday 5:06 AM EST

MOLDOVA LISTED ON TIER 3 IN 2008 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 744 words

DATELINE: CHISINAU, Moldova

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On June 4 at 10:00 a.m. EDT, the United States Secretary of State released the 2008 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. The Report is an invaluable tool in drawing the world's attention to the existence of modern-day slavery. U.S. law, the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), requires the Secretary of State to submit a report on the state of global efforts to combat trafficking to the U.S. Congress each year.

The goal of this report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against human trafficking. There is evidence of trafficking in human beings in every country around the world, including the United States. Men, women, and children are held in domestic servitude, exploited for commercial sex, forcibly recruited as child soldiers, or abused in factories and sweatshops. These forms of human trafficking are, in fact, modern-day slavery.

Countries determined to have a significant number of trafficking victims are assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the TVPA are classified as Tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3.

Moldova is classified as Tier 3 in the 2008 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report. This ranking results from the fact that the Government of Moldova does not fully comply with minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and did not make significant efforts to do so during the reporting period.

Moldova is a major source and, to a lesser extent, a transit country for women and girls trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation. It is estimated that slightly more than one percent of the approximately 750,000 Moldovans working abroad are trafficking victims.

While the new government has shown increased commitment to address this problem, it was insufficient to make up for inadequate action in the remainder of the March 2007-March 2008 reporting period. Of particular concern was the lack of follow-up on cases of alleged complicity of government officials in trafficking in persons, which was a concern cited in the 2007 Report.

The U.S. recognizes that Moldova has taken some positive steps to combat trafficking in persons during the past year. The government has increased the number of trafficking investigations, and hired social workers to focus on vulnerable populations. A pilot program to refer trafficking victims to protective services continues to develop.

While Moldova demonstrated progress on these fronts, the U.S. Secretary of State has determined that Moldova neither complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking in persons, as set forth in U.S. law, nor has made significant efforts to comply with those standards during the March 2007 to March 2008 reporting period. In addition to the lack of visible follow-up on allegations of government officials' complicity in trafficking in persons, the report notes that the government's measures to protect trafficking victims were insufficient. The government has not developed proactive measures to identify victims, nor provided funding to NGOs for victim assistance during the reporting period.

Within 90 days of the release of the Trafficking in Persons Report, the U.S. President must transmit to the U.S. Congress the President's determination with respect to countries on Tier 3. Such countries, including Moldova, could face restrictions on the receipt of USG assistance, including a Millennium Challenge Corporation Compact and negative USG votes on international financial institution (IFI) assistance.

During the next two months, the U.S. Government will work with the Government of Moldova to promote improvements in Moldova's response to trafficking in persons. Moldova's actions during the next 60 days, in particular Moldova's efforts to address the issue of alleged complicity of government officials, will be re-assessed. If the Government of Moldova undertakes significant actions against trafficking during this time frame, Moldova could be determined to have made significant efforts to combat trafficking (as defined in the TVPA law).

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

81 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2008 Thursday 4:59 AM EST

REDUCING DEMAND IS KEY TO CURBING HUMAN TRAFFICKING, U.S. SAYS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 908 words

DATELINE: MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

The demand for cheap labor and sexual services must be addressed to end human trafficking and modern-day slavery, say U.S. officials.

At a June 4 briefing for the release of the State Department's eighth annual Trafficking In Persons Report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the 2008 report, for the first time, examines prosecution data.

She cited one "disturbing discovery" in particular: "Although more countries are addressing sex trafficking through prosecution and convictions, the petty tyrants who exploit their laborers rarely receive serious punishment. We see this as a serious shortcoming, and as we move our efforts forward, we and our allies must remember that a robust law enforcement response is essential. "

Ambassador Mark Lagon, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the 2008 report also focuses on forced labor, a form of trafficking in persons.

Lagon recounted instances of workers imprisoned in factories under brutal conditions that could be categorized only as forced labor. Evidence of forced labor is especially strong in Thailand's shrimp-processing industry, he said, and in charcoal production and on sugar plantations in Brazil.

In addition to slave labor in factories, many trafficking victims find themselves enslaved as domestic servants. Lagon said the government of the Philippines has taken steps to prevent workers from accepting domestic employment in certain countries where such enslavement is prevalent. Lagon called on more governments around the world to exercise stronger political will to prevent trafficking.

Lagon said the 2008 report takes a close look at the factors that create demand and at the recruiters of trafficked victims. Such recruiters often establish fees for finding "work" for their "clients" that are so onerous the result is debt bondage. Debt bondage is a form of enslavement in which workers find they never can pay off their debts to win their freedom or the right to keep their wages.

The ambassador also called for more services for the treatment and rehabilitation of the formerly enslaved. "We must restore humanity to those who have been dehumanized," he said.

The 2008 report evaluates the efforts of 170 countries to combat human trafficking. The report aims to raise awareness of the scourge of modern slavery and to encourage countries to take action to prevent it.

The report places countries in "tiers" based on an assessment of the government's compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking as explained in the U.S. Trafficking in Persons Protection Act of 2000. Tier 2 and Tier 3 countries have moderate to severe challenges in controlling trafficking. Another category, "Tier 2 Watch List," indicates countries in danger of falling to the bottom Tier 3.

Lagon said that in the 2008 report, Madagascar moved to Tier 1 - the best of the ratings - by demonstrating the ability to take effective anti-trafficking steps with minimal resources. Moldova, however, fell to Tier 3. Both previously had been classified in Tier 2.

China and India remain on the Tier 2 Watch List. China, he said, has made insufficient efforts to combat trafficking, especially in regards to North Korean women who are trafficked into China as "wives" or prostitutes. Those North Koreans unlucky enough to be returned by authorities to North Korea routinely are punished by the North Korean regime, he said.

In contrast, India has made more efforts to protect children who become victims of trafficking, but the government still does not recognize bonded labor as a form of slavery, Lagon said.

TRAFFICKING A WORLDWIDE PROBLEM

According to U.S. estimates, some 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders each year. That number does not include the millions of people trafficked within their own countries.

Trafficking is a problem in the United States as well, where an estimated 14,500 to 17,500 victims are trafficked into the country each year. A separate report on trafficking problems inside the United States is produced each year.

U.S. efforts to combat trafficking involve partnerships with other countries, international and nongovernmental organizations. In fiscal year 2007, the U.S. government spent approximately $79 million to fund 180 anti-trafficking projects in about 90 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, the United States has funded more than $528 million for anti-trafficking projects worldwide.

Even though the problem of human trafficking is severe, the outlook is not entirely gloomy. According to Rice, in recent years there has been "a hopeful global movement uniting civil society, governments, and international organizations" to abolish human trafficking.

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice, and to say that freedom and security are non-negotiable demands of human dignity," she said.

"Together I believe this movement of governments, civil society, and brave individuals of conscience can rescue, rehabilitate, and restore the lives of those who have been treated as less than human."

The full text of the 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site. See also U.S. Government Efforts to Fight Demand Fueling Human Trafficking and The Facts About Human Trafficking for Forced Labor also on the State Department Web site.

LOAD-DATE: December 7, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

82 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2008 Thursday 3:23 AM EST

2008 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT RELEASED, UKRAINE RATED TIER TWO

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 109 words

DATELINE: KIEV, Ukraine

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report at the State Department in Washington DC on Wednesday, June 4. As directed by the U.S. Congress, the State Department prepares reports for all countries in the world. The goal of these reports is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery.

The current report lists Ukraine as a Tier 2 country. This is because although the Government of Ukraine is making significant efforts to eliminate trafficking, it still does not fully comply with the minimum standards.

LOAD-DATE: November 23, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

83 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 5, 2008 Thursday 3:05 AM EST

KAZAKHSTAN: OFFICIAL RELEASE OF EIGHTH TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 279 words

DATELINE: ALMATY, Kazakhstan

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Yesterday, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice announced the official release of the eighth annual Trafficking in Persons Report. This report, compiled by the United States Department of State in 170 countries, is the world's most comprehensive report on the efforts to combat severe forms of human trafficking. Its findings are intended to raise global awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons.

This year, Secretary Rice announced that Kazakhstan has been upgraded to Tier 2 from the Tier 2 Watch List. This reflects Kazakhstan's positive steps to eradicate the scourge of human trafficking. Kazakhstan has improved its efforts to convict and sentence traffickers. In 2007, Kazakh authorities convicted nineteen traffickers who are currently serving between three and twelve years in prison. Kazakhstan has also taken steps to investigate and convict government officials complicit in trafficking, and it allocated nearly $35,000 for victim assistance in 2007.

Sadly, the United States estimates that 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders each year, and that millions are trafficked within their own countries. These trafficking victims are often subjected to labor exploitation, sexual exploitation, or both. While Kazakhstan has done much to address this international problem, it still can improve in prosecuting traffickers, and especially in assisting and protecting victims. The United States Government is committed to working with our partners in Kazakhstan to make further strides towards ending this criminal activity that afflicts the entire world.

LOAD-DATE: July 30, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

84 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday

United States, Canada and Africa; Reducing Demand is Key to Curbing Human Trafficking, U.S. Says

BYLINE: America.gov

LENGTH: 871 words

A Filipina woman holds the high school ID of her missing daughter who had been recruited for domestic work abroad. She cited one "disturbing discovery" in particular: "Although more countries are addressing sex trafficking through prosecution and convictions, the petty tyrants who exploit their laborers rarely receive serious punishment. We see this as a serious shortcoming, and as we move our efforts forward, we and our allies must remember that a robust law enforcement response is essential. "

Ambassador Mark Lagon, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the 2008 report also focuses on forced labor, a form of trafficking in persons.

Lagon recounted instances of workers imprisoned in factories under brutal conditions that could be categorized only as forced labor. Evidence of forced labor is especially strong in Thailand's shrimp-processing industry, he said, and in charcoal production and on sugar plantations in Brazil.

In addition to slave labor in factories, many trafficking victims find themselves enslaved as domestic servants. Lagon said the government of the Philippines has taken steps to prevent workers from accepting domestic employment in certain countries where such enslavement is prevalent. Lagon called on more governments around the world to exercise stronger political will to prevent trafficking.

Lagon said the 2008 report takes a close look at the factors that create demand and at the recruiters of trafficked victims. Such recruiters often establish fees for finding "work" for their "clients" that are so onerous the result is debt bondage. Debt bondage is a form of enslavement in which workers find they never can pay off their debts to win their freedom or the right to keep their wages.

The ambassador also called for more services for the treatment and rehabilitation of the formerly enslaved. "We must restore humanity to those who have been dehumanized," he said.

The 2008 report evaluates the efforts of 170 countries to combat human trafficking. The report aims to raise awareness of the scourge of modern slavery and to encourage countries to take action to prevent it.

The report places countries in "tiers" based on an assessment of the government's compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking as explained in the U.S. Trafficking in Persons Protection Act of 2000. Tier 2 and Tier 3 countries have moderate to severe challenges in controlling trafficking. Another category, "Tier 2 Watch List," indicates countries in danger of falling to the bottom Tier 3.

Lagon said that in the 2008 report, Madagascar moved to Tier 1 -- the best of the ratings -- by demonstrating the ability to take effective anti-trafficking steps with minimal resources. Moldova, however, fell to Tier 3. Both previously had been classified in Tier 2.

China and India remain on the Tier 2 Watch List. China, he said, has made insufficient efforts to combat trafficking, especially in regards to North Korean women who are trafficked into China as "wives" or prostitutes. Those North Koreans unlucky enough to be returned by authorities to North Korea routinely are punished by the North Korean regime, he said.

In contrast, India has made more efforts to protect children who become victims of trafficking, but the government still does not recognize bonded labor as a form of slavery, Lagon said.

TRAFFICKING A WORLDWIDE PROBLEM

According to U.S. estimates, some 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders each year. That number does not include the millions of people trafficked within their own countries.

Trafficking is a problem in the United States as well, where an estimated 14,500 to 17,500 victims are trafficked into the country each year. A separate report on trafficking problems inside the United States is produced each year.

U.S. efforts to combat trafficking involve partnerships with other countries, international and nongovernmental organizations. In fiscal year 2007, the U.S. government spent approximately $79 million to fund 180 anti-trafficking projects in about 90 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, the United States has funded more than $528 million for anti-trafficking projects worldwide.

Even though the problem of human trafficking is severe, the outlook is not entirely gloomy. According to Rice, in recent years there has been "a hopeful global movement uniting civil society, governments, and international organizations" to abolish human trafficking.

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice, and to say that freedom and security are non-negotiable demands of human dignity," she said.

"Together I believe this movement of governments, civil society, and brave individuals of conscience can rescue, rehabilitate, and restore the lives of those who have been treated as less than human."

A transcript of Rice's remarks is available on America.gov.

The full text of the 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site. See also U.S. Government Efforts to Fight Demand Fueling Human Trafficking and The Facts About Human Trafficking for Forced Labor also on the State Department Web site.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

85 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 4:19 PM GMT

US keeps Gulf allies on trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: Lachlan CarmichaelLENGTH: 736 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 4 2008

The United States on Wednesday kept Gulf Arab allies Kuwait, Oman, Qatar and Saudi Arabia on a blacklist of countries trafficking in people, but removed ally Bahrain and trading partner Malaysia.

Fiji, Moldova and Papua New Guinea were added to the blacklist contained in the annual report which analyzed efforts in 170 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

Also remaining on the "Tier 3" blacklist are Sudan, Syria, Algeria, Iran, Myanmar, and Cuba, according to the State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report" for 2008.

Bahrain and Malaysia as well as Venezuela, Uzbekistan and Equatorial Guinea were all elevated from the blacklist last year to the "Tier 2" watch list this year, according to the congressionally-mandated report.

In introducing the report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said human trafficking "deprives people of their human rights and dignity" and "bankrolls the growth of organized crime and it undermines the rule of law."

The 14 countries on the blacklist could face sanctions, including the withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for government officials to participate in educational and cultural exchange programs.

"Fiji is a source country for children trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation and a destination country for a small number of women from the People's Republic of China and India trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation," it said

"Moldova is a major source, and to a lesser extent, a transit country for women and girls trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation," it added.

"Papua New Guinea is a country of destination for women and children from Malaysia, the Philippines, Thailand and the People's Republic of China, trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation to brothels in the capital and at isolated logging and mining camps," it said.

Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar admit men and women from Asian countries -- such as Bangladesh, India, Sri Lanka, Nepal, Pakistan, the Philippines and Indonesia -- and African countries like Sudan, Kenya, Nigeria and Ethiopia to work as domestic servants or other low-skilled laborers.

Many subsequently "face conditions of involuntary servitude," the report said adding that to a lesser extent, they are forced into prostitution.

The report also cast a spotlight on several countries in the Middle East.

"For the last four years, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been the matter of great concern and disappointment," said Mark Lagon, Rice's senior advisor on the human trafficking problem.

Saudi Arabia is on "Tier 3," which lists the worse trafficking offenders, for the fourth time.

"As an update, I am happy to report that the United Arab Emirates and Bahrain continued to make significant improvements, notably the United Arab Emirates," Lagon told reporters. "It is a model in the region."

The report said Sudan is "a source country for men, women, and children trafficked internally for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation."

Syria is a "destination and transit country for women and children trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor," the report said.

"A significant number of women and children in the large and expanding Iraqi refugee community in Syria are reportedly forced into commercial sexual exploitation by Iraqi gangs or, in some cases, their families," it said.

"Algeria is a transit country for men and women trafficked from sub-Saharan Africa to Europe for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and involuntary servitude," the report said.

"Iran is a source, transit, and destination for women trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and involuntary servitude. Iranian women are trafficked internally for the purpose of forced prostitution and forced marriages to settle debts," it said.

Cuba meanwhile is mainly a "source country for women and children trafficked within the country for the purpose of commercial exploitation," with some families pushing their children into prostitution to increase income.

Myanmar is a "source country for women, children and men trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and commercial exploitation."

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

86 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 2:43 PM GMT
Correction Appended

US keeps Mideast allies on trafficking blacklist, removes Malaysia

LENGTH: 196 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 4 2008

The United States on Wednesday kept Middle East allies Kuwait, Oman, Qatar and Saudi Arabia on a blacklist of countries trafficking in people, but removed ally Bahrain and trading partner Malaysia.

Fiji, Moldova and Papua New Guinea were added to the 2008 blacklist of the State Department annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," which analyzed efforts in more than 150 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

Also remaining on the "Tier 3" list for another year as the worst offenders in human trafficking were Sudan, Syria, Algeria, Iran, Myanmar, and Cuba, according to the Congressionally-mandated report.

US Gulf Arab ally Bahrain and trading partner Malaysia as well as Venezuela, Uzbekistan and Equatorial Guinea were all elevated from the blacklist last year to the "Tier 2" watch list this year.

Countries on the blacklist could face sanctions, including the withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for government officials to participate in educational and cultural exchange programs.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

CORRECTION: ATTENTION - CORRECTS to remove Bahrain from countries still on blacklist in lead. Here is a corrected repetition: ///

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

87 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 4, 2008 Wednesday

SPECIAL STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING WITH AMBASSADOR MARK P. LAGON, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS ON THE RELEASE OF THE EIGHTH ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT (AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT); LOCATION: WASHINGTON, DC

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 5658 words

SPECIAL STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING WITH AMBASSADOR MARK P. LAGON, DIRECTOR OF THE OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS ON THE RELEASE OF THE EIGHTH ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT (AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT) LOCATION: WASHINGTON, DC DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4, 2008

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Thank you very much, Madame Secretary. Good morning. Secretary Rice has aptly summarized why the U.S. Government is dedicated to ending human trafficking, a deeply dehumanizing form of exploitation. In virtually every country around the world, including the United States, men, women and children are held in domestic servitude, exploited for commercial sex, coerced into work in factories and sweatshops. In some, children are forcibly recruited as soldiers.

These are forms of human trafficking. They are, in fact, forms of modern-day slavery. Estimates of the number of victims vary widely. According to the U.S. intelligence community, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. About 80 percent of them are female. Up to half are minors. These figures do not include millions who are trafficked for purposes of labor and sexual exploitation within national borders as well.

What's unique about our policy goal of eradicating modern-day slavery is that we have, very much at Congress's direction, a comprehensive tool: The Annual Trafficking In Persons Report, which allows us to diagnose the problem and track progress. This year's report covers 170 countries: 153 are assessed and ranked into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3; another 17 countries are considered special cases, often because we lack sufficient information to assess whether a significant number of trafficking victims exist in those countries.

In the 2008 TIP Report, as mandated by Congress, we have several essential objectives addressed. To summarize: the country-specific information regarding what foreign governments are doing to prosecute traffickers, to protect victims and to prevent the crime; to initiate bilateral engagement, ongoing year-round in terms of action plans for combating trafficking in persons developed on the basis of each country assessment; to assess patterns and trends in human trafficking in order to confront it more intelligently and to hold poor performers to account; and finally, to inspire greater determination, creativity, and cooperation among governments and anti-trafficking advocates. As a function of the information collected in compiling this document, we know far more today than we did eight years ago with the first edition, or even three years ago, when, for example, we started taking a closer look at forced labor practices.

Let me discuss some of the key trends which emerged in the course of compiling this year's report. Every trend is best exemplified by an individual tragedy because it's truly these personal stories of anguish that motivate contemporary abolitionists in dealing with contemporary slavery. Last summer, I met a young Burmese woman, Aye Aye Wynn. She had been recruited to work in a shrimp processing sector of a neighboring country to Burma, together with 800 other Burmese men, women and children. Desperate to leave her country, Aye Aye Wynn described her horror to me at finding herself locked in a factory compound in the middle of a jungle, prevented from leaving or calling family by phone, or even eating decently. She and her Burmese brethren weren't even paid.

Aye Aye and two others tried to escape. They were hunted down and beaten. They were chained to poles in the middle of the courtyard of the factory compound and they were deprived of food and water. Aye Aye's hair was shaved as a tool of humiliation before the other workers. This wasn't a workplace. It was a forced labor camp. Thankfully, Aye Aye was rescued, and the good news is that the national police raid saved her and her compatriots. Around the world, gross examples of forced labor are commonly treated as mere administrative matters or regulatory offenses rather than despicable crimes.

In this year's TIP Report, for the first time, we broke down global and regional law enforcement data to examine progress in sex trafficking or labor trafficking prosecutions. You'll find that on page 37 of the report. These statistics indicate that only a very small percentage of human trafficking prosecutions are convictions. Roughly 10 percent of them relate to labor trafficking offenses as compared to prosecutions and convictions related to sex trafficking offenses.

If we're to end the terrible reality of slave labor, all responsible countries must join forces to hold those guilty of this crime accountable. More attention must be paid to labor trafficking in order to make the stories of vulnerable people like Aye Aye Wynn a part of our past. One example of an industry in which we are concerned over reports of significant forced labor is Thailand shrimp processing and that sector. But in other cases, in Brazil, some charcoal is produced by forced labor and some of that charcoal may be used to produce pig iron. Over half of the 5,800 slaves rescued by Brazilian authorities were found on sugarcane plantations.

Also of concern is China, where several slave labor scandals have recently been uncovered. Some of the cases reportedly involve the complicity of Chinese law enforcement officials themselves. All governments must act to ensure that cheap and efficient production of export goods does not come at the expense of the very dignity and fundamental rights of citizens.

Last winter, in a Bucharest shelter for sex trafficking survivors, I met two young Romanian women, Anca and Silvia. They had been trafficked separately to Western Europe and wound up together in a shelter and they were repatriated from there back home. Both women had the clear look of traumatized people. They clung to each other. Just a few days after we met in Romania, the NGO caring for them discovered that Anca had advanced TB and that Silvia had severe syphilis. Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were repatriated? The time lost made their conditions immensely worse.

Despite increased attention by law enforcement to sex trafficking, we are not seeing, as the findings of this report, significant improvement in victim protection and victim services provided. This trend has to be reversed or we'll never be able to help significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized must be restored to their full humanity.

This report focuses on a number of vulnerable groups. They include North Koreans in China, Burmese in Thailand, stateless people, low-skilled migrant workers in general, and foreign domestic workers. One of the most common and desperate faces of modern day slavery is the domestic servant, locked and abused in a private home or apartment, cut off from the rest of the world. One of the highest profile cases in the U.S. this year involved two Indonesian maids who were trapped in a nightmare in a mansion in Long Island, New York. Victims of involuntary domestic servitude are often exploited sexually as well as exploited for their labor.

We're beginning to see, however, glimmers of recognition among governments that this is an extraordinarily vulnerable population. For instance, the Philippines is a major source of female domestic workers. It recently decided to impose a ban on new maids going to one particular destination country because of the extremely high number of Filipino maids who were regularly escaping from the confines of abusive employers and seeking shelter in the Philippines Embassy. This development signifies a growing resolve on the part of the government to confront exploitation. Governments must start treating this form of slavery as a serious crime. Labor recruiters and brokers who facilitate trafficking through deceitful work offers, contract fraud, and outright force and coercion, they need to be prosecuted and punished with jail sentences.

In past reports, we've identified countries where foreign workers are exploited to force, fraud, and coercion, and have placed some of these countries on the lowest tier of the report, Tier 3. This year's report sheds more light on recruiters, some of whom are licensed by the state, and who often start the chain of trafficking in these labor source countries by fraudulent offers of employment and then excessive recruitment fees that later translate into debt bondage.

Vietnam and Indonesia are key labor source countries in this regard. We've seen specific cases of workers from each of these countries trapped into trafficking schemes abroad through the predatory practice of labor recruiters in their own countries. To address this new phenomena, the report includes recommendations for preventive steps that can be taken by both labor source and labor destination governments. These strategies are enumerated on page 16 and 17 of the report's introduction.

I've highlighted five trends: weak prosecution of labor trafficking offenses; secondly, weak trafficking victim protection; third, forced labor creeping into new growth industries; fourth, domestic servitude, and luckily, the problems there are gaining recognition; and fifth, closing a window of vulnerability for migrant workers as an imperative.

But running through this report, in fact, running through much of the U.S. Government's anti-trafficking work is a new focus, encouraged by Congress, on the factors that create demand for labor and sexual exploitation. Increasingly, we're scrutinizing products to see if they are tainted by slave labor. Without confronting this demand, we cannot end slavery today.

Demand is also pulling victims into sex and labor trafficking, but it's not being adequately addressed. As for demand for sex trafficking, it can be seen in the form of males seeking to buy brides from less developed communities with the intent of abusing and exploiting these women, or men traveling abroad to buy children for sex, or men exploiting women, prostituted by pimps. Demand for slave labor is seen broadly in the race to the bottom for cheap labor to produce cheaper export goods.

Since the TIP Report is organized around the performance of individual countries, let me highlight a few strong and weak performers and the rationale for the assessment of each. Moving up to Tier 1, for the first time, Madagascar proved this year that anti- trafficking progress can be achieved with will, despite minimal resources. It's emerged as a leader among sub-Saharan African countries.

Meanwhile, Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time, reflecting its government's failure to tackle trafficking related corruption as reflected in the handling of several high profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking. This failure created a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall. Now, we're hopeful that the newly appointed government in Moldova will take significant steps to address complicity by government officials and, furthermore, to improve law enforcement and victim protection efforts. We'll be engaging with them for that.

Among the news items here, Mexico has moved up to Tier 2, because of important developments over the reporting year, including a comprehensive new anti-trafficking law, funds appropriated by the legislature in Mexico for victim shelters, a demonstrably committed attorney general, and unified efforts of some superb civil society actors. Such developments are rays of hope in Mexico and evidence of a new political will that promises to yield even further improvement in this coming year.

For the last four years, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been a matter of great concern and disappointment. Saudi Arabia, for example, is ranked Tier 3 for the fourth time. As an update, I'm happy to report that the United Arab Emirates and Bahrain continue to make significant improvements; notably the United Arab Emirates as a model in the region.

No briefing on human trafficking would be complete without raising the situation in two countries with huge populations and unique trafficking profiles: China and India. China has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years. While there have been prosecutions of perpetrators of human trafficking and a national action plan was launched, there are insufficient efforts to protect Chinese and foreign victims of trafficking. In China, women and girls from North Korea are particularly at risk. Fleeing the repressive regime in their homeland, as well as poor social and economic conditions, these North Koreans seek refuge in China. But many are preyed upon by Chinese traffickers who sell them into sexual servitude as "wives" - with quotation marks around wives - or into prostitution. When Chinese authorities find these trafficking victims, they'd often send them back to North Korea where they face harsh punishment. The victims are punished rather than cared for.

India has made efforts on the child labor front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labor Minister Oscar Fernandes joined in a raid. But India still doesn't recognize bonded labor as human trafficking. It has weak anticorruption efforts and prosecutions are too few.

To conclude, as we continue to shed light on emerging global trends for trafficking in persons, we're steadfast in our support to countries who are willing to partner with us in this global fight. Just as the transatlantic slave trade was abolished 200 years ago, slavery today can be abolished again. Let's remain committed to act as a voice for the many voiceless victims of human trafficking: an advocate for the prostituted woman or child, the exploited domestic worker, the trapped agricultural laborer. Their bondage demands our attention and action.

Finally, let me take this opportunity to state how much good work I've seen throughout the year since I last stood here a year ago. And I want to tell you how much I personally appreciate the increasing cooperation of our allies, governments, NGOs, church organizations, and private citizens around the world who are making real strides to prevent trafficking in persons and to help victims reclaim their lives and self respect.

I'd welcome your questions.

Q You spoke a little bit about slave labor camps that have been uncovered in China. Have you found that any products destined for the Olympic Games have been tainted by slave labor, to use your word? And then I had a question - a follow-up thing on Venezuela. They appear to have actually improved this year.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm. First of all, any time that there's a major sporting event, whether it be, you know, World Cup soccer or the biggest of all, the Olympics, one has to be concerned about the massive construction work possibly being subject to human trafficking exploitation and a spike in commercial sexual exploitation.

With respect to China, I actually would say we have to look at the general situation of human rights that we're - the world is called upon to look at as the Olympic Games are coming together. It's 19 years ago today that the Tiananmen Square massacre occurred. And there's a lot of focus on human rights, in general, in China as the Olympics are about to occur.

But we need to recognize that there is a problem of human trafficking that's not specific to the Olympics occurring, but the Olympics brings attention to. There has been examples of people caught in slavery in brick kilns and, in fact, resold to other kilns by government officials who are corrupt, been a case recently documented of children who were trafficked to Guangdong Province and were involved in the worst forms of child labor, having been brought from Dongguan. There's credible evidence of Uighurs, who are moved from --

Q I'm sorry, of who?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Of Uighur Muslims who have moved from Xinjiang to other parts of China. And most notably, as I emphasized in my opening remarks, North Koreans are subject to re-victimization, because they flee a country in which they face repression and an economic chaos caused by their own government. And whether as bought wives or as workers in the Northeast of China, they have been subject to human trafficking and the worst kind of leverage that could be held over their head, the threat that they'd be sent back to North Korea only to be punished severely by their government.

Q But specifically, has there been anything that you can point to that would indicate that the Olympic Games has actually increased the number of people in forced labor or - because there's a need for more product, et cetera, et cetera?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: As I don't have tangible evidence, I don't want to overreach. But any time that there's a substantial building boom and construction, and a vulnerability to massive prostitution designed to service people from abroad, there's a possibility. But I would direct you to thinking about the longstanding vulnerability to human trafficking in China. China is not only a government that does not protect the liberties of its people, but it manifestly is a government that doesn't protect its own citizens and foreign nationals from human trafficking.

Q And on Venezuela?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah. Venezuela has actually moved up this year. And I hope it's a tribute to the objectivity of our report. We don't sit in the upper levels of this building and decide which countries are generally human rights abusers or with whom we have problematic relationships, and then determine that they get a lousy ranking in this report. Venezuela has taken some steps: passing a law to prohibit internal trafficking of women and girls, opening up some investigations of human trafficking. There remain problems, including limited victim services and no shelters for victims. So it's a mixed bag. But truth be told, they don't belong in the lowest category any longer.

Q Speaking about the objectivity of the report, there are special cases where you don't have enough information. But Iran is on the Tier 3, and you don't have any embassy in Iran, any relations with Iran for 30 years. So how - on what do you base your information -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, we - just as Iran is included in the Annual Human Rights Report and is a serious case to examine, we feel that Iran needs to be assessed with a ranking in this report. Yes, it's a limitation that we have only so much information. But that's a limitation more based on the closed nature of the Iranian Government than the lack of diplomatic representation of the United States.

I want to say that we try to be very serious about getting evidence.

Truthfully, we prod other governments quite hard to give us evidence and data. Congress requires us to tell them about investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and sentences, as well as numbers of trafficking victims found and helped. And we insist on having a baseline as best we can. There are some limits on the information that we got from the Government of Iran. But the picture is pretty clear, one of serious human trafficking.

Elise.

Q Can you talk a little bit more about the idea that slave labor is fueling some of these booming industries in these developing countries and the idea that the United States is increasing trade with these countries? We're relying on some of the products that are fueling these industries. And how much demand is fueling it and whether there should be stricter, kind of, I guess what you say, export controls or import controls on these types of things?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's been the law --

Q I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Okay, we'll come back to you. It's been a law for 78 years under the 1938 Tariff and Trade Act that products of slave labor are not permitted into the country. It's a matter of implementation. We need to identify those products that are indeed produced by slave labor. My colleagues at ICE, at DHS, are eager and energetic in their efforts internationally to try and run that down.

We don't want to suggest that all imports from a country are tainted by slave labor when there is evidence of some. I myself have seen in Thailand those who were subjected to slave labor conditions in the shrimp processing sector. That doesn't mean all shrimp that comes into the United States from Thailand is tainted, but there's a distinct possibility; it's something we need to look out for.

We need to think about growing trends. I'll call attention to the profile of Brazil, which is doing a good deal proactively to rescue victims of forced labor, even calling them by the name they deserve, slaves, based on commitment by President Lula. But as it says right here in the report, approximately half of the nearly 6,000 men freed from slave labor in 2007 were found exploited on plantations growing sugarcane for the production of ethanol - a growing trend.

We need to pay attention to this, and there is consumer power, the best kind of market force, to ask the Q Are supply chains clean?

Q I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: One quick follow-up?

Q It kind of follows up on that. But China and India, you said that they've been on the Tier 2 Watch List for the last four - for the last four years. And you say that, you know, it's not based on who we have a bad relationship with that we give them a bad grade, but what about the countries that we're trying to have a good relationship with, we have a growing economic relationship with? I mean, how come neither one of those countries has made it to Tier 3? My understanding is there's been a lot of debate within the Administration about whether they should be listed.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: The Tier 2 Watch List should not be a permanent status. It's - I think it was designed by Congress to highlight - there's some countries in Tier 2 that are in danger of potentially ending up on Tier 3. You know, there are some countries that just deserve to be in this new category that was created between Tier 2 and Tier 3. It's my judgment that Russia, for instance, really doesn't belong in Tier 2 and it really doesn't belong in Tier 3. This is the right call.

With respect to India and China, these are both very serious cases. We're quite blunt in the report. Frankly, we're quite blunt in our extensive diplomatic dialogue with these countries. There are some positive developments in each. In India, there's been an effort to focus on rescuing victims both in sex trafficking and in child labor, but as far as prosecutions across the board, as far as fighting corruption as a facilitator of human trafficking and in particular a recognition that bonded labor is extensive and a human trafficking problem, it remains a serious situation.

Q So you feel comfortable that they're still on Tier 2 Watch List?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Indeed, indeed. And with respect to China, while they have made some progress in law enforcement on a national action plan, there remain a number of problems that I've enumerated earlier that deserve serious attention.

Sir.

Q Can you elaborate more on the Arab states? You've talked about progress in UAE and Bahrain, and Saudi Arabia is still in the Tier 3. Are you considering imposing sanctions on Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, all countries that are on Tier 3, according to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of the year 2000 that created the office I direct and mandated the report, all countries in Tier 3 are subject to sanctions. The sanctions cannot be limitations on trade promotion assistance or humanitarian - purely humanitarian assistance.

Every year, approximately the 1st of September, a decision is made by the U.S. Government about whether to subject the countries under Tier 3 to full sanctions, or to use a full or partial waiver. And considerations are made about whether we're going to advance our diplomacy with countries to actually get them to change on human trafficking, and our general national interests are taken into account.

And there are a number of times where we try and use this as a surgical tool, where, for instance, we feel that we could get cultural exchanges or democracy programs funded if we have a partial waiver. But I must say that I think we've gotten the attention of a number of the Persian Gulf states, and I think even more than the blunt words of the United States or potential sanctions, as a model that one sees in the region of the United Arab Emirates dealing with the problem of children as jockeys and then putting in place a law on human trafficking that it's now using to prosecute sex traffickers and (inaudible) victims.

But you know, these countries care about the rankings. You know, I've seen the diplomats and officials of these countries in their capitals and here in Washington, and the prospect of moving up from Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List and a reassessment that occurs in August for the Tier 3 countries, and the prospect of moving up in each year is something they very much care about.

Q Yes, I'd like to return to Mexico for a moment.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm.

Q You had commended Mexico on improving its efforts in human trafficking and you emphasized that one way to solve this problem that's very important is to make sure that governments prosecute - or make arrests, prosecute and convict people for these crimes. I've been reporting on the State Department's non-natural death report for 2005- 2007, specifically the 128 homicides that have taken place in Mexico, and I have been unable to get information on exactly that from the State Department; in other words, the arrest, prosecution and conviction. Is it just trafficking that they follow up on, not - why wouldn't homicides or other events in sort of -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: A lot of violent crime, particularly connected to organized crime both in drugs and human trafficking, that persists in Mexico. It's by no means a rosy situation in terms of law enforcement. I can't speak specifically to that information, although I can try and help get that for you. But in Mexico, it's the step of will that's being shown, and the legislative branch and the executive branch coming together to pass a comprehensive law and some appearance that they intend to use that law. Because that is the key here. We see states that move up when they pass a comprehensive law, and then sometimes we see they don't implement those laws. On some of those first steps I've been very impressed. The Attorney General Medina Mora, who has appointed Guadalupe Morfin as his point woman on human trafficking, I've spent some time with her at a U.N. conference on human trafficking, consulting about how she'll attack this problem. I'm delighted to see the Mexican authorities are going to use appropriations from their legislature to take some mansions seized from drug traffickers and turn them into shelters for human trafficking victims.

In the back.

Q On Cuba, please. What are you doing on the situation of trafficking in Cuba, and what are you doing about (inaudible) under Raul Castro regime?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, there continues to be a problem for human trafficking in Cuba. Earlier, I was asked a question about Iran. This is also a situation in which the government is not exactly forthcoming to the United States about data. There are some efforts to raise awareness in Cuba for women who might fall into sex trafficking, and there are some efforts that the Cubans make in combination with British NGOs to try and deal with children who are, you know, sexually exploited. But in general, there seems to be denial and weak victim assistance, when it comes to human trafficking. One hopes there'll be change in Cuba, but I don't see evidence to date that the modest transition that has taken place politically in Cuba has changed the situation markedly.

Sir.

Q Yes. You said the Saudis are on Tier 3 since the beginning - the establishing of the report?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: They've been on Tier 3 for four years, is it? Yeah, about four years now.

Q You have been establishing the reports since the eight years. This is the eighth year, right?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Correct.

Q And the Saudis are in Tier 3 since the beginning?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: And the Saudis - I can - and by the way, a helpful addition to the report last year was a tracking chart. And in the profile of every country, it indicates every ranking it has received since the beginning. Saudi Arabia was Tier 3, 2001 and 2002. It came up to Tier 2, when there was no Tier 2 Watch List, both in 2003 and 2004. And since 2005, it has remained on Tier 3.

Q And why -- sorry.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Go ahead. Were you going to ask me about the situation in Saudi Arabia?

Q No, I'm asking why, in your opinion, the U.S. is not succeeding in convincing the Saudis to do some improvements? I mean --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think there's a desperate need for women and foreigners, migrant laborers to be treated as human beings in full in Saudi Arabia, and that is part of the distinct problem there and in a number of the Gulf states. One case is really striking to me, the case of Nour Miyatis, an Indonesian domestic servant, a maid, who was grossly abused in Saudi Arabia. For four years, she's been pursuing legal proceedings, not going home to Indonesia, but sticking it out. She's trying to stick up for her rights under international law. And she had recently her case thrown out in Saudi Arabia. This is a woman who was locked for over a month in a closet by her employer. Her employer refused to treat her medical condition. She got gangrene in her fingers and toes and they had to be amputated. It's pretty obvious.

Q Loss of her limbs?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah, yeah. All fingers and toes. It's emblematic. But there are a number of problems both of labor trafficking and victimization of women as well. But I hope to visit Saudi Arabia in the coming months and engage all the more.

Q Yeah, but why you are not succeeding, like you are succeeding in - with the Emirates? Why with the Saudis you are not --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think it's principally a question of political will on their part, but I'll do mine in terms of serious, quiet dialogue.

Sir.

Q What are the countries that there are currently sanctions against and what are the nature of those sanctions as a result of this?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, of the Tier 3 countries from last year -- and my staff can help me recall all of them, if I miss some -- some of the countries that have full-scale sanctions include Burma, Cuba. There was actually, in the case of Iran and North Korea, partial sanctions so that some exchange programs or cultural programs or democracy-related assistance would not be blocked. A number of the countries had sanctions waived, from Malaysia that was on Tier 3 last year, has moved up to the Tier 2 Watch List, to this year, a number of countries again on Tier 3. Last year, a number of the Persian Gulf states, because of strategic relationships we have with governments and wanting to sustain dialogue on human trafficking and not having the door shut, had full waivers, based on a decision by the President of the United States.

Sir.

Q Regarding North Korean victims in northeastern China, Chinese Government (inaudible) seems to be -- provide the traffickers with the - what kind of leverage, as you said. So what special steps do you think is required?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think one - one important place to start is for the Chinese authorities to see what they believe their moral and legal obligations are under migration treaties and human rights for the way they treat those who come to China. They're treated legally in China -- that is to say, North Koreans who come there - as illegal economic migrants and are sent home. And this creates a double problem. For those who want to victimize North Koreans who come to China, all they have to do is threaten that we're going to, you know, turn you over to the authorities and you're going to get sent home. And so those victims find themselves coerced into doing, you know, the worst of things, including women who ostensibly have been bought and brought into marriage but, in fact, are sex slaves. But moreover, when they do get sent home, they are, you know, truly victimized; I mean, you're a victim leaving North Korea, you're victimized in human trafficking and then victimized and sent home. That's a pretty gory situation. It demands the attention of the international community.

Anyone else?

I just want to say a word, if I can, about the effort that comes together before this report. It's a momentous effort. We have tried - worked hard to get this annual report to come out at the same time as a report on U.S. efforts at home that the Department of Justice pulls together. So we can answer the Q Do you grade yourselves? Just yesterday, a report was delivered to Congress and it's in synch with this, so that when we produce CD-ROMs for international distribution, there will be an assessment of what the United States is doing, including a self-critical set of recommendations.

This report would never come together without a team of reports officers who travel the globe and do their very best to get the most serious empirical data. That team is led by Mark Taylor. Much of the creativity of this report in raising themes is shaped by Mark Taylor and that team. And I also want to thank Eleanor Gaetan, our senior coordinator for public affairs who helped shape this report and it becoming, as I've learned going to U.N. meetings, a tremendous source of international public awareness. There is nothing like this report. This is not crowing; it's just a fact. There is no NGO report and there is no U.N. report on human trafficking that makes this kind of assessment, and this has become more and more enlightening each year. I commend it to you. Thanks.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

88 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 4, 2008 Wednesday

STATE DEPARTMENT FOREIGN PRESS CENTER BRIEFING (AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT); SUBJECT: TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT;
BRIEFER: MARK LAGON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, DEPARTMENT OF STATE; LOCATION: THE FOREIGN PRESS CENTER, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 4185 words

TATE DEPARTMENT FOREIGN PRESS CENTER BRIEFING (AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT)
SUBJECT: TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT BRIEFER: MARK LAGON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, DEPARTMENT OF STATE LOCATION: THE FOREIGN PRESS CENTER, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 1:00 P.M. EDT DATE: WEDNESDAY, JUNE 4, 2008

MODERATOR: All right. Thanks, everyone. Welcome to the Foreign Press Center this afternoon. It's our pleasure to host today the Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Ambassador Mark Lagon. He's going to make a brief statement about the 2008 TIP report and then we're going to have time for your questions and answers. So without further delay, let me introduce Ambassador Lagon.

MR. LAGON: Thank you very much. Good afternoon and thank you all for coming. As you know, this morning, Secretary Rice released the Department's Annual Trafficking In Persons Report. We highlight heroes in each year's report who are - play a key role in combating human trafficking.

And one of the heroes this year, Anas Anas, is a reporter with an independent newspaper who was responsible for breaking two major trafficking rings in the capital city of his country, Ghana, in Accra during the reporting season for this report. Anas Anas worked undercover for eight months exposing the trafficking ring's methods of transportation and the identities of immigration officials who were accepting bribes in return for overlooking fake visas and passports in a trafficking scheme. His undercover work allowed him to collect key evidence that could be used by police to prosecute the traffickers. He displayed great courage as a reporter. In so doing, he's able to act as a voice for the voiceless.

So each of you, I'd note, in your capacity as journalists are uniquely positioned to help raise public awareness about this most pressing injustice of human trafficking that affects the lives of millions globally. So I'm particularly delighted that you're here today.

In virtually every country around the world, including the United States, men, women and children are held in domestic servitude. They're exploited for commercial sex and coerced in work and factories and in sweatshops. In some, children are forcibly recruited as soldiers. These are forms of human trafficking, but more aptly put, these are forms of modern-day slavery. Estimates of the number of victims worldwide vary widely. But according to the U.S. Government, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. Eighty percent of them are female. Some one-half of them are minors. And these figures don't include the millions more who are trafficked for the purposes of labor and sexual exploitation within the national borders of countries.

What's unique about our policy goal of eradicating modern-day slavery is that we have, very much at Congress's direction, a comprehensive tool in the form of the Annual Trafficking in Persons Report that allows us to diagnose the problem and to track progress in confronting it. This year's report covers 170 countries in the world, a new high. 153 were assessed and ranked at Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List and - or Tier 3. Another 17 countries are designated special cases, often because we lack sufficient information to assess whether a significant number of trafficking victims exist in those countries.

In the 2008 TIP Report, as mandated by Congress, there's several essential objectives. To summarize: country-specific information regarding what foreign governments are doing to prosecute traffickers, protect victims, and prevent the crime in the first place. Also, to initiate bilateral engagement with other countries that is ongoing year-round in the form of action plans we developed with other countries for combating trafficking based on the country assessment and the report. Another goal is to assess patterns and trends in human trafficking in order to confront it more intelligently and, frankly speaking, to hold poor performers accountable. Finally, we seek to inspire with, you know, greater determination, creativity and cooperation among governments and anti-trafficking advocates.

As a function of the information collected in compiling the report, we know far more today than we did eight years ago with the first edition, or even three years ago when we began taking a closer look at forced labor practices in addition to sex trafficking.

Let me discuss some of the key trends which emerged in the course of compiling this year's report. Every trend is best exemplified by an individual tragedy because it's truly personal stories that help motivate those who work today to abolish modern-day slavery. Last summer, I met a young Burmese woman, Aye Aye Wynn, who had been recruited to work in the shrimp processing industry in a neighboring country. Together with some 800 other Burmese men, women and children, she was recruited. She was desperate to leave her tortured country. And she described to me the horror at finding herself locked in a factory compound in the middle of the jungle, prevented from leaving, prevented from calling family members by phone, even prevented from eating decently. These workers were not even paid.

Aye Aye Wynn and two others tried to escape. They were hunted down and they were beaten. They were chained to poles in the courtyard of the factory compound, deprived of food and water. Aye Aye Wynn, a vibrant young woman with a beautiful head of hair, tells how that head of hair was completely shorn off as a way of humiliating her before other workers. This wasn't a workplace. It was a forced labor camp. Thankfully, Aye Aye Wynn was rescued. And the good news is that a national police raid saved her and her compatriots.

Around the world, gross examples of forced labor are commonly treated as administrative or regulatory offenses rather than crimes. In this year's TIP report, for the first time, we broke down global and regional law enforcement data to examine progress in sex trafficking and labor trafficking prosecutions. These statistics indicate that only a very small percentage of human trafficking prosecutions and convictions, roughly 10 percent of them, relate to labor trafficking offenses as opposed to sex trafficking offenses. That information, those statistics are on page 37 of the report.

If we're to end the terrible reality of slave labor, all responsible countries must join forces to hold those guilty of this crime accountable. More attention has to be paid to labor trafficking in order to make the stories of vulnerable people like Aye Aye Wynn a part of our past.

One example of an industry in which we are concerned over reports of significant forced labor is Thailand's shrimp processing sector. In Brazil, some charcoal produced in -- by forced labor finds its way into pig iron for export. Over half of the 5,800 slaves rescued by Brazilian authorities over the last year were found on sugar cane plantations as well. Also of deep concern is China, where several slave labor scandals have recently been uncovered. Some of the cases reportedly involve the complicity of Chinese law enforcement officials. All governments must act to ensure that the cheap and efficient production of export goods doesn't come at the expense of the basic dignity and rights of citizens.

Another trend: the weak protection of sex trafficking victims. Last winter in Bucharest, I met in a shelter two young Romanian women, sex trafficking survivors, Anca and Silvia.

They'd been trafficked separately to Western Europe and they wound up together in a shelter and they were repatriated back home. Both women clearly had the look of traumatized people. They clung to each other. And later when I returned to the United States, I learned from the NGO caring for them that they discovered that Anca had advanced TB and Silvia had severe syphilis. Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were even repatriated to Romania? Time lost made their conditions worse.

Despite increased attention on law enforcement for sex trafficking, we don't see significant improvement in victim protection and services provided worldwide. This trend has to be reversed or we'll never be able to have significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized have to be restored to their full humanity. We've highlighted in the report a number of vulnerable groups: North Koreans in China, Burmese in Thailand, stateless people, low-skilled migrant workers, in particular, and foreign domestic workers.

One of the most common and desperate faces of modern-day slavery is that of the domestic servant, locked and abused in a private home or apartment, cut off from the rest of the world. And truth be told, one of the highest profiled cases in the United States this year involved two Indonesian maids trapped in a nightmare in a mansion in Long Island, New York. Victims of involuntary domestic servitude are often exploited sexually as well as for their labor.

We're beginning to see glimmers of recognition among governments that this is an extraordinarily vulnerable population. For instance, the Philippines is a major source of female domestic workers. It recently decided to impose a ban on new maids going to one particular East Asian country because there are an extremely high number of Filipina maids who escape regularly from the confines of abusive employers, only to seek shelter in the Embassy of the Philippines. This development signifies a growing resolve on the part of the Government of the Philippines to confront exploitation.

Governments must start treating this form of slavery as a serious crime. Labor recruiters or brokers facilitate trafficking through deceitful work offers, contract fraud, and sometimes outright force and coercion. And they must be prosecuted, they must be punished with jail sentences.

In past reports, we've also identified countries where foreign workers are exploited through force, fraud and coercion. And we've placed a number of these countries on the lowest tier, Tier 3. This year's report sheds more light on recruiters. Some of those recruiters are licensed by the state, such as in Vietnam, and they often start the chain of trafficking in these labor source countries by using fraudulent offers, offers of employment that are bogus. And they levy excessive recruitment fees on people desperate for a better life, which translate into debt bondage in the end.

Vietnam and Indonesia are key labor source countries in this regard. We've seen specific cases of workers from each of these countries trapped into trafficking schemes abroad through a predatory practice of labor recruiters in their own countries. To address this new phenomenon, the report includes recommendations for preventive steps that can be taken by labor source and labor destination governments. I really want to highlight this for you. On pages 16 and 17 of the report are these strategies for fighting the - closing the window of vulnerability for migrant laborers.

So there are a number of themes here. A couple of them that I'd highlight are the fact that labor trafficking is not seeing enough punishment of the perpetrators and sex trafficking shows a situation of an emphasis on law enforcement and immigration approaches, but a failure to follow through on helping the victims, to find those victims, and to restore their dignity.

Running through the report overall, one sees a seam. And indeed, it's a seam in all of the U.S. Government's work on human trafficking, including the $530 million the United States has contributed to international anti-trafficking efforts over the last seven years. And that seam is the demand for labor trafficking and for sex trafficking. Increasingly, we're scrutinizing products to see if they're tainted by slave labor. Without confronting demand, we can't end slavery today. Demand is pulling victims into sex trafficking and labor trafficking and it's not being adequately addressed. In the area of sex trafficking, demand can be seen in the form of males buying brides from less developed communities, with intent of abusing them or exploiting them, of men traveling abroad to buy children for sex, and of men exploiting women, prostituted by pimps. And in the area of slave labor demand is seen in the race to the bottom for cheap labor and the ability to produce cheaper export goods.

Since the TIP report is organized around the performance of individual countries, let me highlight a few strong and weak performers and the rationale for how we've assessed each.

In Africa, moving up to Tier 1 for the first time, Madagascar proved this year that anti-trafficking progress can be achieved with political will even absent substantial economic resources. Madagascar emerged as a leader among sub-Saharan African countries. On the other hand, Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time. It reflected its government's failure to tackle trafficking-related corruption. It's seen in the handling of several high profile cases of complicity by government officials. That failure to deal with corruption was a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall. We're hopeful the newly appointed government will take significant steps to address complicity, and while they're at it improve law enforcement and victim protection.

An important development is that Mexico has moved up to Tier 2. It is an assessment based on the enactment of a comprehensive new anti-trafficking law, funds being appropriated by Mexico's legislature for victim shelters, a commitment of Attorney General Medina Mora, and unified efforts by superb civil society actors, many of whom I've met with in three parts of Mexico and two trips I've made over the last year. Such developments are rays of hope in Mexico and are evidence of a new political will to grapple with human trafficking. And I'm quiet hopeful that Mexico will continue to further improve in the coming year.

For at least four years now, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been a matter of great concern and disappointment. And in particular, Saudi Arabia is ranked Tier 3 for the fourth time in a row.

As an update, I'd like to report on one success story that is a model for the region: the United Arab Emirates, which, for the second year in a row, was upgraded this year to Tier 2 based on having passed the first comprehensive law in human trafficking in the region last year, and now using that law to go after perpetrators of sex trafficking, and to outfit victim shelters.

No briefing on human trafficking would be complete without raising the situation in two particular countries that are larger populace and with unique situations in human trafficking, and that's China and India. China has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years. On the upside, there were prosecutions of perpetrators and a national action plan launched by the government of China. But overall, there were insufficient efforts to protect both Chinese and foreign nationals from being victims of trafficking.

In China, women and girls from North Korea are particularly at risk. Fleeing the repressive regime in their homeland, as well as poor social and economic conditions, they seek refuge in China. But many are then preyed upon by Chinese traffickers who sell them into sexual servitude as wives or into prostitution. When Chinese authorities find these trafficking victims, they often send them back to North Korea where they face harsh punishment; that is, in effect, punishment of the victim.

India has made some efforts that are positive on the child labor front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labor Minister Oscar Fernandes joined a raid recently. However, India still doesn't recognize the degree to which bonded labor as a substantial human trafficking problem in its country. It has weak anticorruption efforts and prosecutions are too few.

So in conclusion, we continue to shed light on global trends that are emerging. And importantly, we are steadfast in an offer to nations that wish to partner with us to fight human trafficking. It's some 200 years since the transatlantic slave trade was abolished, and I think we can take tangible steps further to abolishing the slavery that exists today. We need to remain committed to be the voice for the voiceless, for the advocate - I mean, the advocates for the prostituted woman or child, for the exploited domestic worker, for the trapped agricultural laborer. Their bondage demands our attention. It demands our action.

I do want to emphasize that I appreciate the increasing cooperation I see from our allies, from governments, from NGOs, from church organizations, and private citizens. They are making real strides to prevent trafficking in persons and real strides to deal with the immediate, moral imperative of helping victims reclaim their lives and self respect.

And before I take some questions, I just want to note that the work of the report is by no means the work of one person. We have a broad team. The team of officers who are specialists on regions of the world is here with us. If you have follow-up questions after this, they'd be quite willing to talk and share their expertise. But led by Mark Taylor, the section of our Office on Reports and Political Affairs pours themselves into this report to produce the most credible, solid, substantiated, objective assessment of human trafficking in the world. And there is nothing like it. This is not in modesty; there is no NGO report, there is no U.N. report that covers the human trafficking scene in every country like this.

I also want to thank Eleanor Gaetan of our public outreach section for her leadership in making this a public awareness document for the world, not just a report to Congress.

So I welcome your questions.

MODERATOR: Thanks very much. If you have questions, please remember to state your name and media organization and wait for the microphone. Here in the front.

Q Thank you. Sonia Schott with Radio Valera in Venezuela. I have three ones. The first one, why is the United States not included in the same report? The second one is regarding the law enforcement that is up to the foreign governments to provide you with the information, so how reliable is this source, considering you mentioned corruption at the beginning of your remarks. And the third one is on Venezuela. Venezuela is Tier 2 Watch List -

MR. LAGON: It's moved up.

Q Yeah. So is this good news for Venezuela, or what that means? Could you please elaborate a little bit more on that? Thank you.

MR. LAGON: I would have to say these are all three superb questions, but they all deserve time.

So, first, I'm glad you asked about the United States assessing itself. First of all, starting last year and again this year, there is a profile of the United States in this report that matches those of other countries that looks at what the United States is doing to prosecute the exploiters, to protect the victims, and to prevent the problem in the first place.

Now, we don't give ourselves a tier assessment, but one thing that I think is important is that we have started giving to Congress and making available to the public an annual self-assessment of the United States that doesn't just tell the good news, but that identifies areas for improvement. Just yesterday, this annual report was sent to Congress. This is last year's and we'll have available very soon the one for this year. As we circulate our international report around the world on CD-ROM, we will put that assessment of the United States on it.

I think it's deeply important that the United States be accountable for what it's doing to fight the problem at home, and we've done quite a bit. I know this because I chair our interagency committee on our domestic and international efforts. But I will be very frank about those areas for improvement, but I commend to you that report that lays out some recommendations.

Now, on law enforcement data, Congress directs us to ask for very specific information about investigations, about prosecutions, about convictions and about sentences. And we tussle with our friends around the world to ask them for information. And I reassure them, as I have with diplomats here in the United States and with government officials in capitals around the world, that we don't just ask for that data so that we can write a critical report. To have comprehensive data of how you are doing in attacking the problem of human trafficking is a sign of a government having a dedicated effort and seeing this as a specific crime. That data is not perfect. It's gotten better each and every year. There are countries that don't share data with us or share it imperfectly, from China to Iran to Cuba.

But we do believe that the kind of data on prosecutions and convictions that's through the report and that is collected together on page 37 with totals, that's where we've learned that only one-tenth of the prosecutions and convictions are in the area of labor trafficking, that those are the best compiled data that we've had to date and it's based on a very serious effort by U.S. diplomats.

Now, with respect to Venezuela, it's been upgraded. There has been some improvement. And this report is designed to be objective. We do not sit in the State Department and decide which countries we have broad criticisms on human rights for or that we have difficult and tense relationships with, and then just punish those that that's the case.

There are manifold problems of political pluralism and human rights in Venezuela, but truth be told, there have been some modest but real improvements in Venezuela that merit Tier 2 Watch List ranking, not a highly complimentary ranking but an improved one, including strengthening the statutory framework to fight human trafficking, notably for those who are internally trafficked within the country. There have been some investigations into human trafficking that have been opened in Caracas and increased police work at airports and border points. However, victims' services are limited and there are no dedicated trafficking in persons shelters. So there's good and there's bad, but there is evidence of modest improvement, and we try and tell it like it is.

MODERATOR: I think we have an additional question from New York, if you'd please state your name and media organization and ask your question.

Q Yes, my name is Diego Senior. I work with Caracol Radio for Colombia. It's basically the same question regarding about Venezuela, but for Colombia. Can you elaborate more about the things that you need to be improved, not only in our country in Colombia but in the rest of Latin America, maybe mentioning specific cases in order to - well, according to your report?

MR. LAGON: It's a very good question. Colombia is an exemplar within Latin America. Is it Tier 1. Tier 1 countries aren't perfect, but they meet what are called the minimum standards for combating human trafficking in the U.S. law that governs how we prepare the report. There are strong law enforcement efforts, sustained prosecution efforts in Colombia, investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and an effort to count how - count and track how prosecutions are going with a database. There's cooperation with foreign governments to fight human trafficking. For victim protection, the Colombian Government has been increasing funding for NGOs.

There are some areas of improvement that are needed, particularly the need for a formal mechanism to identify human trafficking victims among vulnerable populations. Vulnerable populations are people in prostitution or people who are in migrant labor sectors. So that's the picture. Not perfect, but an exemplar.

Through the region, one sees both the problem of sex trafficking and the problem of forced labor. I guess I'd like to emphasize in the region one big case, Brazil. There is reason for some praise. President Lula has identified by name the problem as it is, slavery, in Brazil. And Brazil identifies companies that have not taken steps to improve their accountability of their supply chains. However, there remains a significant problem, particularly in the area of forced labor, in the sector in which charcoal is used to make pig iron for export. And notably, the situation in Brazil is captured by the success of rescuing 5,800 people in slave labor, and yet - and we learned that half of those are in the sugarcane plantations for the purpose of ethanol. So in the growing sector of biofuels, clearly, there's a forced labor effort. And there's a problem one sees in Brazil, and that is that of those cases of 5,800 victims, there is no associated criminal prosecutions for a single trafficker associated with those freed slaves.

MODERATOR: Other questions? Any final questions from New York? No other questions.

MR. LAGON: Happy to make myself available over the next couple of days if you have follow-up questions or your colleagues do.

MODERATOR: Well, then thank you very much. Thank you, Ambassador.

LOAD-DATE: June 11, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 Federal News Service, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

89 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

June 4, 2008 Wednesday

Israel's rating in human trafficking 'not improving'. State Department to issue report today. Gal-On bill would ban sex-industry advertising

BYLINE: RUTH EGLASHSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 6LENGTH: 474 words

No significant change is expected in the evaluation of Israel in the US State Department's 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report, due to be released on Wednesday, according to local nongovernment anti-trafficking activists.

Israel was listed as a 'Tier 2' country and its efforts to prevent international human trafficking were noted in last year's annual report, which is the most comprehensive worldwide study on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons.

However, Israel was still labeled as not "fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking."

While the Jewish state's status will most likely not regress to the lower placement of previous years - in 2006 Israel appeared on the Tier 2 Watch List, one level before the US would impose sanctions, local anti-trafficking group Isha L'Isha-Haifa Feminist Center said Israel still has a long way to go to reach the desired Tier 1.

"Israel's path to the top is blocked by the inactivity of the Interior Ministry and its humiliating treatment of victims who have managed to escape the cycle of human trafficking," Rita Chaikin, anti-trafficking project coordinator at Isha L'Isha-Haifa Feminist Center, told The Jerusalem Post on Tuesday.

"The Interior Ministry continues to create problems by refusing to provide female victims of trafficking with the appropriate shelter," she said, adding that the ministry decides whether victims are eligible to enter the state shelters, which provide them with crucial rehabilitation services and protection from those who facilitate trafficking rings.

Chaikin said most of the women brought here to work in the sex industry were not Israeli citizens and therefore were not eligible for services such as medical insurance. They should be given visas and, in some cases, citizenship, she said.

Some of these women give birth in Israel, and even they are not provided with visas, she said.

A spokeswoman said the Interior Ministry had clear regulations and procedures on how to deal with women who had escaped from trafficking operations, which are published on its Web site.

Yahel Ash Kurlander, Isha L'Isha's spokeswoman, said Israel would most likely remain in the same category as last year due to the efforts of individuals such as the government appointed coordinator in the battle against trafficking, Rachel Gershoni, and MK Zehava Gal-On, chairwoman of the Knesset Subcommittee on Trafficking in Women.

On Tuesday, Gal-On's committee met to discuss the status of proposed legislation aimed at curtailing the 'virtual sex industry,' which in many cases advertises prostitution services from women who have been trafficked to Israel. The bill would ban all media, including promotional pamphlets and 'business cards,' from advertising prostitution services and people with access to the sex industry.

LOAD-DATE: October 4, 2011LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo: ISRAEL IS expected to remain in Tier 2 in the US State Department's 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report, meaning it does not meet the minimum standards but is making significant efforts. (Credit: Illustrative photo by Diego Giudice/Bloomberg)

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 The Jerusalem Post
All Rights Reserved

90 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 4, 2008 Wednesday

BRIEFING ON RELEASE OF EIGHTH ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 5623 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Thank you very much, Madame Secretary. Good morning. Secretary Rice has aptly summarized why the U.S. Government is dedicated to ending human trafficking, a deeply dehumanizing form of exploitation. In virtually every country around the world, including the United States, men, women and children are held in domestic servitude, exploited for commercial sex, coerced into work in factories and sweatshops. In some, children are forcibly recruited as soldiers.

These are forms of human trafficking. They are, in fact, forms of modern-day slavery. Estimates of the number of victims vary widely. According to the U.S. intelligence community, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. About 80 percent of them are female. Up to half are minors. These figures do not include millions who are trafficked for purposes of labor and sexual exploitation within national borders as well.

What's unique about our policy goal of eradicating modern-day slavery is that we have, very much at Congress' direction, a comprehensive tool: The Annual Trafficking In Persons Report, which allows us to diagnose the problem and track progress. This year's report covers 170 countries: 153 are assessed and ranked into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3; another 17 countries are considered special cases, often because we lack sufficient information to assess whether a significant number of trafficking victims exist in those countries.

In the 2008 TIP Report, as mandated by Congress, we have several essential objectives addressed. To summarize: the country-specific information regarding what foreign governments are doing to prosecute traffickers, to protect victims and to prevent the crime; to initiate bilateral engagement, ongoing year-round in terms of action plans for combating trafficking in persons developed on the basis of each country assessment; to assess patterns and trends in human trafficking in order to confront it more intelligently and to hold poor performers to account; and finally, to inspire greater determination, creativity, and cooperation among governments and anti-trafficking advocates. As a function of the information collected in compiling this document, we know far more today than we did eight years ago with the first edition, or even three years ago, when, for example, we started taking a closer look at forced labor practices.

Let me discuss some of the key trends which emerged in the course of compiling this year's report. Every trend is best exemplified by an individual tragedy because it's truly these personal stories of anguish that motivate contemporary abolitionists in dealing with contemporary slavery. Last summer, I met a young Burmese woman, Aye Aye Wynn. She had been recruited to work in a shrimp processing sector of a neighboring country to Burma, together with 800 other Burmese men, women and children. Desperate to leave her country, Aye Aye Wynn described her horror to me at finding herself locked in a factory compound in the middle of a jungle, prevented from leaving or calling family by phone, or even eating decently. She and her Burmese brethren weren't even paid.

Aye Aye and two others tried to escape. They were hunted down and beaten. They were chained to poles in the middle of the courtyard of the factory compound and they were deprived of food and water. Aye Aye's hair was shaved as a tool of humiliation before the other workers. This wasn't a workplace. It was a forced labor camp. Thankfully, Aye Aye was rescued, and the good news is that the national police raid saved her and her compatriots. Around the world, gross examples of forced labor are commonly treated as mere administrative matters or regulatory offenses rather than despicable crimes.

In this year's TIP Report, for the first time, we broke down global and regional law enforcement data to examine progress in sex trafficking or labor trafficking prosecutions. You will find that on page 37 of the report. These statistics indicate that only a very small percentage of human trafficking prosecutions are convictions. Roughly 10 percent of them relate to labor trafficking offenses as compared to prosecutions and convictions related to sex trafficking offenses.

If we are to end the terrible reality of slave labor, all responsible countries must join forces to hold those guilty of this crime accountable. More attention must be paid to labor trafficking in order to make the stories of vulnerable people like Aye Aye Wynn a part of our past. One example of an industry in which we are concerned over reports of significant forced labor is Thailand's shrimp processing and that sector. But in other cases, in Brazil, some charcoal is produced by forced labor and some of that charcoal may be used to produce pig iron. Over half of the 5,800 slaves rescued by Brazilian authorities were found on sugarcane plantations.

Also of concern is China, where several slave labor scandals have recently been uncovered. Some of the cases reportedly involve the complicity of Chinese law enforcement officials themselves. All governments must act to ensure that cheap and efficient production of export goods does not come at the expense of the very dignity and fundamental rights of citizens.

Last winter, in a Bucharest shelter for sex trafficking survivors, I met two young Romanian women, Anca and Silvia. They had been trafficked separately to Western Europe and wound up together in a shelter and they were repatriated from there back home. Both women had the clear look of traumatized people. They clung to each other. Just a few days after we met in Romania, the NGO caring for them discovered that Anca had advanced TB and that Silvia had severe syphilis. Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were repatriated? The time lost made their conditions immensely worse.

Despite increased attention by law enforcement to sex trafficking, we are not seeing, as the findings of this report, significant improvement in victim protection and victim services provided. This trend has to be reversed or we will never be able to help significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized must be restored to their full humanity.

This report focuses on a number of vulnerable groups. They include North Koreans in China, Burmese in Thailand, stateless people, low-skilled migrant workers in general, and foreign domestic workers. One of the most common and desperate faces of modern day slavery is the domestic servant, locked and abused in a private home or apartment, cut off from the rest of the world. One of the highest profile cases in the U.S. this year involved two Indonesian maids who were trapped in a nightmare in a mansion in Long Island, New York. Victims of involuntary domestic servitude are often exploited sexually as well as exploited for their labor.

We are beginning to see, however, glimmers of recognition among governments that this is an extraordinarily vulnerable population. For instance, the Philippines is a major source of female domestic workers. It recently decided to impose a ban on new maids going to one particular destination country because of the extremely high number of Filipino maids who were regularly escaping from the confines of abusive employers and seeking shelter in the Philippines Embassy. This development signifies a growing resolve on the part of the government to confront exploitation. Governments must start treating this form of slavery as a serious crime. Labor recruiters and brokers who facilitate trafficking through deceitful work offers, contract fraud, and outright force and coercion, they need to be prosecuted and punished with jail sentences.

In past reports, we have identified countries where foreign workers are exploited by force, fraud, and coercion, and have placed some of these countries on the lowest tier of the report, Tier 3. This year's report sheds more light on recruiters, some of whom are licensed by the state, and who often start the chain of trafficking in these labor source countries by fraudulent offers of employment and then excessive recruitment fees that later translate into debt bondage.

Vietnam and Indonesia are key labor source countries in this regard. We have seen specific cases of workers from each of these countries trapped into trafficking schemes abroad through the predatory practice of labor recruiters in their own countries. To address this new phenomenon, the report includes recommendations for preventive steps that can be taken by both labor source and labor destination governments. These strategies are enumerated on page 16 and 17 of the report's introduction.

I have highlighted five trends: weak prosecution of labor trafficking offenses; secondly, weak trafficking victim protection; third, forced labor creeping into new growth industries; fourth, domestic servitude, and luckily, the problems there are gaining recognition; and fifth, closing a window of vulnerability for migrant workers as an imperative.

But running through this report, in fact, running through much of the U.S. Government's anti-trafficking work is a new focus, encouraged by Congress, on the factors that create demand for labor and sexual exploitation. Increasingly, we are scrutinizing products to see if they are tainted by slave labor. Without confronting this demand, we cannot end slavery today.

Demand is also pulling victims into sex and labor trafficking, but it's not being adequately addressed. As for demand for sex trafficking, it can be seen in the form of males seeking to buy brides from less developed communities with the intent of abusing and exploiting these women, or men traveling abroad to buy children for sex, or men exploiting women, prostituted by pimps. Demand for slave labor is seen broadly in the race to the bottom for cheap labor to produce cheaper export goods.

Since the TIP Report is organized around the performance of individual countries, let me highlight a few strong and weak performers and the rationale for the assessment of each. Moving up to Tier 1, for the first time, Madagascar proved this year that anti-trafficking progress can be achieved with will, despite minimal resources. It emerged as a leader among sub-Saharan African countries.

Meanwhile, Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time, reflecting its government's failure to tackle trafficking related corruption as reflected in the handling of several high profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking. This failure created a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall. Now, we are hopeful that the newly appointed government in Moldova will take significant steps to address complicity by government officials and, furthermore, to improve law enforcement and victim protection efforts. We will be engaging with them for that.

Among the news items here, Mexico has moved up to Tier 2, because of important developments over the reporting year, including a comprehensive new anti-trafficking law, funds appropriated by the legislature in Mexico for victim shelters, a demonstrably committed attorney general, and unified efforts of some superb civil society actors. Such developments are rays of hope in Mexico and evidence of a new political will that promises to yield even further improvement in this coming year.

For the last four years, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been a matter of great concern and disappointment. Saudi Arabia, for example, is ranked Tier 3 for the fourth time. As an update, I am happy to report that the United Arab Emirates and Bahrain continue to make significant improvements; notably the United Arab Emirates as a model in the region.

No briefing on human trafficking would be complete without raising the situation in two countries with huge populations and unique trafficking profiles: China and India. China has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years. While there have been prosecutions of perpetrators of human trafficking and a national action plan was launched, there are insufficient efforts to protect Chinese and foreign victims of trafficking. In China, women and girls from North Korea are particularly at risk. Fleeing the repressive regime in their homeland, as well as poor social and economic conditions, these North Koreans seek refuge in China. But many are preyed upon by Chinese traffickers who sell them into sexual servitude as "wives" with quotation marks around wives or into prostitution. When Chinese authorities find these trafficking victims, they often send them back to North Korea where they face harsh punishment. The victims are punished rather than cared for.

India has made efforts on the child labor front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labor Minister Oscar Fernandes joined in a raid. But India still doesn't recognize bonded labor as human trafficking. It has weak anticorruption efforts and prosecutions are too few.

To conclude, as we continue to shed light on emerging global trends for trafficking in persons, we are steadfast in our support to countries who are willing to partner with us in this global fight. Just as the transatlantic slave trade was abolished 200 years ago, slavery today can be abolished again. Let's remain committed to act as a voice for the many voiceless victims of human trafficking: an advocate for the prostituted woman or child, the exploited domestic worker, the trapped agricultural laborer. Their bondage demands our attention and action.

Finally, let me take this opportunity to state how much good work I have seen throughout the year since I last stood here a year ago. And I want to tell you how much I personally appreciate the increasing cooperation of our allies, governments, NGOs, church organizations, and private citizens around the world who are making real strides to prevent trafficking in persons and to help victims reclaim their lives and self respect.

I'd welcome your questions.

QUESTION: You spoke a little bit about slave labor camps that have been uncovered in China. Have you found that any products destined for the Olympic Games have been tainted by slave labor, to use your word? And then I had a question about a follow-up thing on Venezuela. They appear to have actually improved this year.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm. First of all, any time that there's a major sporting event, whether it be, you know, World Cup soccer or the biggest of all, the Olympics, one has to be concerned about the massive construction work possibly being subject to human trafficking exploitation and a spike in commercial sexual exploitation.

With respect to China, I actually would say we have to look at the general situation of human rights that we're in the world is called upon to look at as the Olympic Games are coming together. It's 19 years ago today that the Tiananmen Square massacre occurred. And there's a lot of focus on human rights, in general, in China as the Olympics are about to occur.

But we need to recognize that there is a problem of human trafficking that's not specific to the Olympics occurring, but the Olympics brings attention to. There has been examples of people caught in slavery in brick kilns and, in fact, resold to other kilns by government officials who are corrupt, been a case recently documented of children who were trafficked to Guangdong Province and were involved in the worst forms of child labor, having been brought from Dongguan. There's credible evidence of Uighurs, who are moved from --

QUESTION: I am sorry, of who?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Of Uighur Muslims who have moved from Xinjiang to other parts of China. And most notably, as I emphasized in my opening remarks, North Koreans are subject to re-victimization, because they flee a country in which they face repression and an economic chaos caused by their own government. And whether as bought wives or as workers in the Northeast of China, they have been subject to human trafficking and the worst kind of leverage that could be held over their head, the threat that they'd be sent back to North Korea only to be punished severely by their government.

QUESTION: But specifically, has there been anything that you can point to that would indicate that the Olympic Games has actually increased the number of people in forced labor or about because there's a need for more product, et cetera, et cetera?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: As I don't have tangible evidence, I don't want to overreach. But any time that there's a substantial building boom and construction, and a vulnerability to massive prostitution designed to service people from abroad, there's a possibility. But I would direct you to thinking about the longstanding vulnerability to human trafficking in China. China is not only a government that does not protect the liberties of its people, but it manifestly is a government that doesn't protect its own citizens and foreign nationals from human trafficking.

QUESTION: And on Venezuela?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah. Venezuela has actually moved up this year. And I hope it's a tribute to the objectivity of our report. We don't sit in the upper levels of this building and decide which countries are generally human rights abusers or with whom we have problematic relationships, and then determine that they get a lousy ranking in this report. Venezuela has taken some steps: passing a law to prohibit internal trafficking of women and girls, opening up some investigations of human trafficking. There remain problems, including limited victim services and no shelters for victims. So it's a mixed bag. But truth be told, they don't belong in the lowest category any longer.

QUESTION: Speaking about the objectivity of the report, there are special cases where you don't have enough information. But Iran is on the Tier 3, and you don't have any embassy in Iran, any relations with Iran for 30 years. So how about on what do you base your information about?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, we about just as Iran is included in the Annual Human Rights Report and is a serious case to examine, we feel that Iran needs to be assessed with a ranking in this report. Yes, it's a limitation that we have only so much information. But that's a limitation more based on the closed nature of the Iranian Government than the lack of diplomatic representation of the United States.

I want to say that we try to be very serious about getting evidence. Truthfully, we prod other governments quite hard to give us evidence and data. Congress requires us to tell them about investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and sentences, as well as numbers of trafficking victims found and helped. And we insist on having a baseline as best we can. There are some limits on the information that we got from the Government of Iran. But the picture is pretty clear, one of serious human trafficking.

Elise.

QUESTION: Can you talk a little bit more about the idea that slave labor is fueling some of these booming industries in these developing countries and the idea that the United States is increasing trade with these countries? We are relying on some of the products that are fueling these industries. And how much demand is fueling it and whether there should be stricter, kind of, I guess what you say, export controls or import controls on these types of things?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's been the law --

QUESTION: I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Okay, we'll come back to you. It's been a law for 78 years under the 1938 Tariff and Trade Act that products of slave labor are not permitted into the country. It's a matter of implementation. We need to identify those products that are indeed produced by slave labor. My colleagues at ICE, at DHS, are eager and energetic in their efforts internationally to try and run that down.

We don't want to suggest that all imports from a country are tainted by slave labor when there is evidence of some. I myself have seen in Thailand those who were subjected to slave labor conditions in the shrimp processing sector. That doesn't mean all shrimp that comes into the United States from Thailand is tainted, but there's a distinct possibility; it's something we need to look out for.

We need to think about growing trends. I'll call attention to the profile of Brazil, which is doing a good deal proactively to rescue victims of forced labor, even calling them by the name they deserve, slaves, based on commitment by President Lula. But as it says right here in the report, approximately half of the nearly 6,000 men freed from slave labor in 2007 were found exploited on plantations growing sugarcane for the production of ethanol -- a growing trend.

We need to pay attention to this, and there is consumer power, the best kind of market force, to ask the question: Are supply chains clean?

QUESTION: I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: One quick follow-up?

QUESTION: It kind of follows up on that. But China and India, you said that they've been on the Tier 2 Watch List for the last four years. And you say that, you know, it's not based on who we have a bad relationship with that we give them a bad grade, but what about the countries that we are trying to have a good relationship with, we have a growing economic relationship with? I mean, how come neither one of those countries has made it to Tier 3? My understanding is there's been a lot of debate within the Administration about whether they should be listed.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: The Tier 2 Watch List should not be a permanent status. It's -- I think it was designed by Congress to highlight -- there's some countries in Tier 2 that are in danger of potentially ending up on Tier 3. You know, there are some countries that just deserve to be in this new category that was created between Tier 2 and Tier 3. It's my judgment that Russia, for instance, really doesn't belong in Tier 2 and it really doesn't belong in Tier 3. This is the right call.

With respect to India and China, these are both very serious cases. We are quite blunt in the report. Frankly, we are quite blunt in our extensive diplomatic dialogue with these countries. There are some positive developments in each. In India, there's been an effort to focus on rescuing victims both in sex trafficking and in child labor, but as far as prosecutions across the board, as far as fighting corruption as a facilitator of human trafficking and in particular a recognition that bonded labor is extensive and a human trafficking problem, it remains a serious situation.

QUESTION: So you feel comfortable that they are still on Tier 2 Watch List?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Indeed, indeed. And with respect to China, while they have made some progress in law enforcement on a national action plan, there remain a number of problems that I've enumerated earlier that deserve serious attention.

Sir.

QUESTION: Can you elaborate more on the Arab states? You've talked about progress in UAE and Bahrain, and Saudi Arabia is still in the Tier 3. Are you considering imposing sanctions on Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, all countries that are on Tier 3, according to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of the year 2000 that created the office I direct and mandated the report, all countries in Tier 3 are subject to sanctions. The sanctions cannot be limitations on trade promotion assistance or humanitarian assistance purely humanitarian assistance.

Every year, approximately the 1st of September, a decision is made by the U.S. Government about whether to subject the countries under Tier 3 to full sanctions, or to use a full or partial waiver. And considerations are made about whether we're going to advance our diplomacy with countries to actually get them to change on human trafficking, and our general national interests are taken into account.

And there are a number of times where we try and use this as a surgical tool, where, for instance, we feel that we could get cultural exchanges or democracy programs funded if we have a partial waiver. But I must say that I think we've gotten the attention of a number of the Persian Gulf states, and I think even more than the blunt words of the United States or potential sanctions, as a model that one sees in the region of the United Arab Emirates dealing with the problem of children as jockeys and then putting in place a law on human trafficking that it's now using to prosecute sex traffickers and (inaudible) victims.

But you know, these countries care about the rankings. You know, I've seen the diplomats and officials of these countries in their capitals and here in Washington, and the prospect of moving up from Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List and a reassessment that occurs in August for the Tier 3 countries, and the prospect of moving up in each year is something they very much care about.

QUESTION: Yes, I'd like to return to Mexico for a moment.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm.

QUESTION: You had commended Mexico on improving its efforts in human trafficking and you emphasized that one way to solve this problem that's very important is to make sure that governments prosecute or make arrests, prosecute and convict people for these crimes. I've been reporting on the State Department's non-natural death report for 2005-2007, specifically the 128 homicides that have taken place in Mexico, and I have been unable to get information on exactly that from the State Department; in other words, the arrest, prosecution and conviction. Is it just trafficking that they follow up on, not why wouldn't homicides or other events in sort of a AMBASSADOR LAGON: A lot of violent crime, particularly connected to organized crime both in drugs and human trafficking, that persists in Mexico. It's by no means a rosy situation in terms of law enforcement. I can't speak specifically to that information, although I can try and help get that for you. But in Mexico, it's the step of will that's being shown, and the legislative branch and the executive branch coming together to pass a comprehensive law and some appearance that they intend to use that law. Because that is the key here. We see states that move up when they pass a comprehensive law, and then sometimes we see they don't implement those laws. On some of those first steps I've been very impressed. The Attorney General Medina Mora, who has appointed Guadalupe Morfin as his point woman on human trafficking, I've spent some time with her at a UN conference on human trafficking, consulting about how she'll attack this problem. I am delighted to see the Mexican authorities are going to use appropriations from their legislature to take some mansions seized from drug traffickers and turn them into shelters for human trafficking victims.

In the back.

QUESTION: On Cuba, please. What are you doing on the situation of trafficking in Cuba, and what are you doing about (inaudible) under Raul Castro regime?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, there continues to be a problem for human trafficking in Cuba. Earlier, I was asked a question about Iran. This is also a situation in which the government is not exactly forthcoming to the United States about data. There are some efforts to raise awareness in Cuba for women who might fall into sex trafficking, and there are some efforts that the Cubans make in combination with British NGOs to try and deal with children who are, you know, sexually exploited. But in general, there seems to be denial and weak victim assistance, when it comes to human trafficking. One hopes there'll be change in Cuba, but I don't see evidence to date that the modest transition that has taken place politically in Cuba has changed the situation markedly.

Sir.

QUESTION: Yes. You said the Saudis are on Tier 3 since the beginning a" the establishing of the report?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: They've been on Tier 3 for four years, is it? Yeah, about four years now.

QUESTION: You have been establishing the reports since the eight years. This is the eighth year, right?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Correct.

QUESTION: And the Saudis are in Tier 3 since the beginning?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: And the Saudis a" I can a" and by the way, a helpful addition to the report last year was a tracking chart. And in the profile of every country, it indicates every ranking it has received since the beginning. Saudi Arabia was Tier 3, 2001 and 2002. It came up to Tier 2, when there was no Tier 2 Watch List, both in 2003 and 2004. And since 2005, it has remained on Tier 3.

QUESTION: And why -- sorry.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Go ahead. Were you going to ask me about the situation in Saudi Arabia?

QUESTION: No, I am asking why, in your opinion, the U.S. is not succeeding in convincing the Saudis to do some improvements? I mean --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think there's a desperate need for women and foreigners, migrant laborers to be treated as human beings in full in Saudi Arabia, and that is part of the distinct problem there and in a number of the Gulf states. One case is really striking to me, the case of Nour Miyatis, an Indonesian domestic servant, a maid, who was grossly abused in Saudi Arabia. For four years, she's been pursuing legal proceedings, not going home to Indonesia, but sticking it out. She's trying to stick up for her rights under international law. And she had recently her case thrown out in Saudi Arabia. This is a woman who was locked for over a month in a closet by her employer. Her employer refused to treat her medical condition. She got gangrene in her fingers and toes and they had to be amputated. It's pretty obvious.

QUESTION: Loss of her limbs?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah, yeah. All fingers and toes. It's emblematic. But there are a number of problems both of labor trafficking and victimization of women as well. But I hope to visit Saudi Arabia in the coming months and engage all the more.

QUESTION: Yeah, but why you are not succeeding, like you are succeeding in a" with the Emirates? Why with the Saudis you are not --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think it's principally a question of political will on their part, but I'll do mine in terms of serious, quiet dialogue.

Sir.

QUESTION: What are the countries that there are currently sanctions against and what are the nature of those sanctions as a result of this?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, of the Tier 3 countries from last year -- and my staff can help me recall all of them, if I miss some -- some of the countries that have full-scale sanctions include Burma, Cuba. There was actually, in the case of Iran and North Korea, partial sanctions so that some exchange programs or cultural programs or democracy-related assistance would not be blocked. A number of the countries had sanctions waived, from Malaysia that was on Tier 3 last year, has moved up to the Tier 2 Watch List, to this year, a number of countries again on Tier 3. Last year, a number of the Persian Gulf states, because of strategic relationships we have with governments and wanting to sustain dialogue on human trafficking and not having the door shut, had full waivers, based on a decision by the President of the United States.

Sir.

QUESTION: Regarding North Korean victims in northeastern China, Chinese Government (inaudible) seems to be -- provide the traffickers with the a" what kind of leverage, as you said. So what special steps do you think is required?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think one a" one important place to start is for the Chinese authorities to see what they believe their moral and legal obligations are under migration treaties and human rights for the way they treat those who come to China. They are treated legally in China -- that is to say, North Koreans who come there as illegal economic migrants and are sent home. And this creates a double problem. For those who want to victimize North Koreans who come to China, all they have to do is threaten that we are going to, you know, turn you over to the authorities and you are going to get sent home. And so those victims find themselves coerced into doing, you know, the worst of things, including women who ostensibly have been bought and brought into marriage but, in fact, are sex slaves. But moreover, when they do get sent home, they are, you know, truly victimized; I mean, you are a victim leaving North Korea, you are victimized in human trafficking and then victimized and sent home. That's a pretty gory situation. It demands the attention of the international community.

Anyone else?

I just want to say a word, if I can, about the effort that comes together before this report. It's a momentous effort. We have tried as hard as we can to get this annual report to come out at the same time as a report on U.S. efforts at home that the Department of Justice pulls together. So we can answer the question: Do you grade yourselves? Just yesterday, a report was delivered to Congress and it's in synch with this, so that when we produce CD-ROMs for international distribution, there will be an assessment of what the United States is doing, including a self-critical set of recommendations.

This report would never come together without a team of reports officers who travel the globe and do their very best to get the most serious empirical data. That team is led by Mark Taylor. Much of the creativity of this report in raising themes is shaped by Mark Taylor and that team. And I also want to thank Eleanor Gaetan, our senior coordinator for public affairs who helped shape this report and it becoming, as I have learned going to UN meetings, a tremendous source of international public awareness. There is nothing like this report. This is not crowing; it's just a fact. There is no NGO report and there is no UN report on human trafficking that makes this kind of assessment, and this has become more and more enlightening each year. I commend it to you. Thanks.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 States News Service

91 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 4, 2008 Wednesday

THE 2008 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 4147 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

MODERATOR: All right. Thanks, everyone. Welcome to the Foreign Press Center this afternoon. It's our pleasure to host today the Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Ambassador Mark Lagon. He's going to make a brief statement about the 2008 TIP report and then we're going to have time for your questions and answers. So without further delay, let me introduce Ambassador Lagon.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Thank you very much. Good afternoon and thank you all for coming. As you know, this morning, Secretary Rice released the Department's Annual Trafficking In Persons Report. We highlight heroes in each year's report who are - play a key role in combating human trafficking.

And one of the heroes this year, Anas Anas, is a reporter with an independent newspaper who was responsible for breaking two major trafficking rings in the capital city of his country, Ghana, in Accra during the reporting season for this report. Anas Anas worked undercover for eight months exposing the trafficking ring's methods of transportation and the identities of immigration officials who were accepting bribes in return for overlooking fake visas and passports in a trafficking scheme. His undercover work allowed him to collect key evidence that could be used by police to prosecute the traffickers. He displayed great courage as a reporter. In so doing, he's able to act as a voice for the voiceless.

So each of you, I'd note, in your capacity as journalists are uniquely positioned to help raise public awareness about this most pressing injustice of human trafficking that affects the lives of millions globally. So I'm particularly delighted that you're here today.

In virtually every country around the world, including the United States, men, women and children are held in domestic servitude. They're exploited for commercial sex and coerced in work and factories and in sweatshops. In some, children are forcibly recruited as soldiers. These are forms of human trafficking, but more aptly put, these are forms of modern-day slavery. Estimates of the number of victims worldwide vary widely. But according to the U.S. Government, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. Eighty percent of them are female. Some one-half of them are minors. And these figures don't include the millions more who are trafficked for the purposes of labor and sexual exploitation within the national borders of countries.

What's unique about our policy goal of eradicating modern-day slavery is that we have, very much at Congress's direction, a comprehensive tool in the form of the Annual Trafficking in Persons Report that allows us to diagnose the problem and to track progress in confronting it. This year's report covers 170 countries in the world, a new high. 153 were assessed and ranked at Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List and - or Tier 3. Another 17 countries are designated special cases, often because we lack sufficient information to assess whether a significant number of trafficking victims exist in those countries.

In the 2008 TIP Report, as mandated by Congress, there's several essential objectives. To summarize: country-specific information regarding what foreign governments are doing to prosecute traffickers, protect victims, and prevent the crime in the first place. Also, to initiate bilateral engagement with other countries that is ongoing year-round in the form of action plans we developed with other countries for combating trafficking based on the country assessment and the report. Another goal is to assess patterns and trends in human trafficking in order to confront it more intelligently and, frankly speaking, to hold poor performers accountable. Finally, we seek to inspire with, you know, greater determination, creativity and cooperation among governments and anti-trafficking advocates.

As a function of the information collected in compiling the report, we know far more today than we did eight years ago with the first edition, or even three years ago when we began taking a closer look at forced labor practices in addition to sex trafficking.

Let me discuss some of the key trends which emerged in the course of compiling this year's report. Every trend is best exemplified by an individual tragedy because it's truly personal stories that help motivate those who work today to abolish modern-day slavery. Last summer, I met a young Burmese woman, Aye Aye Wynn, who had been recruited to work in the shrimp processing industry in a neighboring country. Together with some 800 other Burmese men, women and children, she was recruited. She was desperate to leave her tortured country. And she described to me the horror at finding herself locked in a factory compound in the middle of the jungle, prevented from leaving, prevented from calling family members by phone, even prevented from eating decently. These workers were not even paid.

Aye Aye Wynn and two others tried to escape. They were hunted down and they were beaten. They were chained to poles in the courtyard of the factory compound, deprived of food and water. Aye Aye Wynn, a vibrant young woman with a beautiful head of hair, tells how that head of hair was completely shorn off as a way of humiliating her before other workers. This wasn't a workplace. It was a forced labor camp. Thankfully, Aye Aye Wynn was rescued. And the good news is that a national police raid saved her and her compatriots.

Around the world, gross examples of forced labor are commonly treated as administrative or regulatory offenses rather than crimes. In this year's TIP report, for the first time, we broke down global and regional law enforcement data to examine progress in sex trafficking and labor trafficking prosecutions. These statistics indicate that only a very small percentage of human trafficking prosecutions and convictions, roughly 10 percent of them, relate to labor trafficking offenses as opposed to sex trafficking offenses. That information, those statistics are on page 37 of the report.

If we're to end the terrible reality of slave labor, all responsible countries must join forces to hold those guilty of this crime accountable. More attention has to be paid to labor trafficking in order to make the stories of vulnerable people like Aye Aye Wynn a part of our past.

One example of an industry in which we are concerned over reports of significant forced labor is Thailand's shrimp processing sector. In Brazil, some charcoal produced in -- by forced labor finds its way into pig iron for export. Over half of the 5,800 slaves rescued by Brazilian authorities over the last year were found on sugar cane plantations as well. Also of deep concern is China, where several slave labor scandals have recently been uncovered. Some of the cases reportedly involve the complicity of Chinese law enforcement officials. All governments must act to ensure that the cheap and efficient production of export goods doesn't come at the expense of the basic dignity and rights of citizens.

Another trend: the weak protection of sex trafficking victims. Last winter in Bucharest, I met in a shelter two young Romanian women, sex trafficking survivors, Anca and Silvia. They'd been trafficked separately to Western Europe and they wound up together in a shelter and they were repatriated back home. Both women clearly had the look of traumatized people. They clung to each other. And later when I returned to the United States, I learned from the NGO caring for them that they discovered that Anca had advanced TB and Silvia had severe syphilis. Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were even repatriated to Romania? Time lost made their conditions worse.

Despite increased attention on law enforcement for sex trafficking, we don't see significant improvement in victim protection and services provided worldwide. This trend has to be reversed or we'll never be able to have significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized have to be restored to their full humanity. We've highlighted in the report a number of vulnerable groups: North Koreans in China, Burmese in Thailand, stateless people, low-skilled migrant workers, in particular, and foreign domestic workers.

One of the most common and desperate faces of modern-day slavery is that of the domestic servant, locked and abused in a private home or apartment, cut off from the rest of the world. And truth be told, one of the highest profiled cases in the United States this year involved two Indonesian maids trapped in a nightmare in a mansion in Long Island, New York. Victims of involuntary domestic servitude are often exploited sexually as well as for their labor.

We're beginning to see glimmers of recognition among governments that this is an extraordinarily vulnerable population. For instance, the Philippines is a major source of female domestic workers. It recently decided to impose a ban on new maids going to one particular East Asian country because there are an extremely high number of Filipina maids who escape regularly from the confines of abusive employers, only to seek shelter in the Embassy of the Philippines. This development signifies a growing resolve on the part of the Government of the Philippines to confront exploitation.

Governments must start treating this form of slavery as a serious crime. Labor recruiters or brokers facilitate trafficking through deceitful work offers, contract fraud, and sometimes outright force and coercion. And they must be prosecuted, they must be punished with jail sentences.

In past reports, we've also identified countries where foreign workers are exploited through force, fraud and coercion. And we've placed a number of these countries on the lowest tier, Tier 3. This year's report sheds more light on recruiters. Some of those recruiters are licensed by the state, such as in Vietnam, and they often start the chain of trafficking in these labor source countries by using fraudulent offers, offers of employment that are bogus. And they levy excessive recruitment fees on people desperate for a better life, which translate into debt bondage in the end.

Vietnam and Indonesia are key labor source countries in this regard. We've seen specific cases of workers from each of these countries trapped into trafficking schemes abroad through a predatory practice of labor recruiters in their own countries. To address this new phenomenon, the report includes recommendations for preventive steps that can be taken by labor source and labor destination governments. I really want to highlight this for you. On pages 16 and 17 of the report are these strategies for fighting the - closing the window of vulnerability for migrant laborers.

So there are a number of themes here. A couple of them that I'd highlight are the fact that labor trafficking is not seeing enough punishment of the perpetrators and sex trafficking shows a situation of an emphasis on law enforcement and immigration approaches, but a failure to follow through on helping the victims, to find those victims, and to restore their dignity.

Running through the report overall, one sees a seam. And indeed, it's a seam in all of the U.S. Government's work on human trafficking, including the $530 million the United States has contributed to international anti-trafficking efforts over the last seven years. And that seam is the demand for labor trafficking and for sex trafficking. Increasingly, we're scrutinizing products to see if they're tainted by slave labor. Without confronting demand, we can't end slavery today. Demand is pulling victims into sex trafficking and labor trafficking and it's not being adequately addressed. In the area of sex trafficking, demand can be seen in the form of males buying brides from less developed communities, with intent of abusing them or exploiting them, of men traveling abroad to buy children for sex, and of men exploiting women, prostituted by pimps. And in the area of slave labor demand is seen in the race to the bottom for cheap labor and the ability to produce cheaper export goods.

Since the TIP report is organized around the performance of individual countries, let me highlight a few strong and weak performers and the rationale for how we've assessed each.

In Africa, moving up to Tier 1 for the first time, Madagascar proved this year that anti-trafficking progress can be achieved with political will even absent substantial economic resources. Madagascar emerged as a leader among sub-Saharan African countries. On the other hand, Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time. It reflected its government's failure to tackle trafficking-related corruption. It's seen in the handling of several high profile cases of complicity by government officials. That failure to deal with corruption was a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall. We're hopeful the newly appointed government will take significant steps to address complicity, and while they're at it improve law enforcement and victim protection.

An important development is that Mexico has moved up to Tier 2. It is an assessment based on the enactment of a comprehensive new anti-trafficking law, funds being appropriated by Mexico's legislature for victim shelters, a commitment of Attorney General Medina Mora, and unified efforts by superb civil society actors, many of whom I've met with in three parts of Mexico and two trips I've made over the last year. Such developments are rays of hope in Mexico and are evidence of a new political will to grapple with human trafficking. And I'm quiet hopeful that Mexico will continue to further improve in the coming year.

For at least four years now, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been a matter of great concern and disappointment. And in particular, Saudi Arabia is ranked Tier 3 for the fourth time in a row.

As an update, I'd like to report on one success story that is a model for the region: the United Arab Emirates, which, for the second year in a row, was upgraded this year to Tier 2 based on having passed the first comprehensive law in human trafficking in the region last year, and now using that law to go after perpetrators of sex trafficking, and to outfit victim shelters.

No briefing on human trafficking would be complete without raising the situation in two particular countries that are larger populace and with unique situations in human trafficking, and that's China and India. China has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years. On the upside, there were prosecutions of perpetrators and a national action plan launched by the government of China. But overall, there were insufficient efforts to protect both Chinese and foreign nationals from being victims of trafficking.

In China, women and girls from North Korea are particularly at risk. Fleeing the repressive regime in their homeland, as well as poor social and economic conditions, they seek refuge in China. But many are then preyed upon by Chinese traffickers who sell them into sexual servitude as wives or into prostitution. When Chinese authorities find these trafficking victims, they often send them back to North Korea where they face harsh punishment; that is, in effect, punishment of the victim.

India has made some efforts that are positive on the child labor front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labor Minister Oscar Fernandes joined a raid recently. However, India still doesn't recognize the degree to which bonded labor as a substantial human trafficking problem in its country. It has weak anticorruption efforts and prosecutions are too few.

So in conclusion, we continue to shed light on global trends that are emerging. And importantly, we are steadfast in an offer to nations that wish to partner with us to fight human trafficking. It's some 200 years since the transatlantic slave trade was abolished, and I think we can take tangible steps further to abolishing the slavery that exists today. We need to remain committed to be the voice for the voiceless, for the advocate - I mean, the advocates for the prostituted woman or child, for the exploited domestic worker, for the trapped agricultural laborer. Their bondage demands our attention. It demands our action.

I do want to emphasize that I appreciate the increasing cooperation I see from our allies, from governments, from NGOs, from church organizations, and private citizens. They are making real strides to prevent trafficking in persons and real strides to deal with the immediate, moral imperative of helping victims reclaim their lives and self respect.

And before I take some questions, I just want to note that the work of the report is by no means the work of one person. We have a broad team. The team of officers who are specialists on regions of the world is here with us. If you have follow-up questions after this, they'd be quite willing to talk and share their expertise. But led by Mark Taylor, the section of our Office on Reports and Political Affairs pours themselves into this report to produce the most credible, solid, substantiated, objective assessment of human trafficking in the world. And there is nothing like it. This is not in modesty; there is no NGO report, there is no UN report that covers the human trafficking scene in every country like this.

I also want to thank Eleanor Gaetan of our public outreach section for her leadership in making this a public awareness document for the world, not just a report to Congress.

So I welcome your questions.

MODERATOR: Thanks very much. If you have questions, please remember to state your name and media organization and wait for the microphone. Here in the front.

QUESTION: Thank you. Sonia Schott with Radio Valera in Venezuela. I have three ones. The first one, why is the United States not included in the same report? The second one is regarding the law enforcement that is up to the foreign governments to provide you with the information, so how reliable is this source, considering you mentioned corruption at the beginning of your remarks. And the third one is on Venezuela. Venezuela is Tier 2 Watch List -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's moved up.

QUESTION: Yeah. So is this good news for Venezuela, or what that means? Could you please elaborate a little bit more on that? Thank you.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: I would have to say these are all three superb questions, but they all deserve time.

So, first, I'm glad you asked about the United States assessing itself. First of all, starting last year and again this year, there is a profile of the United States in this report that matches those of other countries that looks at what the United States is doing to prosecute the exploiters, to protect the victims, and to prevent the problem in the first place.

Now, we don't give ourselves a tier assessment, but one thing that I think is important is that we have started giving to Congress and making available to the public an annual self-assessment of the United States that doesn't just tell the good news, but that identifies areas for improvement. Just yesterday, this annual report was sent to Congress. This is last year's and we'll have available very soon the one for this year. As we circulate our international report around the world on CD-ROM, we will put that assessment of the United States on it.

I think it's deeply important that the United States be accountable for what it's doing to fight the problem at home, and we've done quite a bit. I know this because I chair our interagency committee on our domestic and international efforts. But I will be very frank about those areas for improvement, but I commend to you that report that lays out some recommendations.

Now, on law enforcement data, Congress directs us to ask for very specific information about investigations, about prosecutions, about convictions and about sentences. And we tussle with our friends around the world to ask them for information. And I reassure them, as I have with diplomats here in the United States and with government officials in capitals around the world, that we don't just ask for that data so that we can write a critical report. To have comprehensive data of how you are doing in attacking the problem of human trafficking is a sign of a government having a dedicated effort and seeing this as a specific crime. That data is not perfect. It's gotten better each and every year. There are countries that don't share data with us or share it imperfectly, from China to Iran to Cuba.

But we do believe that the kind of data on prosecutions and convictions that's through the report and that is collected together on page 37 with totals, that's where we've learned that only one-tenth of the prosecutions and convictions are in the area of labor trafficking, that those are the best compiled data that we've had to date and it's based on a very serious effort by U.S. diplomats.

Now, with respect to Venezuela, it's been upgraded. There has been some improvement. And this report is designed to be objective. We do not sit in the State Department and decide which countries we have broad criticisms on human rights for or that we have difficult and tense relationships with, and then just punish those that that's the case.

There are manifold problems of political pluralism and human rights in Venezuela, but truth be told, there have been some modest but real improvements in Venezuela that merit Tier 2 Watch List ranking, not a highly complimentary ranking but an improved one, including strengthening the statutory framework to fight human trafficking, notably for those who are internally trafficked within the country. There have been some investigations into human trafficking that have been opened in Caracas and increased police work at airports and border points. However, victims' services are limited and there are no dedicated trafficking in persons shelters. So there's good and there's bad, but there is evidence of modest improvement, and we try and tell it like it is.

MODERATOR: I think we have an additional question from New York, if you'd please state your name and media organization and ask your question.

QUESTION: Yes, my name is Diego Senior. I work with Caracol Radio for Colombia. It's basically the same question regarding about Venezuela, but for Colombia. Can you elaborate more about the things that you need to be improved, not only in our country in Colombia but in the rest of Latin America, maybe mentioning specific cases in order to - well, according to your report?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's a very good question. Colombia is an exemplar within Latin America. Is it Tier 1. Tier 1 countries aren't perfect, but they meet what are called the minimum standards for combating human trafficking in the U.S. law that governs how we prepare the report. There are strong law enforcement efforts, sustained prosecution efforts in Colombia, investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and an effort to count how - count and track how prosecutions are going with a database. There's cooperation with foreign governments to fight human trafficking. For victim protection, the Colombian Government has been increasing funding for NGOs.

There are some areas of improvement that are needed, particularly the need for a formal mechanism to identify human trafficking victims among vulnerable populations. Vulnerable populations are people in prostitution or people who are in migrant labor sectors. So that's the picture. Not perfect, but an exemplar.

Through the region, one sees both the problem of sex trafficking and the problem of forced labor. I guess I'd like to emphasize in the region one big case, Brazil. There is reason for some praise. President Lula has identified by name the problem as it is, slavery, in Brazil. And Brazil identifies companies that have not taken steps to improve their accountability of their supply chains. However, there remains a significant problem, particularly in the area of forced labor, in the sector in which charcoal is used to make pig iron for export. And notably, the situation in Brazil is captured by the success of rescuing 5,800 people in slave labor, and yet - and we learned that half of those are in the sugarcane plantations for the purpose of ethanol. So in the growing sector of biofuels, clearly, there's a forced labor effort. And there's a problem one sees in Brazil, and that is that of those cases of 5,800 victims, there is no associated criminal prosecutions for a single trafficker associated with those freed slaves.

MODERATOR: Other questions? Any final questions from New York? No other questions.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Happy to make myself available over the next couple of days if you have follow-up questions or your colleagues do.

MODERATOR: Well, then thank you very much. Thank you, Ambassador.

LOAD-DATE: June 6, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 States News Service

92 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 4, 2008

Speeches: Briefing on the Release of the Eighth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE

LENGTH: 5670 words

Speeches: Briefing on the Release of the Eighth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report

Tue, 03 Jun 2008

Briefing on the Release of the Eighth Annual Trafficking in Persons Report

Ambassador Mark P. Lagon, Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Washington, DC

June 4, 2008

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Thank you very much, Madame Secretary. Good morning. Secretary Rice has aptly summarized why the U.S. Government is dedicated to ending human trafficking, a deeply dehumanizing form of exploitation. In virtually every country around the world, including the United States, men, women and children are held in domestic servitude, exploited for commercial sex, coerced into work in factories and sweatshops. In some, children are forcibly recruited as soldiers.

These are forms of human trafficking. They are, in fact, forms of modern-day slavery. Estimates of the number of victims vary widely. According to the U.S. intelligence community, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. About 80 percent of them are female. Up to half are minors. These figures do not include millions who are trafficked for purposes of labor and sexual exploitation within national borders as well.

What's unique about our policy goal of eradicating modern-day slavery is that we have, very much at Congress's direction, a comprehensive tool: The Annual Trafficking In Persons Report, which allows us to diagnose the problem and track progress. This year's report covers 170 countries: 153 are assessed and ranked into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3; another 17 countries are considered special cases, often because we lack sufficient information to assess whether a significant number of trafficking victims exist in those countries.

In the 2008 TIP Report, as mandated by Congress, we have several essential objectives addressed. To summarize: the country-specific information regarding what foreign governments are doing to prosecute traffickers, to protect victims and to prevent the crime; to initiate bilateral engagement, ongoing year-round in terms of action plans for combating trafficking in persons developed on the basis of each country assessment; to assess patterns and trends in human trafficking in order to confront it more intelligently and to hold poor performers to account; and finally, to inspire greater determination, creativity, and cooperation among governments and anti-trafficking advocates. As a function of the information collected in compiling this document, we know far more today than we did eight years ago with the first edition, or even three years ago, when, for example, we started taking a closer look at forced labor practices.

Let me discuss some of the key trends which emerged in the course of compiling this year's report. Every trend is best exemplified by an individual tragedy because it's truly these personal stories of anguish that motivate contemporary abolitionists in dealing with contemporary slavery. Last summer, I met a young Burmese woman, Aye Aye Wynn. She had been recruited to work in a shrimp processing sector of a neighboring country to Burma, together with 800 other Burmese men, women and children. Desperate to leave her country, Aye Aye Wynn described her horror to me at finding herself locked in a factory compound in the middle of a jungle, prevented from leaving or calling family by phone, or even eating decently. She and her Burmese brethren weren't even paid.

Aye Aye and two others tried to escape. They were hunted down and beaten. They were chained to poles in the middle of the courtyard of the factory compound and they were deprived of food and water. Aye Aye's hair was shaved as a tool of humiliation before the other workers. This wasn't a workplace. It was a forced labor camp. Thankfully, Aye Aye was rescued, and the good news is that the national police raid saved her and her compatriots. Around the world, gross examples of forced labor are commonly treated as mere administrative matters or regulatory offenses rather than despicable crimes.

In this year's TIP Report, for the first time, we broke down global and regional law enforcement data to examine progress in sex trafficking or labor trafficking prosecutions. You'll find that on page 37 of the report. These statistics indicate that only a very small percentage of human trafficking prosecutions are convictions. Roughly 10 percent of them relate to labor trafficking offenses as compared to prosecutions and convictions related to sex trafficking offenses.

If we're to end the terrible reality of slave labor, all responsible countries must join forces to hold those guilty of this crime accountable. More attention must be paid to labor trafficking in order to make the stories of vulnerable people like Aye Aye Wynn a part of our past. One example of an industry in which we are concerned over reports of significant forced labor is Thailand shrimp processing and that sector. But in other cases, in Brazil, some charcoal is produced by forced labor and some of that charcoal may be used to produce pig iron. Over half of the 5,800 slaves rescued by Brazilian authorities were found on sugarcane plantations.

Also of concern is China, where several slave labor scandals have recently been uncovered. Some of the cases reportedly involve the complicity of Chinese law enforcement officials themselves. All governments must act to ensure that cheap and efficient production of export goods does not come at the expense of the very dignity and fundamental rights of citizens.

Last winter, in a Bucharest shelter for sex trafficking survivors, I met two young Romanian women, Anca and Silvia. They had been trafficked separately to Western Europe and wound up together in a shelter and they were repatriated from there back home. Both women had the clear look of traumatized people. They clung to each other. Just a few days after we met in Romania, the NGO caring for them discovered that Anca had advanced TB and that Silvia had severe syphilis. Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were repatriated? The time lost made their conditions immensely worse.

Despite increased attention by law enforcement to sex trafficking, we are not seeing, as the findings of this report, significant improvement in victim protection and victim services provided. This trend has to be reversed or we'll never be able to help significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized must be restored to their full humanity.

This report focuses on a number of vulnerable groups. They include North Koreans in China, Burmese in Thailand, stateless people, low-skilled migrant workers in general, and foreign domestic workers. One of the most common and desperate faces of modern day slavery is the domestic servant, locked and abused in a private home or apartment, cut off from the rest of the world. One of the highest profile cases in the U.S. this year involved two Indonesian maids who were trapped in a nightmare in a mansion in Long Island, New York. Victims of involuntary domestic servitude are often exploited sexually as well as exploited for their labor.

We're beginning to see, however, glimmers of recognition among governments that this is an extraordinarily vulnerable population. For instance, the Philippines is a major source of female domestic workers. It recently decided to impose a ban on new maids going to one particular destination country because of the extremely high number of Filipino maids who were regularly escaping from the confines of abusive employers and seeking shelter in the Philippines Embassy. This development signifies a growing resolve on the part of the government to confront exploitation. Governments must start treating this form of slavery as a serious crime. Labor recruiters and brokers who facilitate trafficking through deceitful work offers, contract fraud, and outright force and coercion, they need to be prosecuted and punished with jail sentences.

In past reports, we've identified countries where foreign workers are exploited to force, fraud, and coercion, and have placed some of these countries on the lowest tier of the report, Tier 3. This year's report sheds more light on recruiters, some of whom are licensed by the state, and who often start the chain of trafficking in these labor source countries by fraudulent offers of employment and then excessive recruitment fees that later translate into debt bondage.

Vietnam and Indonesia are key labor source countries in this regard. We've seen specific cases of workers from each of these countries trapped into trafficking schemes abroad through the predatory practice of labor recruiters in their own countries. To address this new phenomena, the report includes recommendations for preventive steps that can be taken by both labor source and labor destination governments. These strategies are enumerated on page 16 and 17 of the report's introduction.

I've highlighted five trends: weak prosecution of labor trafficking offenses; secondly, weak trafficking victim protection; third, forced labor creeping into new growth industries; fourth, domestic servitude, and luckily, the problems there are gaining recognition; and fifth, closing a window of vulnerability for migrant workers as an imperative.

But running through this report, in fact, running through much of the U.S. Government's anti-trafficking work is a new focus, encouraged by Congress, on the factors that create demand for labor and sexual exploitation. Increasingly, we're scrutinizing products to see if they are tainted by slave labor. Without confronting this demand, we cannot end slavery today.

Demand is also pulling victims into sex and labor trafficking, but it's not being adequately addressed. As for demand for sex trafficking, it can be seen in the form of males seeking to buy brides from less developed communities with the intent of abusing and exploiting these women, or men traveling abroad to buy children for sex, or men exploiting women, prostituted by pimps. Demand for slave labor is seen broadly in the race to the bottom for cheap labor to produce cheaper export goods.

Since the TIP Report is organized around the performance of individual countries, let me highlight a few strong and weak performers and the rationale for the assessment of each. Moving up to Tier 1, for the first time, Madagascar proved this year that anti-trafficking progress can be achieved with will, despite minimal resources. It's emerged as a leader among sub-Saharan African countries.

Meanwhile, Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time, reflecting its government's failure to tackle trafficking related corruption as reflected in the handling of several high profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking. This failure created a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall. Now, we're hopeful that the newly appointed government in Moldova will take significant steps to address complicity by government officials and, furthermore, to improve law enforcement and victim protection efforts. We'll be engaging with them for that.

Among the news items here, Mexico has moved up to Tier 2, because of important developments over the reporting year, including a comprehensive new anti-trafficking law, funds appropriated by the legislature in Mexico for victim shelters, a demonstrably committed attorney general, and unified efforts of some superb civil society actors. Such developments are rays of hope in Mexico and evidence of a new political will that promises to yield even further improvement in this coming year.

For the last four years, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been a matter of great concern and disappointment. Saudi Arabia, for example, is ranked Tier 3 for the fourth time. As an update, I'm happy to report that the United Arab Emirates and Bahrain continue to make significant improvements; notably the United Arab Emirates as a model in the region.

No briefing on human trafficking would be complete without raising the situation in two countries with huge populations and unique trafficking profiles: China and India. China has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years. While there have been prosecutions of perpetrators of human trafficking and a national action plan was launched, there are insufficient efforts to protect Chinese and foreign victims of trafficking. In China, women and girls from North Korea are particularly at risk. Fleeing the repressive regime in their homeland, as well as poor social and economic conditions, these North Koreans seek refuge in China. But many are preyed upon by Chinese traffickers who sell them into sexual servitude as "wives" - with quotation marks around wives - or into prostitution. When Chinese authorities find these trafficking victims, they'd often send them back to North Korea where they face harsh punishment. The victims are punished rather than cared for.

India has made efforts on the child labor front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labor Minister Oscar Fernandes joined in a raid. But India still doesn't recognize bonded labor as human trafficking. It has weak anticorruption efforts and prosecutions are too few.

To conclude, as we continue to shed light on emerging global trends for trafficking in persons, we're steadfast in our support to countries who are willing to partner with us in this global fight. Just as the transatlantic slave trade was abolished 200 years ago, slavery today can be abolished again. Let's remain committed to act as a voice for the many voiceless victims of human trafficking: an advocate for the prostituted woman or child, the exploited domestic worker, the trapped agricultural laborer. Their bondage demands our attention and action.

Finally, let me take this opportunity to state how much good work I've seen throughout the year since I last stood here a year ago. And I want to tell you how much I personally appreciate the increasing cooperation of our allies, governments, NGOs, church organizations, and private citizens around the world who are making real strides to prevent trafficking in persons and to help victims reclaim their lives and self respect.

I'd welcome your questions.

QUESTION: You spoke a little bit about slave labor camps that have been uncovered in China. Have you found that any products destined for the Olympic Games have been tainted by slave labor, to use your word" And then I had a question - a follow-up thing on Venezuela. They appear to have actually improved this year.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm. First of all, any time that there's a major sporting event, whether it be, you know, World Cup soccer or the biggest of all, the Olympics, one has to be concerned about the massive construction work possibly being subject to human trafficking exploitation and a spike in commercial sexual exploitation.

With respect to China, I actually would say we have to look at the general situation of human rights that we're - the world is called upon to look at as the Olympic Games are coming together. It's 19 years ago today that the Tiananmen Square massacre occurred. And there's a lot of focus on human rights, in general, in China as the Olympics are about to occur.

But we need to recognize that there is a problem of human trafficking that's not specific to the Olympics occurring, but the Olympics brings attention to. There has been examples of people caught in slavery in brick kilns and, in fact, resold to other kilns by government officials who are corrupt, been a case recently documented of children who were trafficked to Guangdong Province and were involved in the worst forms of child labor, having been brought from Dongguan. There's credible evidence of Uighurs, who are moved from --

QUESTION: I'm sorry, of who?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Of Uighur Muslims who have moved from Xinjiang to other parts of China. And most notably, as I emphasized in my opening remarks, North Koreans are subject to re-victimization, because they flee a country in which they face repression and an economic chaos caused by their own government. And whether as bought wives or as workers in the Northeast of China, they have been subject to human trafficking and the worst kind of leverage that could be held over their head, the threat that they'd be sent back to North Korea only to be punished severely by their government.

QUESTION: But specifically, has there been anything that you can point to that would indicate that the Olympic Games has actually increased the number of people in forced labor or - because there's a need for more product, et cetera, et cetera?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: As I don't have tangible evidence, I don't want to overreach. But any time that there's a substantial building boom and construction, and a vulnerability to massive prostitution designed to service people from abroad, there's a possibility. But I would direct you to thinking about the longstanding vulnerability to human trafficking in China. China is not only a government that does not protect the liberties of its people, but it manifestly is a government that doesn't protect its own citizens and foreign nationals from human trafficking.

QUESTION: And on Venezuela?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah. Venezuela has actually moved up this year. And I hope it's a tribute to the objectivity of our report. We don't sit in the upper levels of this building and decide which countries are generally human rights abusers or with whom we have problematic relationships, and then determine that they get a lousy ranking in this report. Venezuela has taken some steps: passing a law to prohibit internal trafficking of women and girls, opening up some investigations of human trafficking. There remain problems, including limited victim services and no shelters for victims. So it's a mixed bag. But truth be told, they don't belong in the lowest category any longer.

QUESTION: Speaking about the objectivity of the report, there are special cases where you don't have enough information. But Iran is on the Tier 3, and you don't have any embassy in Iran, any relations with Iran for 30 years. So how - on what do you base your information -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, we - just as Iran is included in the Annual Human Rights Report and is a serious case to examine, we feel that Iran needs to be assessed with a ranking in this report. Yes, it's a limitation that we have only so much information. But that's a limitation more based on the closed nature of the Iranian Government than the lack of diplomatic representation of the United States.

I want to say that we try to be very serious about getting evidence. Truthfully, we prod other governments quite hard to give us evidence and data. Congress requires us to tell them about investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and sentences, as well as numbers of trafficking victims found and helped. And we insist on having a baseline as best we can. There are some limits on the information that we got from the Government of Iran. But the picture is pretty clear, one of serious human trafficking.

Elise.

QUESTION: Can you talk a little bit more about the idea that slave labor is fueling some of these booming industries in these developing countries and the idea that the United States is increasing trade with these countries" We're relying on some of the products that are fueling these industries. And how much demand is fueling it and whether there should be stricter, kind of, I guess what you say, export controls or import controls on these types of things?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's been the law --

QUESTION: I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Okay, we'll come back to you. It's been a law for 78 years under the 1938 Tariff and Trade Act that products of slave labor are not permitted into the country. It's a matter of implementation. We need to identify those products that are indeed produced by slave labor. My colleagues at ICE, at DHS, are eager and energetic in their efforts internationally to try and run that down.

We don't want to suggest that all imports from a country are tainted by slave labor when there is evidence of some. I myself have seen in Thailand those who were subjected to slave labor conditions in the shrimp processing sector. That doesn't mean all shrimp that comes into the United States from Thailand is tainted, but there's a distinct possibility; it's something we need to look out for.

We need to think about growing trends. I'll call attention to the profile of Brazil, which is doing a good deal proactively to rescue victims of forced labor, even calling them by the name they deserve, slaves, based on commitment by President Lula. But as it says right here in the report, approximately half of the nearly 6,000 men freed from slave labor in 2007 were found exploited on plantations growing sugarcane for the production of ethanol - a growing trend.

We need to pay attention to this, and there is consumer power, the best kind of market force, to ask the question: Are supply chains clean?

QUESTION: I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: One quick follow-up?

QUESTION: It kind of follows up on that. But China and India, you said that they've been on the Tier 2 Watch List for the last four - for the last four years. And you say that, you know, it's not based on who we have a bad relationship with that we give them a bad grade, but what about the countries that we're trying to have a good relationship with, we have a growing economic relationship with" I mean, how come neither one of those countries has made it to Tier 3? My understanding is there's been a lot of debate within the Administration about whether they should be listed.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: The Tier 2 Watch List should not be a permanent status. It's - I think it was designed by Congress to highlight - there's some countries in Tier 2 that are in danger of potentially ending up on Tier 3. You know, there are some countries that just deserve to be in this new category that was created between Tier 2 and Tier 3. It's my judgment that Russia, for instance, really doesn't belong in Tier 2 and it really doesn't belong in Tier 3. This is the right call.

With respect to India and China, these are both very serious cases. We're quite blunt in the report. Frankly, we're quite blunt in our extensive diplomatic dialogue with these countries. There are some positive developments in each. In India, there's been an effort to focus on rescuing victims both in sex trafficking and in child labor, but as far as prosecutions across the board, as far as fighting corruption as a facilitator of human trafficking and in particular a recognition that bonded labor is extensive and a human trafficking problem, it remains a serious situation.

QUESTION: So you feel comfortable that they're still on Tier 2 Watch List?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Indeed, indeed. And with respect to China, while they have made some progress in law enforcement on a national action plan, there remain a number of problems that I've enumerated earlier that deserve serious attention.

Sir.

QUESTION: Can you elaborate more on the Arab states? You've talked about progress in UAE and Bahrain, and Saudi Arabia is still in the Tier 3. Are you considering imposing sanctions on Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, all countries that are on Tier 3, according to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of the year 2000 that created the office I direct and mandated the report, all countries in Tier 3 are subject to sanctions. The sanctions cannot be limitations on trade promotion assistance or humanitarian - purely humanitarian assistance.

Every year, approximately the 1st of September, a decision is made by the U.S. Government about whether to subject the countries under Tier 3 to full sanctions, or to use a full or partial waiver. And considerations are made about whether we're going to advance our diplomacy with countries to actually get them to change on human trafficking, and our general national interests are taken into account.

And there are a number of times where we try and use this as a surgical tool, where, for instance, we feel that we could get cultural exchanges or democracy programs funded if we have a partial waiver. But I must say that I think we've gotten the attention of a number of the Persian Gulf states, and I think even more than the blunt words of the United States or potential sanctions, as a model that one sees in the region of the United Arab Emirates dealing with the problem of children as jockeys and then putting in place a law on human trafficking that it's now using to prosecute sex traffickers and (inaudible) victims.

But you know, these countries care about the rankings. You know, I've seen the diplomats and officials of these countries in their capitals and here in Washington, and the prospect of moving up from Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List and a reassessment that occurs in August for the Tier 3 countries, and the prospect of moving up in each year is something they very much care about.

QUESTION: Yes, I'd like to return to Mexico for a moment.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm.

QUESTION: You had commended Mexico on improving its efforts in human trafficking and you emphasized that one way to solve this problem that's very important is to make sure that governments prosecute - or make arrests, prosecute and convict people for these crimes. I've been reporting on the State Department's non-natural death report for 2005-2007, specifically the 128 homicides that have taken place in Mexico, and I have been unable to get information on exactly that from the State Department; in other words, the arrest, prosecution and conviction. Is it just trafficking that they follow up on, not - why wouldn't homicides or other events in sort of -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: A lot of violent crime, particularly connected to organized crime both in drugs and human trafficking, that persists in Mexico. It's by no means a rosy situation in terms of law enforcement. I can't speak specifically to that information, although I can try and help get that for you. But in Mexico, it's the step of will that's being shown, and the legislative branch and the executive branch coming together to pass a comprehensive law and some appearance that they intend to use that law. Because that is the key here. We see states that move up when they pass a comprehensive law, and then sometimes we see they don't implement those laws. On some of those first steps I've been very impressed. The Attorney General Medina Mora, who has appointed Guadalupe Morfin as his point woman on human trafficking, I've spent some time with her at a UN conference on human trafficking, consulting about how she'll attack this problem. I'm delighted to see the Mexican authorities are going to use appropriations from their legislature to take some mansions seized from drug traffickers and turn them into shelters for human trafficking victims.

In the back.

QUESTION: On Cuba, please. What are you doing on the situation of trafficking in Cuba, and what are you doing about (inaudible) under Raul Castro regime?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, there continues to be a problem for human trafficking in Cuba. Earlier, I was asked a question about Iran. This is also a situation in which the government is not exactly forthcoming to the United States about data. There are some efforts to raise awareness in Cuba for women who might fall into sex trafficking, and there are some efforts that the Cubans make in combination with British NGOs to try and deal with children who are, you know, sexually exploited. But in general, there seems to be denial and weak victim assistance, when it comes to human trafficking. One hopes there'll be change in Cuba, but I don't see evidence to date that the modest transition that has taken place politically in Cuba has changed the situation markedly.

Sir.

QUESTION: Yes. You said the Saudis are on Tier 3 since the beginning - the establishing of the report?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: They've been on Tier 3 for four years, is it? Yeah, about four years now.

QUESTION: You have been establishing the reports since the eight years. This is the eighth year, right?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Correct.

QUESTION: And the Saudis are in Tier 3 since the beginning?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: And the Saudis - I can - and by the way, a helpful addition to the report last year was a tracking chart. And in the profile of every country, it indicates every ranking it has received since the beginning. Saudi Arabia was Tier 3, 2001 and 2002. It came up to Tier 2, when there was no Tier 2 Watch List, both in 2003 and 2004. And since 2005, it has remained on Tier 3.

QUESTION: And why -- sorry.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Go ahead. Were you going to ask me about the situation in Saudi Arabia?

QUESTION: No, I'm asking why, in your opinion, the U.S. is not succeeding in convincing the Saudis to do some improvements" I mean --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think there's a desperate need for women and foreigners, migrant laborers to be treated as human beings in full in Saudi Arabia, and that is part of the distinct problem there and in a number of the Gulf states. One case is really striking to me, the case of Nour Miyatis, an Indonesian domestic servant, a maid, who was grossly abused in Saudi Arabia. For four years, she's been pursuing legal proceedings, not going home to Indonesia, but sticking it out. She's trying to stick up for her rights under international law. And she had recently her case thrown out in Saudi Arabia. This is a woman who was locked for over a month in a closet by her employer. Her employer refused to treat her medical condition. She got gangrene in her fingers and toes and they had to be amputated. It's pretty obvious.

QUESTION: Loss of her limbs?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah, yeah. All fingers and toes. It's emblematic. But there are a number of problems both of labor trafficking and victimization of women as well. But I hope to visit Saudi Arabia in the coming months and engage all the more.

QUESTION: Yeah, but why you are not succeeding, like you are succeeding in - with the Emirates" Why with the Saudis you are not --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think it's principally a question of political will on their part, but I'll do mine in terms of serious, quiet dialogue.

Sir.

QUESTION: What are the countries that there are currently sanctions against and what are the nature of those sanctions as a result of this?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, of the Tier 3 countries from last year -- and my staff can help me recall all of them, if I miss some -- some of the countries that have full-scale sanctions include Burma, Cuba. There was actually, in the case of Iran and North Korea, partial sanctions so that some exchange programs or cultural programs or democracy-related assistance would not be blocked. A number of the countries had sanctions waived, from Malaysia that was on Tier 3 last year, has moved up to the Tier 2 Watch List, to this year, a number of countries again on Tier 3. Last year, a number of the Persian Gulf states, because of strategic relationships we have with governments and wanting to sustain dialogue on human trafficking and not having the door shut, had full waivers, based on a decision by the President of the United States.

Sir.

QUESTION: Regarding North Korean victims in northeastern China, Chinese Government (inaudible) seems to be -- provide the traffickers with the - what kind of leverage, as you said. So what special steps do you think is required?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think one - one important place to start is for the Chinese authorities to see what they believe their moral and legal obligations are under migration treaties and human rights for the way they treat those who come to China. They're treated legally in China -- that is to say, North Koreans who come there - as illegal economic migrants and are sent home. And this creates a double problem. For those who want to victimize North Koreans who come to China, all they have to do is threaten that we're going to, you know, turn you over to the authorities and you're going to get sent home. And so those victims find themselves coerced into doing, you know, the worst of things, including women who ostensibly have been bought and brought into marriage but, in fact, are sex slaves. But moreover, when they do get sent home, they are, you know, truly victimized; I mean, you're a victim leaving North Korea, you're victimized in human trafficking and then victimized and sent home. That's a pretty gory situation. It demands the attention of the international community.

Anyone else?

I just want to say a word, if I can, about the effort that comes together before this report. It's a momentous effort. We have tried - worked hard to get this annual report to come out at the same time as a report on U.S. efforts at home that the Department of Justice pulls together. So we can answer the question: Do you grade yourselves" Just yesterday, a report was delivered to Congress and it's in synch with this, so that when we produce CD-ROMs for international distribution, there will be an assessment of what the United States is doing, including a self-critical set of recommendations.

This report would never come together without a team of reports officers who travel the globe and do their very best to get the most serious empirical data. That team is led by Mark Taylor. Much of the creativity of this report in raising themes is shaped by Mark Taylor and that team. And I also want to thank Eleanor Gaetan, our senior coordinator for public affairs who helped shape this report and it becoming, as I've learned going to UN meetings, a tremendous source of international public awareness. There is nothing like this report. This is not crowing; it's just a fact. There is no NGO report and there is no UN report on human trafficking that makes this kind of assessment, and this has become more and more enlightening each year. I commend it to you. Thanks.

2008/459

Released on June 4, 2008

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: STD

93 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 4, 2008

Reducing Demand Is Key To Curbing Human Trafficking, U.S. Says; Forced labor gets special focus in the 2008 report on modern-day slavery

BYLINE: Jane Morse, Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM AMERICA.COM AND THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 912 words

Washington -- The demand for cheap labor and sexual services must be addressed to end human trafficking and modern-day slavery, say U.S. officials.

At a June 4 briefing for the release of the State Department's eighth annual Trafficking In Persons Report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the 2008 report, for the first time, examines prosecution data.

She cited one "disturbing discovery" in particular: "Although more countries are addressing sex trafficking through prosecution and convictions, the petty tyrants who exploit their laborers rarely receive serious punishment. We see this as a serious shortcoming, and as we move our efforts forward, we and our allies must remember that a robust law enforcement response is essential."

Ambassador Mark Lagon, the director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said the 2008 report also focuses on forced labor, a form of trafficking in persons.

Lagon recounted instances of workers imprisoned in factories under brutal conditions that could be categorized only as forced labor. Evidence of forced labor is especially strong in Thailand's shrimp-processing industry, he said, and in charcoal production and on sugar plantations in Brazil.

In addition to slave labor in factories, many trafficking victims find themselves enslaved as domestic servants. Lagon said the government of the Philippines has taken steps to prevent workers from accepting domestic employment in certain countries where such enslavement is prevalent. Lagon called on more governments around the world to exercise stronger political will to prevent trafficking.

Lagon said the 2008 report takes a close look at the factors that create demand and at the recruiters of trafficked victims. Such recruiters often establish fees for finding "work" for their "clients" that are so onerous the result is debt bondage. Debt bondage is a form of enslavement in which workers find they never can pay off their debts to win their freedom or the right to keep their wages.

The ambassador also called for more services for the treatment and rehabilitation of the formerly enslaved. "We must restore humanity to those who have been dehumanized," he said.

The 2008 report evaluates the efforts of 170 countries to combat human trafficking. The report aims to raise awareness of the scourge of modern slavery and to encourage countries to take action to prevent it.

The report places countries in "tiers" based on an assessment of the government's compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking as explained in the U.S. Trafficking in Persons Protection Act of 2000. Tier 2 and Tier 3 countries have moderate to severe challenges in controlling trafficking. Another category, "Tier 2 Watch List," indicates countries in danger of falling to the bottom Tier 3.

Lagon said that in the 2008 report, Madagascar moved to Tier 1 -- the best of the ratings -- by demonstrating the ability to take effective anti-trafficking steps with minimal resources. Moldova, however, fell to Tier 3. Both previously had been classified in Tier 2.

China and India remain on the Tier 2 Watch List. China, he said, has made insufficient efforts to combat trafficking, especially in regards to North Korean women who are trafficked into China as "wives" or prostitutes. Those North Koreans unlucky enough to be returned by authorities to North Korea routinely are punished by the North Korean regime, he said.

In contrast, India has made more efforts to protect children who become victims of trafficking, but the government still does not recognize bonded labor as a form of slavery, Lagon said.

TRAFFICKING A WORLDWIDE PROBLEM

According to U.S. estimates, some 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders each year. That number does not include the millions of people trafficked within their own countries.

Trafficking is a problem in the United States as well, where an estimated 14,500 to 17,500 victims are trafficked into the country each year. A separate report on trafficking problems inside the United States is produced each year.

U.S. efforts to combat trafficking involve partnerships with other countries, international and nongovernmental organizations. In fiscal year 2007, the U.S. government spent approximately $79 million to fund 180 anti-trafficking projects in about 90 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, the United States has funded more than $528 million for anti-trafficking projects worldwide.

Even though the problem of human trafficking is severe, the outlook is not entirely gloomy. According to Rice, in recent years there has been "a hopeful global movement uniting civil society, governments, and international organizations" to abolish human trafficking.

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice, and to say that freedom and security are non-negotiable demands of human dignity," she said.

"Together I believe this movement of governments, civil society, and brave individuals of conscience can rescue, rehabilitate, and restore the lives of those who have been treated as less than human."

A transcript of Rice's remarks is available on America.gov.

The full text of the 2008 Trafficking in Persons Report is available on the State Department Web site. See also U.S. Government Efforts to Fight Demand Fueling Human Trafficking and The Facts About Human Trafficking for Forced Labor also on the State Department Web site.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: WF

94 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 9:52 PM EST

AMBASSADOR LAGON SPEAKS ON RELEASE OF EIGHTH ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 5650 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

Ambassador Mark P. Lagon, Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons:

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Thank you very much, Madame Secretary. Good morning. Secretary Rice has aptly summarized why the U.S. Government is dedicated to ending human trafficking, a deeply dehumanizing form of exploitation. In virtually every country around the world, including the United States, men, women and children are held in domestic servitude, exploited for commercial sex, coerced into work in factories and sweatshops. In some, children are forcibly recruited as soldiers.

These are forms of human trafficking. They are, in fact, forms of modern-day slavery. Estimates of the number of victims vary widely. According to the U.S. intelligence community, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. About 80 percent of them are female. Up to half are minors. These figures do not include millions who are trafficked for purposes of labor and sexual exploitation within national borders as well.

What's unique about our policy goal of eradicating modern-day slavery is that we have, very much at Congress's direction, a comprehensive tool: The Annual Trafficking In Persons Report, which allows us to diagnose the problem and track progress. This year's report covers 170 countries: 153 are assessed and ranked into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3; another 17 countries are considered special cases, often because we lack sufficient information to assess whether a significant number of trafficking victims exist in those countries.

In the 2008 TIP Report, as mandated by Congress, we have several essential objectives addressed. To summarize: the country-specific information regarding what foreign governments are doing to prosecute traffickers, to protect victims and to prevent the crime; to initiate bilateral engagement, ongoing year-round in terms of action plans for combating trafficking in persons developed on the basis of each country assessment; to assess patterns and trends in human trafficking in order to confront it more intelligently and to hold poor performers to account; and finally, to inspire greater determination, creativity, and cooperation among governments and anti-trafficking advocates. As a function of the information collected in compiling this document, we know far more today than we did eight years ago with the first edition, or even three years ago, when, for example, we started taking a closer look at forced labor practices.

Let me discuss some of the key trends which emerged in the course of compiling this year's report. Every trend is best exemplified by an individual tragedy because it's truly these personal stories of anguish that motivate contemporary abolitionists in dealing with contemporary slavery. Last summer, I met a young Burmese woman, Aye Aye Wynn. She had been recruited to work in a shrimp processing sector of a neighboring country to Burma, together with 800 other Burmese men, women and children. Desperate to leave her country, Aye Aye Wynn described her horror to me at finding herself locked in a factory compound in the middle of a jungle, prevented from leaving or calling family by phone, or even eating decently. She and her Burmese brethren weren't even paid.

Aye Aye and two others tried to escape. They were hunted down and beaten. They were chained to poles in the middle of the courtyard of the factory compound and they were deprived of food and water. Aye Aye's hair was shaved as a tool of humiliation before the other workers. This wasn't a workplace. It was a forced labor camp. Thankfully, Aye Aye was rescued, and the good news is that the national police raid saved her and her compatriots. Around the world, gross examples of forced labor are commonly treated as mere administrative matters or regulatory offenses rather than despicable crimes.

In this year's TIP Report, for the first time, we broke down global and regional law enforcement data to examine progress in sex trafficking or labor trafficking prosecutions. You'll find that on page 37 of the report. These statistics indicate that only a very small percentage of human trafficking prosecutions are convictions. Roughly 10 percent of them relate to labor trafficking offenses as compared to prosecutions and convictions related to sex trafficking offenses.

If we're to end the terrible reality of slave labor, all responsible countries must join forces to hold those guilty of this crime accountable. More attention must be paid to labor trafficking in order to make the stories of vulnerable people like Aye Aye Wynn a part of our past. One example of an industry in which we are concerned over reports of significant forced labor is Thailand shrimp processing and that sector. But in other cases, in Brazil, some charcoal is produced by forced labor and some of that charcoal may be used to produce pig iron. Over half of the 5,800 slaves rescued by Brazilian authorities were found on sugarcane plantations.

Also of concern is China, where several slave labor scandals have recently been uncovered. Some of the cases reportedly involve the complicity of Chinese law enforcement officials themselves. All governments must act to ensure that cheap and efficient production of export goods does not come at the expense of the very dignity and fundamental rights of citizens.

Last winter, in a Bucharest shelter for sex trafficking survivors, I met two young Romanian women, Anca and Silvia. They had been trafficked separately to Western Europe and wound up together in a shelter and they were repatriated from there back home. Both women had the clear look of traumatized people. They clung to each other. Just a few days after we met in Romania, the NGO caring for them discovered that Anca had advanced TB and that Silvia had severe syphilis. Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were repatriated? The time lost made their conditions immensely worse.

Despite increased attention by law enforcement to sex trafficking, we are not seeing, as the findings of this report, significant improvement in victim protection and victim services provided. This trend has to be reversed or we'll never be able to help significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized must be restored to their full humanity.

This report focuses on a number of vulnerable groups. They include North Koreans in China, Burmese in Thailand, stateless people, low-skilled migrant workers in general, and foreign domestic workers. One of the most common and desperate faces of modern day slavery is the domestic servant, locked and abused in a private home or apartment, cut off from the rest of the world. One of the highest profile cases in the U.S. this year involved two Indonesian maids who were trapped in a nightmare in a mansion in Long Island, New York. Victims of involuntary domestic servitude are often exploited sexually as well as exploited for their labor.

We're beginning to see, however, glimmers of recognition among governments that this is an extraordinarily vulnerable population. For instance, the Philippines is a major source of female domestic workers. It recently decided to impose a ban on new maids going to one particular destination country because of the extremely high number of Filipino maids who were regularly escaping from the confines of abusive employers and seeking shelter in the Philippines Embassy. This development signifies a growing resolve on the part of the government to confront exploitation. Governments must start treating this form of slavery as a serious crime. Labor recruiters and brokers who facilitate trafficking through deceitful work offers, contract fraud, and outright force and coercion, they need to be prosecuted and punished with jail sentences.

In past reports, we've identified countries where foreign workers are exploited to force, fraud, and coercion, and have placed some of these countries on the lowest tier of the report, Tier 3. This year's report sheds more light on recruiters, some of whom are licensed by the state, and who often start the chain of trafficking in these labor source countries by fraudulent offers of employment and then excessive recruitment fees that later translate into debt bondage.

Vietnam and Indonesia are key labor source countries in this regard. We've seen specific cases of workers from each of these countries trapped into trafficking schemes abroad through the predatory practice of labor recruiters in their own countries. To address this new phenomena, the report includes recommendations for preventive steps that can be taken by both labor source and labor destination governments. These strategies are enumerated on page 16 and 17 of the report's introduction.

I've highlighted five trends: weak prosecution of labor trafficking offenses; secondly, weak trafficking victim protection; third, forced labor creeping into new growth industries; fourth, domestic servitude, and luckily, the problems there are gaining recognition; and fifth, closing a window of vulnerability for migrant workers as an imperative.

But running through this report, in fact, running through much of the U.S. Government's anti-trafficking work is a new focus, encouraged by Congress, on the factors that create demand for labor and sexual exploitation. Increasingly, we're scrutinizing products to see if they are tainted by slave labor. Without confronting this demand, we cannot end slavery today.

Demand is also pulling victims into sex and labor trafficking, but it's not being adequately addressed. As for demand for sex trafficking, it can be seen in the form of males seeking to buy brides from less developed communities with the intent of abusing and exploiting these women, or men traveling abroad to buy children for sex, or men exploiting women, prostituted by pimps. Demand for slave labor is seen broadly in the race to the bottom for cheap labor to produce cheaper export goods.

Since the TIP Report is organized around the performance of individual countries, let me highlight a few strong and weak performers and the rationale for the assessment of each. Moving up to Tier 1, for the first time, Madagascar proved this year that anti-trafficking progress can be achieved with will, despite minimal resources. It's emerged as a leader among sub-Saharan African countries.

Meanwhile, Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time, reflecting its government's failure to tackle trafficking related corruption as reflected in the handling of several high profile cases of complicity by government officials in trafficking. This failure created a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall. Now, we're hopeful that the newly appointed government in Moldova will take significant steps to address complicity by government officials and, furthermore, to improve law enforcement and victim protection efforts. We'll be engaging with them for that.

Among the news items here, Mexico has moved up to Tier 2, because of important developments over the reporting year, including a comprehensive new anti-trafficking law, funds appropriated by the legislature in Mexico for victim shelters, a demonstrably committed attorney general, and unified efforts of some superb civil society actors. Such developments are rays of hope in Mexico and evidence of a new political will that promises to yield even further improvement in this coming year.

For the last four years, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been a matter of great concern and disappointment. Saudi Arabia, for example, is ranked Tier 3 for the fourth time. As an update, I'm happy to report that the United Arab Emirates and Bahrain continue to make significant improvements; notably the United Arab Emirates as a model in the region.

No briefing on human trafficking would be complete without raising the situation in two countries with huge populations and unique trafficking profiles: China and India. China has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years. While there have been prosecutions of perpetrators of human trafficking and a national action plan was launched, there are insufficient efforts to protect Chinese and foreign victims of trafficking. In China, women and girls from North Korea are particularly at risk. Fleeing the repressive regime in their homeland, as well as poor social and economic conditions, these North Koreans seek refuge in China. But many are preyed upon by Chinese traffickers who sell them into sexual servitude as "wives" - with quotation marks around wives - or into prostitution. When Chinese authorities find these trafficking victims, they'd often send them back to North Korea where they face harsh punishment. The victims are punished rather than cared for.

India has made efforts on the child labor front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labor Minister Oscar Fernandes joined in a raid. But India still doesn't recognize bonded labor as human trafficking. It has weak anticorruption efforts and prosecutions are too few.

To conclude, as we continue to shed light on emerging global trends for trafficking in persons, we're steadfast in our support to countries who are willing to partner with us in this global fight. Just as the transatlantic slave trade was abolished 200 years ago, slavery today can be abolished again. Let's remain committed to act as a voice for the many voiceless victims of human trafficking: an advocate for the prostituted woman or child, the exploited domestic worker, the trapped agricultural laborer. Their bondage demands our attention and action.

Finally, let me take this opportunity to state how much good work I've seen throughout the year since I last stood here a year ago. And I want to tell you how much I personally appreciate the increasing cooperation of our allies, governments, NGOs, church organizations, and private citizens around the world who are making real strides to prevent trafficking in persons and to help victims reclaim their lives and self respect.

I'd welcome your questions.

QUESTION: You spoke a little bit about slave labor camps that have been uncovered in China. Have you found that any products destined for the Olympic Games have been tainted by slave labor, to use your word? And then I had a question - a follow-up thing on Venezuela. They appear to have actually improved this year.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm. First of all, any time that there's a major sporting event, whether it be, you know, World Cup soccer or the biggest of all, the Olympics, one has to be concerned about the massive construction work possibly being subject to human trafficking exploitation and a spike in commercial sexual exploitation.

With respect to China, I actually would say we have to look at the general situation of human rights that we're - the world is called upon to look at as the Olympic Games are coming together. It's 19 years ago today that the Tiananmen Square massacre occurred. And there's a lot of focus on human rights, in general, in China as the Olympics are about to occur.

But we need to recognize that there is a problem of human trafficking that's not specific to the Olympics occurring, but the Olympics brings attention to. There has been examples of people caught in slavery in brick kilns and, in fact, resold to other kilns by government officials who are corrupt, been a case recently documented of children who were trafficked to Guangdong Province and were involved in the worst forms of child labor, having been brought from Dongguan. There's credible evidence of Uighurs, who are moved from -

QUESTION: I'm sorry, of who?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Of Uighur Muslims who have moved from Xinjiang to other parts of China. And most notably, as I emphasized in my opening remarks, North Koreans are subject to re-victimization, because they flee a country in which they face repression and an economic chaos caused by their own government. And whether as bought wives or as workers in the Northeast of China, they have been subject to human trafficking and the worst kind of leverage that could be held over their head, the threat that they'd be sent back to North Korea only to be punished severely by their government.

QUESTION: But specifically, has there been anything that you can point to that would indicate that the Olympic Games has actually increased the number of people in forced labor or - because there's a need for more product, et cetera, et cetera?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: As I don't have tangible evidence, I don't want to overreach. But any time that there's a substantial building boom and construction, and a vulnerability to massive prostitution designed to service people from abroad, there's a possibility. But I would direct you to thinking about the longstanding vulnerability to human trafficking in China. China is not only a government that does not protect the liberties of its people, but it manifestly is a government that doesn't protect its own citizens and foreign nationals from human trafficking.

QUESTION: And on Venezuela?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah. Venezuela has actually moved up this year. And I hope it's a tribute to the objectivity of our report. We don't sit in the upper levels of this building and decide which countries are generally human rights abusers or with whom we have problematic relationships, and then determine that they get a lousy ranking in this report. Venezuela has taken some steps: passing a law to prohibit internal trafficking of women and girls, opening up some investigations of human trafficking. There remain problems, including limited victim services and no shelters for victims. So it's a mixed bag. But truth be told, they don't belong in the lowest category any longer.

QUESTION: Speaking about the objectivity of the report, there are special cases where you don't have enough information. But Iran is on the Tier 3, and you don't have any embassy in Iran, any relations with Iran for 30 years. So how - on what do you base your information -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, we - just as Iran is included in the Annual Human Rights Report and is a serious case to examine, we feel that Iran needs to be assessed with a ranking in this report. Yes, it's a limitation that we have only so much information. But that's a limitation more based on the closed nature of the Iranian Government than the lack of diplomatic representation of the United States.

I want to say that we try to be very serious about getting evidence. Truthfully, we prod other governments quite hard to give us evidence and data. Congress requires us to tell them about investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and sentences, as well as numbers of trafficking victims found and helped. And we insist on having a baseline as best we can. There are some limits on the information that we got from the Government of Iran. But the picture is pretty clear, one of serious human trafficking.

Elise.

QUESTION: Can you talk a little bit more about the idea that slave labor is fueling some of these booming industries in these developing countries and the idea that the United States is increasing trade with these countries? We're relying on some of the products that are fueling these industries. And how much demand is fueling it and whether there should be stricter, kind of, I guess what you say, export controls or import controls on these types of things?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's been the law -

QUESTION: I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Okay, we'll come back to you. It's been a law for 78 years under the 1938 Tariff and Trade Act that products of slave labor are not permitted into the country. It's a matter of implementation. We need to identify those products that are indeed produced by slave labor. My colleagues at ICE, at DHS, are eager and energetic in their efforts internationally to try and run that down.

We don't want to suggest that all imports from a country are tainted by slave labor when there is evidence of some. I myself have seen in Thailand those who were subjected to slave labor conditions in the shrimp processing sector. That doesn't mean all shrimp that comes into the United States from Thailand is tainted, but there's a distinct possibility; it's something we need to look out for.

We need to think about growing trends. I'll call attention to the profile of Brazil, which is doing a good deal proactively to rescue victims of forced labor, even calling them by the name they deserve, slaves, based on commitment by President Lula. But as it says right here in the report, approximately half of the nearly 6,000 men freed from slave labor in 2007 were found exploited on plantations growing sugarcane for the production of ethanol - a growing trend.

We need to pay attention to this, and there is consumer power, the best kind of market force, to ask the question: Are supply chains clean?

QUESTION: I have one other question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: One quick follow-up?

QUESTION: It kind of follows up on that. But China and India, you said that they've been on the Tier 2 Watch List for the last four - for the last four years. And you say that, you know, it's not based on who we have a bad relationship with that we give them a bad grade, but what about the countries that we're trying to have a good relationship with, we have a growing economic relationship with? I mean, how come neither one of those countries has made it to Tier 3? My understanding is there's been a lot of debate within the Administration about whether they should be listed.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: The Tier 2 Watch List should not be a permanent status. It's - I think it was designed by Congress to highlight - there's some countries in Tier 2 that are in danger of potentially ending up on Tier 3. You know, there are some countries that just deserve to be in this new category that was created between Tier 2 and Tier 3. It's my judgment that Russia, for instance, really doesn't belong in Tier 2 and it really doesn't belong in Tier 3. This is the right call.

With respect to India and China, these are both very serious cases. We're quite blunt in the report. Frankly, we're quite blunt in our extensive diplomatic dialogue with these countries. There are some positive developments in each. In India, there's been an effort to focus on rescuing victims both in sex trafficking and in child labor, but as far as prosecutions across the board, as far as fighting corruption as a facilitator of human trafficking and in particular a recognition that bonded labor is extensive and a human trafficking problem, it remains a serious situation.

QUESTION: So you feel comfortable that they're still on Tier 2 Watch List?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Indeed, indeed. And with respect to China, while they have made some progress in law enforcement on a national action plan, there remain a number of problems that I've enumerated earlier that deserve serious attention.

Sir.

QUESTION: Can you elaborate more on the Arab states? You've talked about progress in UAE and Bahrain, and Saudi Arabia is still in the Tier 3. Are you considering imposing sanctions on Saudi Arabia?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, all countries that are on Tier 3, according to the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of the year 2000 that created the office I direct and mandated the report, all countries in Tier 3 are subject to sanctions. The sanctions cannot be limitations on trade promotion assistance or humanitarian - purely humanitarian assistance.

Every year, approximately the 1st of September, a decision is made by the U.S. Government about whether to subject the countries under Tier 3 to full sanctions, or to use a full or partial waiver. And considerations are made about whether we're going to advance our diplomacy with countries to actually get them to change on human trafficking, and our general national interests are taken into account.

And there are a number of times where we try and use this as a surgical tool, where, for instance, we feel that we could get cultural exchanges or democracy programs funded if we have a partial waiver. But I must say that I think we've gotten the attention of a number of the Persian Gulf states, and I think even more than the blunt words of the United States or potential sanctions, as a model that one sees in the region of the United Arab Emirates dealing with the problem of children as jockeys and then putting in place a law on human trafficking that it's now using to prosecute sex traffickers and (inaudible) victims.

But you know, these countries care about the rankings. You know, I've seen the diplomats and officials of these countries in their capitals and here in Washington, and the prospect of moving up from Tier 3 to the Tier 2 Watch List and a reassessment that occurs in August for the Tier 3 countries, and the prospect of moving up in each year is something they very much care about.

QUESTION: Yes, I'd like to return to Mexico for a moment.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Mm-hmm.

QUESTION: You had commended Mexico on improving its efforts in human trafficking and you emphasized that one way to solve this problem that's very important is to make sure that governments prosecute - or make arrests, prosecute and convict people for these crimes. I've been reporting on the State Department's non-natural death report for 2005-2007, specifically the 128 homicides that have taken place in Mexico, and I have been unable to get information on exactly that from the State Department; in other words, the arrest, prosecution and conviction. Is it just trafficking that they follow up on, not - why wouldn't homicides or other events in sort of -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: A lot of violent crime, particularly connected to organized crime both in drugs and human trafficking, that persists in Mexico. It's by no means a rosy situation in terms of law enforcement. I can't speak specifically to that information, although I can try and help get that for you. But in Mexico, it's the step of will that's being shown, and the legislative branch and the executive branch coming together to pass a comprehensive law and some appearance that they intend to use that law. Because that is the key here. We see states that move up when they pass a comprehensive law, and then sometimes we see they don't implement those laws. On some of those first steps I've been very impressed. The Attorney General Medina Mora, who has appointed Guadalupe Morfin as his point woman on human trafficking, I've spent some time with her at a UN conference on human trafficking, consulting about how she'll attack this problem. I'm delighted to see the Mexican authorities are going to use appropriations from their legislature to take some mansions seized from drug traffickers and turn them into shelters for human trafficking victims.

In the back.

QUESTION: On Cuba, please. What are you doing on the situation of trafficking in Cuba, and what are you doing about (inaudible) under Raul Castro regime?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, there continues to be a problem for human trafficking in Cuba. Earlier, I was asked a question about Iran. This is also a situation in which the government is not exactly forthcoming to the United States about data. There are some efforts to raise awareness in Cuba for women who might fall into sex trafficking, and there are some efforts that the Cubans make in combination with British NGOs to try and deal with children who are, you know, sexually exploited. But in general, there seems to be denial and weak victim assistance, when it comes to human trafficking. One hopes there'll be change in Cuba, but I don't see evidence to date that the modest transition that has taken place politically in Cuba has changed the situation markedly.

Sir.

QUESTION: Yes. You said the Saudis are on Tier 3 since the beginning - the establishing of the report?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: They've been on Tier 3 for four years, is it? Yeah, about four years now.

QUESTION: You have been establishing the reports since the eight years. This is the eighth year, right?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Correct.

QUESTION: And the Saudis are in Tier 3 since the beginning?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: And the Saudis - I can - and by the way, a helpful addition to the report last year was a tracking chart. And in the profile of every country, it indicates every ranking it has received since the beginning. Saudi Arabia was Tier 3, 2001 and 2002. It came up to Tier 2, when there was no Tier 2 Watch List, both in 2003 and 2004. And since 2005, it has remained on Tier 3.

QUESTION: And why - sorry.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Go ahead. Were you going to ask me about the situation in Saudi Arabia?

QUESTION: No, I'm asking why, in your opinion, the U.S. is not succeeding in convincing the Saudis to do some improvements? I mean -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think there's a desperate need for women and foreigners, migrant laborers to be treated as human beings in full in Saudi Arabia, and that is part of the distinct problem there and in a number of the Gulf states. One case is really striking to me, the case of Nour Miyatis, an Indonesian domestic servant, a maid, who was grossly abused in Saudi Arabia. For four years, she's been pursuing legal proceedings, not going home to Indonesia, but sticking it out. She's trying to stick up for her rights under international law. And she had recently her case thrown out in Saudi Arabia. This is a woman who was locked for over a month in a closet by her employer. Her employer refused to treat her medical condition. She got gangrene in her fingers and toes and they had to be amputated. It's pretty obvious.

QUESTION: Loss of her limbs?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Yeah, yeah. All fingers and toes. It's emblematic. But there are a number of problems both of labor trafficking and victimization of women as well. But I hope to visit Saudi Arabia in the coming months and engage all the more.

QUESTION: Yeah, but why you are not succeeding, like you are succeeding in - with the Emirates? Why with the Saudis you are not -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think it's principally a question of political will on their part, but I'll do mine in terms of serious, quiet dialogue.

Sir.

QUESTION: What are the countries that there are currently sanctions against and what are the nature of those sanctions as a result of this?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, of the Tier 3 countries from last year - and my staff can help me recall all of them, if I miss some - some of the countries that have full-scale sanctions include Burma, Cuba. There was actually, in the case of Iran and North Korea, partial sanctions so that some exchange programs or cultural programs or democracy-related assistance would not be blocked. A number of the countries had sanctions waived, from Malaysia that was on Tier 3 last year, has moved up to the Tier 2 Watch List, to this year, a number of countries again on Tier 3. Last year, a number of the Persian Gulf states, because of strategic relationships we have with governments and wanting to sustain dialogue on human trafficking and not having the door shut, had full waivers, based on a decision by the President of the United States.

Sir.

QUESTION: Regarding North Korean victims in northeastern China, Chinese Government (inaudible) seems to be - provide the traffickers with the - what kind of leverage, as you said. So what special steps do you think is required?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, I think one - one important place to start is for the Chinese authorities to see what they believe their moral and legal obligations are under migration treaties and human rights for the way they treat those who come to China. They're treated legally in China - that is to say, North Koreans who come there - as illegal economic migrants and are sent home. And this creates a double problem. For those who want to victimize North Koreans who come to China, all they have to do is threaten that we're going to, you know, turn you over to the authorities and you're going to get sent home. And so those victims find themselves coerced into doing, you know, the worst of things, including women who ostensibly have been bought and brought into marriage but, in fact, are sex slaves. But moreover, when they do get sent home, they are, you know, truly victimized; I mean, you're a victim leaving North Korea, you're victimized in human trafficking and then victimized and sent home. That's a pretty gory situation. It demands the attention of the international community.

Anyone else?

I just want to say a word, if I can, about the effort that comes together before this report. It's a momentous effort. We have tried - worked hard to get this annual report to come out at the same time as a report on U.S. efforts at home that the Department of Justice pulls together. So we can answer the question: Do you grade yourselves? Just yesterday, a report was delivered to Congress and it's in synch with this, so that when we produce CD-ROMs for international distribution, there will be an assessment of what the United States is doing, including a self-critical set of recommendations.

This report would never come together without a team of reports officers who travel the globe and do their very best to get the most serious empirical data. That team is led by Mark Taylor. Much of the creativity of this report in raising themes is shaped by Mark Taylor and that team. And I also want to thank Eleanor Gaetan, our senior coordinator for public affairs who helped shape this report and it becoming, as I've learned going to UN meetings, a tremendous source of international public awareness. There is nothing like this report. This is not crowing; it's just a fact. There is no NGO report and there is no UN report on human trafficking that makes this kind of assessment, and this has become more and more enlightening each year. I commend it to you. Thanks.

LOAD-DATE: June 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

95 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 12:58 PM EST

TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 1349 words

DATELINE: TIRANA, Albania

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

The goal of this Report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery. Countries determined to have a significant number of trafficking victims are assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" are classified as Tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3.

The Special Watch List consists of Tier Two countries determined: (1) not to have made "increasing efforts" over the past year; (2) to have avoided Tier 3 status based on commitments of anti-trafficking reforms over the next year, or (3) to have a very significant number of trafficking victims or a significantly increasing victim population.

ALBANIA (Tier 2 Watch List)

Albania is a source country for women and girls trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor; it is no longer considered a major country of transit. Albanian victims are trafficked to Greece, Italy, Macedonia, and Kosovo with many trafficked onward to West European countries such as the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Norway, Germany and the Netherlands. Children were also trafficked to Greece for begging and other forms of child labor. Approximately half of all Albanian trafficking victims are under age 18. Internal sex trafficking of women and children is on the rise.

The Government of Albania does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. The Government of Albania is placed on Tier 2 Watch List for its failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons over the past year, particularly in the area of victim protection. The government did not appropriately identify trafficking victims during 2007. It has also not demonstrated it is vigorously investigating or prosecuting complicit officials.

Recommendation for Albania: Vigorously investigate and prosecute human trafficking offenses as well as law enforcement officials' complicity in trafficking, and convict and sentence persons responsible for such acts; enhance training of law enforcement officials within the anti-trafficking sector; ensure full implementation of the national mechanism for referring victims to service providers; increase funding for victim assistance and protection services; draft and implement a new national action plan with participation from local anti-trafficking NGOs; provide anti-trafficking training for peacekeeping troops.

Prosecution

The Government of Albania did not provide convincing evidence of progress in law enforcement efforts to combat human trafficking during 2007. Albania criminally prohibits sex and labor trafficking through its penal code, which prescribes penalties of five to 15 years' imprisonment. These penalties are sufficiently stringent and exceed those prescribed for rape. In 2007, Albania prosecuted 49 alleged traffickers and convicted seven human trafficking offenders. Seven of the prosecutions were for child labor trafficking. The sentences for convicted traffickers were appropriately severe, ranging from five years' imprisonment with fines to 16 years' imprisonment with fines. It is unknown if the government prosecuted and convicted additional traffickers under other statutes because the government does not separate crime statistics by trafficking offences. During the reporting period, regional anti-trafficking police units remained poorly trained and ill-equipped to effectively address human trafficking due to inadequate resources, the influence of corruption, and high turnover of police recruits. The government discontinued anti-trafficking training for new and continuing police officers, although training for judges and magistrates continued. Between June and July 2007, the government fired approximately 20 percent of its specialized and highly trained anti-trafficking police officers as part of an overall police restructuring effort. In three separate cases, the Ministry of Interior arrested 12 police officers accused of human trafficking in 2007, including six officers with direct responsibility for anti-trafficking at the border. Prosecutions of these cases and several other cases from the last reporting period remain ongoing.

Protection

The Government of Albania failed to consistently sustain efforts to identify, refer, protect and reintegrate victims of trafficking during 2007. The government's ability to fund protection and assistance services was limited; however, it operated one victim care shelter in Tirana. The government provided sporadic in-kind assistance to four additional NGO-managed shelters, such as the use of government buildings and land. In July 2007, all five shelters signed a memorandum of understanding to strengthen cooperation and coordination among the shelters. In a change during this reporting period, there was an overall decline in the number of victims identified due to inappropriate application of the national referral mechanism for several months by anti-trafficking police. In 2007 the government identified only 13 women and seven children as victims of trafficking during the reporting period, a 25 percent decline over the 25 victims of trafficking reported by the government in the 2006 reporting period. According to both the government and other observers, authorities identified as victims only those who proactively identified themselves as such. At the same time, however, NGO shelters reported 146 victims of trafficking during the reporting year. Victims are not jailed or fined for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of their being trafficked. The Albanian witness protection program is available for victims of trafficking who participate in prosecutions; however, evidence suggests that the system is ineffective for victims of trafficking. In 2007 one young woman was re-trafficked to Greece by her trafficker's brothers following her testimony that put him in prison. Child victims, many of whom were trafficked by their parents, were more often returned to their parents than placed in protective custody.

Prevention

The Government of Albania implemented several anti-trafficking prevention activities but allowed its national anti-trafficking action plan to expire. The Ministry of Interior took over funding of the national toll-free, 24-hour hotline for victims and potential victims of trafficking from the UN Office for Drugs and Crime and IOM in November 2007. The Ministry of Education includes in its high school curriculum awareness of the dangers of trafficking. The government continued implementation of an anti-speedboat law, outlawing virtually all water crafts along the Albanian coast and leading to a significant drop in trafficking in persons to Italy, most of which has been accomplished in the past by boat. During the reporting period, communication between the government and NGOs improved following a period of strained relations. The national anti-trafficking coordinator and the police director general held meetings with NGOs that led to improved communication between government and NGOs by January 2008, particularly at the border crossing points. As of March 2008, the government had not distributed a draft 2008-2010 national anti-trafficking action plan for comment to international partners and NGOs. The government did not provide evidence that it makes efforts to prevent its peacekeeping troops deployed abroad from engaging in trafficking or exploiting trafficking victims. The Ministry of Culture and Tourism produced banners that are being posted at 15 border crossing points to discourage child sex tourism and alert border-crossers that sexual relations with children is a crime in Albania.

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

96 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 11:50 AM EST

KENYA SHOWS MARKED IMPROVEMENT IN RESPONDING TO TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 1785 words

DATELINE: NAIROBI, Kenya

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Today, Wednesday, June 4, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice publicly launched the 2008 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report to the U.S. Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons.

The TIP report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat severe forms of trafficking in persons. It is intended to raise awareness and spur countries to take effective actions to counter trafficking in persons.

Kenya's ranking improved this year from Tier 2 Watch List to Tier 2 because of its increasing efforts to combat TIP. Tier 2 consists of countries that do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance. Watch List countries require special scrutiny because of a high or significantly increasing number of victims or failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

Kenya remains a source, destination and transit country for trafficking victims but is making significant efforts to address the problem. It still has no specific, comprehensive law against TIP, which has made it difficult for the justice system to investigate and prosecute traffickers and assist victims. The Children's Department, now transferred to the Ministry of Gender and Children's Affairs, is leading the National Steering Committee of government agencies, NGOs, and international organizations to draft a national strategy and action plan against TIP.

Since 2005, the Department of State has awarded grants of almost $800,000 to Kenyan NGOs for anti-trafficking programs in Kenya to implement awareness and law enforcement training and victims' assistance and child protection programs. The Report assigns countries to one of three tiers depending on how they meet the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking." Tier 1 countries meet those standards. Tier 2 countries not fully complying with the minimum standards, but are making significant efforts to meet them. Tier 3 countries are rated as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so.

There is also a Tier Two Watch List consisting of Tier Two countries that have a significant number of trafficking victims, have a significantly increasing victim population or have failed to make efforts to manage the issue over the past year.

Attached is the Kenya chapter of the TIP report, embargoed until 5:00 p.m. Nairobi time.

Final Text of Kenya's country narrative in the 2008 TIP Report:

KENYA (TIER 2)

Kenya is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation. Kenyan children are trafficked within the country for domestic servitude, street vending, agricultural labor, herding, barmaids, and commercial sexual exploitation, including involvement in the coastal sex tourism industry. Kenyan men, women, and children are trafficked to the Middle East, other African nations, Europe, and North America for domestic servitude, enslavement in massage parlors and brothels, and forced manual labor, including in the construction industry. Employment agencies facilitate and profit from the trafficking of Kenyan nationals to Middle Eastern nations, notably Saudi Arabia, the U.A.E., and Lebanon, as well as Germany. Chinese, Indian, and Pakistani women reportedly transit Nairobi en route to exploitation in Europe's commercial sex trade. Brothels and massage parlors in Nairobi employ foreign women, some of whom are likely trafficked. Children are trafficked from Rwanda, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Ethiopia, Uganda, and Somalia to Kenyan towns, including Kisumu, Nakuru, Nairobi, and Mombasa. Most trafficked girls are coerced to work as barmaids, where they are vulnerable to sexual exploitation, or are forced directly into prostitution.

The Government of Kenya does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. Kenya's anti-trafficking efforts improved markedly over the reporting period, particularly through greater investigations of suspected trafficking cases.

Recommendations for Kenya: Pass, enact, and implement the draft comprehensive anti-trafficking law; provide additional awareness training to levels of government, particularly law enforcement officials, on trafficking crimes; increase efforts to prosecute and convict trafficking offenders; establish an official process for law enforcement officials to refer trafficking victims for assistance; and institute trafficking awareness training for diplomats posted overseas.

Prosecution

The government failed to punish acts of trafficking during the reporting period, but demonstrated significantly increased law enforcement activity throughout the reporting period. Kenya does not prohibit all forms of trafficking, though it criminalizes the trafficking of children and adults for sexual exploitation through its Sexual Offenses Act, enacted in July 2006, which prescribes penalties that are sufficiently stringent and commensurate with those for rape; however, the law is not yet widely used by prosecutors. The Employment Act of 2007 outlaws forced labor and contains additional statutes relevant to labor trafficking. In September 2007, relevant government agencies provided comments on a draft comprehensive human trafficking bill to the Attorney General's office, which continues to work with NGOs to further refine the bill.

Police opened investigations into a number of significant cases during the reporting period, including the suspected trafficking of children by two school teachers in Kirinyaga District. In October 2007, police in Malindi arrested an Italian national on suspicion of human trafficking, facilitating child prostitution, and drug trafficking. Upon the conclusion of a separate police investigation, two women were charged with child defilement and child prostitution after luring a 14-year old girl to their home and forcing her into prostitution. Two children trafficked to Tanzania for forced labor were rescued by Kenyan officials and placed in a children's home; the investigation is ongoing as police believe the perpetrators are harboring an additional 40 children and six adults in forced labor. Six people in Bomet and Nandi Districts of Rift Valley Province were charged with the sale and trafficking of children. The Police Commissioner worked with Interpol to investigate the suspected trafficking of a Kenyan girl to The Netherlands and four children to Ireland. The Ministry of Home Affairs began, for the first time, collecting information on trafficking cases from the police, media, foreign governments, and UNODC. Corruption among law enforcement authorities and other public officials hampered efforts to bring traffickers to justice. Some anti-trafficking activists made credible claims that, in certain areas, police officials were complicit in trafficking activities.

Protection

The government made efforts during the reporting period to improve protective services provided to trafficking victims. Kenyan officials removed 14 children from situations of trafficking in Nandi and placed them in a children's home. The government referred two additional trafficking victims to IOM for assistance during the reporting period, and ensured the well-being of a number of other victims. City Council Social Services Departments in Nairobi, Mombasa, and Kisumu operated shelters to rehabilitate street children vulnerable to forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation; the government provided services to children exploited in the commercial sex industry at these facilities. In partnership with an NGO, the Ministry of Home Affairs provided and refurbished a building to house a toll-free hotline that enables children and adults to report cases of child trafficking, labor, and abuse. Staff members were hired and trained to serve as counselors and refer callers to government and NGO service providers. In June 2007, the Department of Home Affairs, Children's Services Unit hired an additional 180 Chief Children's Officers; during the reporting period, several children's officers posted throughout the country were involved in trafficking investigations and provided counseling and follow-up to child trafficking victims. Fifteen newly appointed Kenyan ambassadors received a first-ever briefing on human trafficking at Kenya's Foreign Service Institute; preparations are underway for a comprehensive briefing from the Ministries of Labor and Home Affairs and IOM for mid-grade and junior officers on their responsibilities in assisting Kenyan victims abroad. The government encourages victims, assistance in the investigation and prosecution of trafficking crimes, and ensures that they are not inappropriately incarcerated or otherwise penalized for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked. The government does not, however, provide legal alternatives to the removal of victims to countries where they would face hardship or retribution.

Prevention

The Government of Kenya made significant progress in publicly highlighting the dangers of human trafficking and taking steps to combat it during the reporting period. On numerous occasions, senior government officials, including the Vice President, spoke publicly about trafficking and attended many awareness-raising events, including the Day of the African Child in June. The Kenyan media, especially the government-owned Kenya Broadcasting Corporation, regularly reported cases of suspected human trafficking. In July 2007, the government established the National Steering Committee to Combat Human Trafficking under the leadership of the Ministry of Home Affairs. Its Sub-Committee appointed to draft a national action plan received two days of training from IOM, after which it convened three drafting sessions and presented an initial outline of the plan in October. Officers from the Ministries of Youth and Labor received anti-trafficking training at IOM workshops in November and December 2007. In July 2007, the Malindi District Commission established and chaired a district-level committee on child sex tourism. In June 2007, a German national was arrested and charged with sexually exploiting two trafficked children from Nyanza at Likoni Children's Home. There were no reports of the Kenyan government's efforts to provide anti-trafficking training for its troops before deployment on international peacekeeping missions.

The text of the TVPA and amendments can be found on website www.state.gov/g/tip.

LOAD-DATE: August 11, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

97 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 11:32 AM EST

FOREIGN PRESS CENTER BRIEFING ON 2008 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 4151 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State issued the following foreign press center briefing:

1:00 P.M. EDT

MODERATOR: All right. Thanks, everyone. Welcome to the Foreign Press Center this afternoon. It's our pleasure to host today the Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, Ambassador Mark Lagon. He's going to make a brief statement about the 2008 TIP report and then we're going to have time for your questions and answers. So without further delay, let me introduce Ambassador Lagon.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Thank you very much. Good afternoon and thank you all for coming. As you know, this morning, Secretary Rice released the Department's Annual Trafficking In Persons Report. We highlight heroes in each year's report who are - play a key role in combating human trafficking.

And one of the heroes this year, Anas Anas, is a reporter with an independent newspaper who was responsible for breaking two major trafficking rings in the capital city of his country, Ghana, in Accra during the reporting season for this report. Anas Anas worked undercover for eight months exposing the trafficking ring's methods of transportation and the identities of immigration officials who were accepting bribes in return for overlooking fake visas and passports in a trafficking scheme. His undercover work allowed him to collect key evidence that could be used by police to prosecute the traffickers. He displayed great courage as a reporter. In so doing, he's able to act as a voice for the voiceless.

So each of you, I'd note, in your capacity as journalists are uniquely positioned to help raise public awareness about this most pressing injustice of human trafficking that affects the lives of millions globally. So I'm particularly delighted that you're here today.

In virtually every country around the world, including the United States, men, women and children are held in domestic servitude. They're exploited for commercial sex and coerced in work and factories and in sweatshops. In some, children are forcibly recruited as soldiers. These are forms of human trafficking, but more aptly put, these are forms of modern-day slavery. Estimates of the number of victims worldwide vary widely. But according to the U.S. Government, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. Eighty percent of them are female. Some one-half of them are minors. And these figures don't include the millions more who are trafficked for the purposes of labor and sexual exploitation within the national borders of countries.

What's unique about our policy goal of eradicating modern-day slavery is that we have, very much at Congress's direction, a comprehensive tool in the form of the Annual Trafficking in Persons Report that allows us to diagnose the problem and to track progress in confronting it. This year's report covers 170 countries in the world, a new high. 153 were assessed and ranked at Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List and - or Tier 3. Another 17 countries are designated special cases, often because we lack sufficient information to assess whether a significant number of trafficking victims exist in those countries.

In the 2008 TIP Report, as mandated by Congress, there's several essential objectives. To summarize: country-specific information regarding what foreign governments are doing to prosecute traffickers, protect victims, and prevent the crime in the first place. Also, to initiate bilateral engagement with other countries that is ongoing year-round in the form of action plans we developed with other countries for combating trafficking based on the country assessment and the report. Another goal is to assess patterns and trends in human trafficking in order to confront it more intelligently and, frankly speaking, to hold poor performers accountable. Finally, we seek to inspire with, you know, greater determination, creativity and cooperation among governments and anti-trafficking advocates.

As a function of the information collected in compiling the report, we know far more today than we did eight years ago with the first edition, or even three years ago when we began taking a closer look at forced labor practices in addition to sex trafficking.

Let me discuss some of the key trends which emerged in the course of compiling this year's report. Every trend is best exemplified by an individual tragedy because it's truly personal stories that help motivate those who work today to abolish modern-day slavery. Last summer, I met a young Burmese woman, Aye Aye Wynn, who had been recruited to work in the shrimp processing industry in a neighboring country. Together with some 800 other Burmese men, women and children, she was recruited. She was desperate to leave her tortured country. And she described to me the horror at finding herself locked in a factory compound in the middle of the jungle, prevented from leaving, prevented from calling family members by phone, even prevented from eating decently. These workers were not even paid.

Aye Aye Wynn and two others tried to escape. They were hunted down and they were beaten. They were chained to poles in the courtyard of the factory compound, deprived of food and water. Aye Aye Wynn, a vibrant young woman with a beautiful head of hair, tells how that head of hair was completely shorn off as a way of humiliating her before other workers. This wasn't a workplace. It was a forced labor camp. Thankfully, Aye Aye Wynn was rescued. And the good news is that a national police raid saved her and her compatriots.

Around the world, gross examples of forced labor are commonly treated as administrative or regulatory offenses rather than crimes. In this year's TIP report, for the first time, we broke down global and regional law enforcement data to examine progress in sex trafficking and labor trafficking prosecutions. These statistics indicate that only a very small percentage of human trafficking prosecutions and convictions, roughly 10 percent of them, relate to labor trafficking offenses as opposed to sex trafficking offenses. That information, those statistics are on page 37 of the report.

If we're to end the terrible reality of slave labor, all responsible countries must join forces to hold those guilty of this crime accountable. More attention has to be paid to labor trafficking in order to make the stories of vulnerable people like Aye Aye Wynn a part of our past.

One example of an industry in which we are concerned over reports of significant forced labor is Thailand's shrimp processing sector. In Brazil, some charcoal produced in - by forced labor finds its way into pig iron for export. Over half of the 5,800 slaves rescued by Brazilian authorities over the last year were found on sugar cane plantations as well. Also of deep concern is China, where several slave labor scandals have recently been uncovered. Some of the cases reportedly involve the complicity of Chinese law enforcement officials. All governments must act to ensure that the cheap and efficient production of export goods doesn't come at the expense of the basic dignity and rights of citizens.

Another trend: the weak protection of sex trafficking victims. Last winter in Bucharest, I met in a shelter two young Romanian women, sex trafficking survivors, Anca and Silvia. They'd been trafficked separately to Western Europe and they wound up together in a shelter and they were repatriated back home. Both women clearly had the look of traumatized people. They clung to each other. And later when I returned to the United States, I learned from the NGO caring for them that they discovered that Anca had advanced TB and Silvia had severe syphilis. Why weren't these women given proper medical attention before they were even repatriated to Romania? Time lost made their conditions worse.

Despite increased attention on law enforcement for sex trafficking, we don't see significant improvement in victim protection and services provided worldwide. This trend has to be reversed or we'll never be able to have significant numbers of victims become survivors. The dehumanized have to be restored to their full humanity. We've highlighted in the report a number of vulnerable groups: North Koreans in China, Burmese in Thailand, stateless people, low-skilled migrant workers, in particular, and foreign domestic workers.

One of the most common and desperate faces of modern-day slavery is that of the domestic servant, locked and abused in a private home or apartment, cut off from the rest of the world. And truth be told, one of the highest profiled cases in the United States this year involved two Indonesian maids trapped in a nightmare in a mansion in Long Island, New York. Victims of involuntary domestic servitude are often exploited sexually as well as for their labor.

We're beginning to see glimmers of recognition among governments that this is an extraordinarily vulnerable population. For instance, the Philippines is a major source of female domestic workers. It recently decided to impose a ban on new maids going to one particular East Asian country because there are an extremely high number of Filipina maids who escape regularly from the confines of abusive employers, only to seek shelter in the Embassy of the Philippines. This development signifies a growing resolve on the part of the Government of the Philippines to confront exploitation.

Governments must start treating this form of slavery as a serious crime. Labor recruiters or brokers facilitate trafficking through deceitful work offers, contract fraud, and sometimes outright force and coercion. And they must be prosecuted, they must be punished with jail sentences.

In past reports, we've also identified countries where foreign workers are exploited through force, fraud and coercion. And we've placed a number of these countries on the lowest tier, Tier 3. This year's report sheds more light on recruiters. Some of those recruiters are licensed by the state, such as in Vietnam, and they often start the chain of trafficking in these labor source countries by using fraudulent offers, offers of employment that are bogus. And they levy excessive recruitment fees on people desperate for a better life, which translate into debt bondage in the end.

Vietnam and Indonesia are key labor source countries in this regard. We've seen specific cases of workers from each of these countries trapped into trafficking schemes abroad through a predatory practice of labor recruiters in their own countries. To address this new phenomenon, the report includes recommendations for preventive steps that can be taken by labor source and labor destination governments. I really want to highlight this for you. On pages 16 and 17 of the report are these strategies for fighting the - closing the window of vulnerability for migrant laborers.

So there are a number of themes here. A couple of them that I'd highlight are the fact that labor trafficking is not seeing enough punishment of the perpetrators and sex trafficking shows a situation of an emphasis on law enforcement and immigration approaches, but a failure to follow through on helping the victims, to find those victims, and to restore their dignity.

Running through the report overall, one sees a seam. And indeed, it's a seam in all of the U.S. Government's work on human trafficking, including the $530 million the United States has contributed to international anti-trafficking efforts over the last seven years. And that seam is the demand for labor trafficking and for sex trafficking. Increasingly, we're scrutinizing products to see if they're tainted by slave labor. Without confronting demand, we can't end slavery today. Demand is pulling victims into sex trafficking and labor trafficking and it's not being adequately addressed. In the area of sex trafficking, demand can be seen in the form of males buying brides from less developed communities, with intent of abusing them or exploiting them, of men traveling abroad to buy children for sex, and of men exploiting women, prostituted by pimps. And in the area of slave labor demand is seen in the race to the bottom for cheap labor and the ability to produce cheaper export goods.

Since the TIP report is organized around the performance of individual countries, let me highlight a few strong and weak performers and the rationale for how we've assessed each.

In Africa, moving up to Tier 1 for the first time, Madagascar proved this year that anti-trafficking progress can be achieved with political will even absent substantial economic resources. Madagascar emerged as a leader among sub-Saharan African countries. On the other hand, Moldova fell to Tier 3 for the first time. It reflected its government's failure to tackle trafficking-related corruption. It's seen in the handling of several high profile cases of complicity by government officials. That failure to deal with corruption was a significant impediment to the government's ability to fight trafficking overall. We're hopeful the newly appointed government will take significant steps to address complicity, and while they're at it improve law enforcement and victim protection.

An important development is that Mexico has moved up to Tier 2. It is an assessment based on the enactment of a comprehensive new anti-trafficking law, funds being appropriated by Mexico's legislature for victim shelters, a commitment of Attorney General Medina Mora, and unified efforts by superb civil society actors, many of whom I've met with in three parts of Mexico and two trips I've made over the last year. Such developments are rays of hope in Mexico and are evidence of a new political will to grapple with human trafficking. And I'm quiet hopeful that Mexico will continue to further improve in the coming year.

For at least four years now, the weak performance of several nations in the Persian Gulf has been a matter of great concern and disappointment. And in particular, Saudi Arabia is ranked Tier 3 for the fourth time in a row.

As an update, I'd like to report on one success story that is a model for the region: the United Arab Emirates, which, for the second year in a row, was upgraded this year to Tier 2 based on having passed the first comprehensive law in human trafficking in the region last year, and now using that law to go after perpetrators of sex trafficking, and to outfit victim shelters.

No briefing on human trafficking would be complete without raising the situation in two particular countries that are larger populace and with unique situations in human trafficking, and that's China and India. China has been ranked Tier 2 Watch List for four consecutive years. On the upside, there were prosecutions of perpetrators and a national action plan launched by the government of China. But overall, there were insufficient efforts to protect both Chinese and foreign nationals from being victims of trafficking.

In China, women and girls from North Korea are particularly at risk. Fleeing the repressive regime in their homeland, as well as poor social and economic conditions, they seek refuge in China. But many are then preyed upon by Chinese traffickers who sell them into sexual servitude as wives or into prostitution. When Chinese authorities find these trafficking victims, they often send them back to North Korea where they face harsh punishment; that is, in effect, punishment of the victim.

India has made some efforts that are positive on the child labor front, rescuing victims. In fact, Indian Labor Minister Oscar Fernandes joined a raid recently. However, India still doesn't recognize the degree to which bonded labor is a substantial human trafficking problem in its country. It has weak anticorruption efforts and prosecutions are too few.

So in conclusion, we continue to shed light on global trends that are emerging. And importantly, we are steadfast in an offer to nations that wish to partner with us to fight human trafficking. It's some 200 years since the transatlantic slave trade was abolished, and I think we can take tangible steps further to abolishing the slavery that exists today. We need to remain committed to be the voice for the voiceless, for the advocate - I mean, the advocates for the prostituted woman or child, for the exploited domestic worker, for the trapped agricultural laborer. Their bondage demands our attention. It demands our action.

I do want to emphasize that I appreciate the increasing cooperation I see from our allies, from governments, from NGOs, from church organizations, and private citizens. They are making real strides to prevent trafficking in persons and real strides to deal with the immediate, moral imperative of helping victims reclaim their lives and self respect.

And before I take some questions, I just want to note that the work of the report is by no means the work of one person. We have a broad team. The team of officers who are specialists on regions of the world is here with us. If you have follow-up questions after this, they'd be quite willing to talk and share their expertise. But led by Mark Taylor, the section of our Office on Reports and Political Affairs pours themselves into this report to produce the most credible, solid, substantiated, objective assessment of human trafficking in the world. And there is nothing like it. This is not in modesty; there is no NGO report, there is no UN report that covers the human trafficking scene in every country like this.

I also want to thank Eleanor Gaetan of our public outreach section for her leadership in making this a public awareness document for the world, not just a report to Congress.

So I welcome your questions.

MODERATOR: Thanks very much. If you have questions, please remember to state your name and media organization and wait for the microphone. Here in the front.

QUESTION: Thank you. Sonia Schott with Radio Valera in Venezuela. I have three ones. The first one, why is the United States not included in the same report? The second one is regarding the law enforcement that is up to the foreign governments to provide you with the information, so how reliable is this source, considering you mentioned corruption at the beginning of your remarks. And the third one is on Venezuela. Venezuela is Tier 2 Watch List -

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's moved up.

QUESTION: Yeah. So is this good news for Venezuela, or what that means? Could you please elaborate a little bit more on that? Thank you.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: I would have to say these are all three superb questions, but they all deserve time.

So, first, I'm glad you asked about the United States assessing itself. First of all, starting last year and again this year, there is a profile of the United States in this report that matches those of other countries that looks at what the United States is doing to prosecute the exploiters, to protect the victims, and to prevent the problem in the first place.

Now, we don't give ourselves a tier assessment, but one thing that I think is important is that we have started giving to Congress and making available to the public an annual self-assessment of the United States that doesn't just tell the good news, but that identifies areas for improvement. Just yesterday, this annual report was sent to Congress. This is last year's and we'll have available very soon the one for this year. As we circulate our international report around the world on CD-ROM, we will put that assessment of the United States on it.

I think it's deeply important that the United States be accountable for what it's doing to fight the problem at home, and we've done quite a bit. I know this because I chair our interagency committee on our domestic and international efforts. But I will be very frank about those areas for improvement, but I commend to you that report that lays out some recommendations.

Now, on law enforcement data, Congress directs us to ask for very specific information about investigations, about prosecutions, about convictions and about sentences. And we tussle with our friends around the world to ask them for information. And I reassure them, as I have with diplomats here in the United States and with government officials in capitals around the world, that we don't just ask for that data so that we can write a critical report. To have comprehensive data of how you are doing in attacking the problem of human trafficking is a sign of a government having a dedicated effort and seeing this as a specific crime. That data is not perfect. It's gotten better each and every year. There are countries that don't share data with us or share it imperfectly, from China to Iran to Cuba.

But we do believe that the kind of data on prosecutions and convictions that's through the report and that is collected together on page 37 with totals, that's where we've learned that only one-tenth of the prosecutions and convictions are in the area of labor trafficking, that those are the best compiled data that we've had to date and it's based on a very serious effort by U.S. diplomats.

Now, with respect to Venezuela, it's been upgraded. There has been some improvement. And this report is designed to be objective. We do not sit in the State Department and decide which countries we have broad criticisms on human rights for or that we have difficult and tense relationships with, and then just punish those that that's the case.

There are manifold problems of political pluralism and human rights in Venezuela, but truth be told, there have been some modest but real improvements in Venezuela that merit Tier 2 Watch List ranking, not a highly complimentary ranking but an improved one, including strengthening the statutory framework to fight human trafficking, notably for those who are internally trafficked within the country. There have been some investigations into human trafficking that have been opened in Caracas and increased police work at airports and border points. However, victims' services are limited and there are no dedicated trafficking in persons shelters. So there's good and there's bad, but there is evidence of modest improvement, and we try and tell it like it is.

MODERATOR: I think we have an additional question from New York, if you'd please state your name and media organization and ask your question.

QUESTION: Yes, my name is Diego Senior. I work with Caracol Radio for Colombia. It's basically the same question regarding about Venezuela, but for Colombia. Can you elaborate more about the things that you need to be improved, not only in our country in Colombia but in the rest of Latin America, maybe mentioning specific cases in order to - well, according to your report?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's a very good question. Colombia is an exemplar within Latin America. Is it Tier 1. Tier 1 countries aren't perfect, but they meet what are called the minimum standards for combating human trafficking in the U.S. law that governs how we prepare the report. There are strong law enforcement efforts, sustained prosecution efforts in Colombia, investigations, prosecutions, convictions, and an effort to count how - count and track how prosecutions are going with a database. There's cooperation with foreign governments to fight human trafficking. For victim protection, the Colombian Government has been increasing funding for NGOs.

There are some areas of improvement that are needed, particularly the need for a formal mechanism to identify human trafficking victims among vulnerable populations. Vulnerable populations are people in prostitution or people who are in migrant labor sectors. So that's the picture. Not perfect, but an exemplar.

Through the region, one sees both the problem of sex trafficking and the problem of forced labor. I guess I'd like to emphasize in the region one big case, Brazil. There is reason for some praise. President Lula has identified by name the problem as it is, slavery, in Brazil. And Brazil identifies companies that have not taken steps to improve their accountability of their supply chains. However, there remains a significant problem, particularly in the area of forced labor, in the sector in which charcoal is used to make pig iron for export. And notably, the situation in Brazil is captured by the success of rescuing 5,800 people in slave labor, and yet - and we learned that half of those are in the sugarcane plantations for the purpose of ethanol. So in the growing sector of biofuels, clearly, there's a forced labor effort. And there's a problem one sees in Brazil, and that is that of those cases of 5,800 victims, there is no associated criminal prosecutions for a single trafficker associated with those freed slaves.

MODERATOR: Other questions? Any final questions from New York? No other questions.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Happy to make myself available over the next couple of days if you have follow-up questions or your colleagues do.

MODERATOR: Well, then thank you very much. Thank you, Ambassador.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

98 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 9:26 AM ESTAMBASSADOR TEFFT'S STATEMENT ON GLOBAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 2008*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 370 wordsDATELINE: TBILISI, Georgia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Today the United States Government released the 2008 Global Trafficking in Persons Report. This year Georgia has again achieved Tier 1 status, due to sustained, significant effort that the Government of Georgia has made in the global fight against Trafficking in Persons (TIP). In the past year, the Government of Georgia recorded numerous accomplishments in combating trafficking, with noteworthy successes achieved through the following mechanisms:

Enforcing the comprehensive law against trafficking that was enacted in 2006. This law prescribes penalties up to 20 years imprisonment for convicted traffickers. Enacting a new law that punishes those who exploit the services of a trafficking victim. Further strengthening protection and assistance to victims of trafficking crimes, using the national victim referral program, and establishing a second trafficking victims' shelter to serve the Capital and eastern Georgia. Continuing implementation of the National Action Plan for 2007-2008 to increase public awareness about trafficking and promote its prevention. Training numerous Georgian soldiers and military personnel on TIP, prior to their deployments overseas, in order to serve in multi-national peacekeeping efforts. We congratulate the Government of Georgia, Parliament, and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) on this designation, which acknowledges the positive steps the Government has taken to eradicate this scourge which preys on men, women and children from Georgia and other nations.

In order to build on the momentum generated by these recent acts, we encourage the Government of Georgia to continue efforts to prosecute traffickers by furthering opportunities for law enforcement cooperation with regional governments, enhance procedures to identify, protect, and assist victims through the national referral system, and continue public outreach program on the dangers of TIP to the regions.

As always, the United States is eager to cooperate with the Government and NGOs on these points, and we look forward to our continued partnership in the fight against Trafficking in Persons.

Ambassador John F. Tefft United States Embassy Tbilisi, Georgia.

LOAD-DATE: December 7, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

99 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 3:37 AM ESTRELEASE OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 276 wordsDATELINE: SKOPJE, Macedonia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Today the State Department released the 2008 Trafficking in Persons(TIP) Report, which covers the period from March 2007 to March 2008. The report evaluates over 150 countries around the world and ranks them as Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List or Tier 3 countries, depending on the countries' compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Objective criteria are used to evaluate each country on its merits. The entire report is available online at www.state.gov/g/tip and the section regarding Macedonia can be found on the Embassy website (TIP Report on Macedonia).

This year's report designates Macedonia as a Tier 1 country, meaning the government fully complied with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking during the reporting period. The report specifically cites the government's improved capacity to identify, protect and provide service to victims. It also recognizes aggressive prosecution of trafficking cases and new TIP related criminal categories with stricter penalties.

The report recommends additional efforts in victim protection and assistance, specifically calling for further funding for shelters and nongovernmental organizations providing victim services. In addition, it encourages the Government of Macedonia to continue with the vigorous prosecution of traffickers using newly approved legislation and to expand demand reduction campaigns to educate clients of the sex trade about the horrendous crime of trafficking.

Text of Special Briefing by Secretary Rice and Ambassador Lagon:
<http://www.state.gov/secretary/rm/2008/06/105561.htm>.

LOAD-DATE: July 28, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

100 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 4, 2008 Wednesday 1:50 AM EST

AMBASSADOR TEFFT ISSUES STATEMENT ON GLOBAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT 2008

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 369 wordsDATELINE: TBILISI, Georgia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following statement:

Today the United States Government released the 2008 Global Trafficking in Persons Report. This year Georgia has again achieved Tier 1 status, due to sustained, significant effort that the Government of Georgia has made in the global fight against Trafficking in Persons (TIP). In the past year, the Government of Georgia recorded numerous accomplishments in combating trafficking, with noteworthy successes achieved through the following mechanisms:

Enforcing the comprehensive law against trafficking that was enacted in 2006. This law prescribes penalties up to 20 years imprisonment for convicted traffickers. Enacting a new law that punishes those who exploit the services of a trafficking victim. Further strengthening protection and assistance to victims of trafficking crimes, using the national victim referral program, and establishing a second trafficking victims' shelter to serve the Capital and eastern Georgia. Continuing implementation of the National Action Plan for 2007-2008 to increase public awareness about trafficking and promote its prevention. Training numerous Georgian soldiers and military personnel on TIP, prior to their deployments overseas, in order to serve in multi-national peacekeeping efforts. We congratulate the Government of Georgia, Parliament, and non-governmental organizations (NGOs) on this designation, which acknowledges the positive steps the Government has taken to eradicate this scourge which preys on men, women and children from Georgia and other nations.

In order to build on the momentum generated by these recent acts, we encourage the Government of Georgia to continue efforts to prosecute traffickers by furthering opportunities for law enforcement cooperation with regional governments, enhance procedures to identify, protect, and assist victims through the national referral system, and continue public outreach program on the dangers of TIP to the regions.

As always, the United States is eager to cooperate with the Government and NGOs on these points, and we look forward to our continued partnership in the fight against Trafficking in Persons.

Ambassador John F. Tefft United States Embassy Tbilisi, Georgia

LOAD-DATE: November 16, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

101 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

May 25, 2008 Sunday

Laying down the law

BYLINE: P. SelvaraniSECTION: ; Spotlight; LOCAL; Pg. 32LENGTH: 2299 words

AMERICAN international human trafficking specialist Dr Mohamed Mattar discusses Malaysia's Tier 3 status with P. SELVARANI and the enactment of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007.

Q: How did Malaysia end up being listed in Tier 3 in the US State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report 2006" and cited as among the "worst offenders".

A: The report (covering 149 countries, 16 on Tier 3) says Malaysia does not have a specific anti-trafficking law; shelter for victims of trafficking; and that it still follows a deportation immigration policy as opposed to giving victims right to stay.

I think the information there was all accurate at that time.

The purpose of the US report is to engage the governments. Constructive engagement. It is not about imposing sanctions. If you take a look at the history of sanctions since the passage of the TVPA (Trafficking Victims Protection Act), nothing really in terms of serious convictions was imposed.

That is not the purpose of the US report. The purpose is to assist the country.

You go to a country and ask, "Do you have a law?" If there is no law, okay, I'm going to help you to draft a law. You go to another country, you ask "Do you have training for enforcement officials?" No, then okay, I am going to help you with training.

And that's what the law (TVPA) talks about. The law talks about the United States assisting foreign countries in drafting laws, in training and taking all the necessary measures to protect victims of trafficking.

Having said that, you have to look at the US report in the context of reporting on the international level, US level and domestic level.

At the international level, this government is required to submit reports to the United Nations, every five years under the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) .

Article 35 of the CRC says "do not traffick children". Same thing under Article 6 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW). I looked at your last report in 2004, at what you said about Article 6.

And I took a look at what the UN committee told you. The UN committee told you exactly what the Americans told you, "Where is your anti-trafficking law? Where are the protective measures, including shelters?"

If you look at the UN and US response to the problem here, it talks about the same thing. That's why I am raising the issue, because there have been some comments that it's not a fair report.

On the domestic level here, the new law (Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007) establishes a council. One of the functions of the council is to gather information on trafficking.

If you ask me how is it here in Malaysia, I would not know. So the law says let us know what is going on, let's identify the problem and see the scope of the problem.

So the council will study the problem, look into statistics, make phone calls to all the agencies and ministries and ask them what they are doing. And then have your own report. And you are doing it with the UN.

But UN reports are general. I am talking about a specific report on trafficking. This is something Malaysia should be looking into, especially after the passage of the law. And it is a good law.

Q: How best should we implement the law?

A: Start with the shelters. The law talks about a place of refuge. My understanding from the meeting with the Women Family and Community Development Ministry recently (at the end of January) is that it has established two shelters - one for children, one for women.

So, it's time to open the shelters. How are you going to give effect to the law when you don't have shelters? The law says do not deport victims. If they should stay, let them stay and the law says let them stay for three months.

Another thing you should do is to train those responsible for implementing the law.

The law talks about not punishing the victim. Under the provision which says "immunity from liability", a victim of trafficking shall not be punished even if she commits a violation of the law, as long as the violation is a direct result of trafficking.

How are you going to do that? You have to train the immigration officers, otherwise they will arrest the victims and deport them.

The law establishes a council. That council is the key for the success of the law. The law says the council shall draft an action plan to combat trafficking.

The action plan is going to talk about specific measures with specific deadlines, with specific functions for every agency.

I was impressed by the fact that the law says an action plan. It does not only say "okay, we look into policies, we advise the government on policies".

Another important area is the maid trade. Domestic service by itself does not constitute a form of trafficking but if it entails an element of exploitation, it becomes a form of trafficking.

How? If you have a maid coming in from the Philippines, and you take her passport away from her the moment she arrives, you are denying her freedom.

Malaysian immigration officers tell me the law does not allow you to keep the passport. But it happens in reality. How are you going to inspect the household?

If you have workers in a factory, the labour laws allow inspections to make sure that the workers work in a safe and sound environment. But how are you going to inspect working conditions for maids? You have to have good regulations that ensure the protection of maids.

I understand that you will have maids who will run away, who steal. But if one, 10, 100 run away, it's no reason for you to deny every maid her freedom of movement.

It's good the new trafficking law has a definition of trafficking that is very wide, wider than the UN protocol. It says every time you exploit someone, that would be trafficking regardless of the form of exploitation.

The tools are there now. It's a matter of going through the law and making sure that all the provisions are applied.

Q: Malaysia has been categorised as a Tier 3 country. Does it mean that countries labelled otherwise do not have a problem?

A: Trafficking is a global problem. You see it in Italy, a Tier 1 country, you see it in Malaysia which is on Tier 3. The (US) report is not concerned with the scope of the problem as much as it is concerned with the government's efforts to combat the problem.

This is a point that people sometimes don't understand. All these countries on Tier 1 have problems. Italy has problems but it also has excellent legislation and measures to protect the victims. The report (looks at) seven (aspects) - prevention, protection, prosecution, extradition, co-operation, borders and immigration policies, and corruption.

Q: What was discussed during your meeting with Malaysian immigration officials?

A: Immigration officers should be trained. It's important because they are the first persons who come in contact with trafficking victims.

I was happy that they are going to include something on trafficking in their training programme. They have to have training so that officers understand the difference between smuggling and trafficking, the difference between a victim of trafficking and who should be deported.

They showed a willingness to develop executive regulations, guidelines on how to treat victims of trafficking as opposed to alien smuggling, criminals and so on.

Q: And your meeting with the Women, Family and Community Development Ministry?

A: They talked about the shelters but there's a matter of security. That is a valid point. If you are going to open a shelter, you need police protection because sometimes we are talking about organised crime. The ministry is putting the pieces together to make sure they are safe.

Sometimes you go to a country and the government officials you meet start by saying, "We don't really have a problem." I didn't see that in Malaysia.

Government officials here recognise that there is a problem and they are doing something about it. I found the political will and I found eagerness to put that law in force.

Q: How do you view the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act 2007?

A: It's a very good law. The Inter-Parliamentarian Union has asked me to write a handbook for parliamentarians on trafficking, basically about best practices.

Before I came here, I took a look at every law, including the Malaysian law. My handbook will have a reference to Clause 16 and 17 of the Malaysian law, where it says the past sexual behaviour of a victim of trafficking shall not be admissible.

That is protection. That's what we are talking about in terms of procedure. It allows the voices of victims to be heard and not to deny them that because of their past behaviour.

The other provision which is good is the consent provision. Consent is irrelevant in all cases of trafficking. I like that very much.

Some laws require you to prove force or coercion. In this country, you don't. And it makes sense because every victim of trafficking is vulnerable. And, if a victim initially consents to be recruited to come to Malaysia, no one can argue that the victim will consent to exploitation. The laws covers that.

I also like something about the Malaysian law that is new - the Witness Protection clause, protection of informers. To encourage victims to come forward and testify, you want to make sure they are protected.

This is especially important especially when you are dealing with organised crime.

Q: What was the outcome of your meeting with some Malaysian NGOs?

A: I judge a law good or bad by the presence of NGOs. The Malaysian law says three NGOs will be represented in the council. The NGOs are not part of the inter-agency task force but the task force shall consult these NGOs.

This is in compliance with international standards. It is an international obligation upon the state to co-operate with NGOs. The law makes the role of NGOs significant, central in the application of the law.

Q: How about the trafficking of children?

A: The Malaysian law is aware that there are cases of trafficking children. The law says the penalty for trafficking adults is 15 years in prison. If you are trafficking a child, it is 20.

Child trafficking for the purpose of labour can be a problem. Make sure that you are not recruiting labour under the age of 18.

That's why I was encouraged by the fact that the law says if you are going to recruit a child, exploit a child (for labour, sex), we are going to enhance the penalty.

Q: What is the trend in human trafficking now?

A: Human trafficking is on the rise as it is a very profitable business. You can recycle the "commodity" many times. We believe that trafficking in persons is the third profitable business of organised crime, after arms and drugs.

The other is corruption. If you talk about organised trafficking, you need a government official who is willing to take the file and facilitate the applicant.

All these laws that we have (helped) put around the world, they are all new. It will take some time to put more traffickers behind bars.

Prosecution of cases of trafficking should increase. As long as you are not prosecuting, it will happen again and again.

Traffickers are always a step ahead of all of us. There is a new trend now (by traffickers) to send the victim back to her home country to bring back new victims. If she doesn't come back, they will kill her over there.

We are talking now about more forms and methods of trafficking.

That is why we tell Malaysia with the number of foreign workers that you have, the law was imperative.

Q: How do you define human trafficking?

A: Human trafficking is defined in just one word - exploitation. In December 2000, the United Nations introduced the protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons, especially women and children.

The protocol supplements the UN convention against transnational organised crime.

Before this, we had other conventions that prohibited trafficking, for example under the CRC Article 35 prohibits trafficking of children, and CEDAW Article 6 prohibits trafficking in women.

Up till 2000, we really did not have an international definition. The protocol came in Article 3 and said if you transfer a person, transport a person, recruit a person, receive a person, harbour a person - these are the five acts - for the purpose of exploitation, that would be considered trafficking.

And Article 3 defines exploitation to include seven forms - exploitation of prostitution of others, other forms of sexual exploitation, servitude, forced labour or services, slavery, acts similar to slavery and removal of human organs.

This is how we define trafficking now. Traditionally, when people talk about trafficking, they right away think about prostitution. Trafficking may take other forms.

THE US Congress passed the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) in 2000, which provides tools for the United States to combat trafficking in persons, both at home and abroad.

One of the key components of the law is the creation of the Trafficking in Persons Report, an annual report assessing the government response in each country. Countries in the annual report are rated in tiers, based on government efforts to combat trafficking:

Tier 1: Countries that fully comply with the act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

Tier 2: Countries do not fully comply with the minimum standards but are making significant efforts to bring themselves into compliance.

Tier 2 Watch List: Countries require special scrutiny because of a high or significantly increasing number of victims; failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons; or an assessment as Tier 2 based on commitments to take action over the next year.

Tier 3: Countries neither satisfy the minimum standards nor demonstrate a significant effort to come into compliance. Countries in this tier are subject to potential non-humanitarian and non-trade sanctions.

LOAD-DATE: May 25, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

102 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

May 14, 2008 Wednesday

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS MEETING;
SUBJECT: SLAVERY AND SUPPLY CHAINS: WHAT BUSINESSES CAN DO TO FIGHT HUMAN TRAFFICKING;
SPEAKER: MARK LAGON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE; PRESIDER: DIANA TAYLOR, MANAGING DIRECTOR, WOLFENSOHN & COMPANY;
LOCATION: COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, NEW YORK CITY,
NEW YORK

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 8805 words

COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS MEETING SUBJECT: SLAVERY AND SUPPLY CHAINS: WHAT BUSINESSES CAN DO TO FIGHT HUMAN TRAFFICKING SPEAKER: MARK LAGON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE PRESIDER: DIANA TAYLOR, MANAGING DIRECTOR, WOLFENSOHN & COMPANY LOCATION: COUNCIL ON FOREIGN RELATIONS, NEW YORK CITY, NEW YORK TIME: 8:00 A.M. EDT DATE: WEDNESDAY, MAY 14, 2008

MS. TAYLOR: Morning, everybody. Good morning.

First we'll go through the administrative matters. Participants -- welcome to today's Council on Foreign Relations meeting. Participants around the nation and the world are viewing this meeting via webcast on the council's website, so please completely turn off, not just put on vibrate, your cell phones, BlackBerrys and all wireless devices to avoid interference with the sound system. And I would like to remind the audience that this meeting is on the record. So with that, let's get into the meat of it.

Our esteemed president of the Council on Foreign Relations, Richard Haass, probably put it best when he said human trafficking cuts across many of the most pressing issues of our time, such as immigration, global health, peacekeeping operations, and the illegal trade in weapons and narcotics. It's only beginning to get the attention that it deserves at the highest policy levels.

No one knows for sure what the scope of the problem is. Estimates range anywhere from 4 million to 27 million people -- men, women, children; enforced labor, bonded labor, child labor; in brothels, homes, fields and factories across the world. According to the U.S. government, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders every year -- which, of course, does not include the millions trafficked domestically within their own countries.

Those who are trafficked are the most vulnerable in society -- the poor, those without options, those who have no other choices. According to the Trafficking in Persons Report of 2007, approximately 80 percent of those trafficked across national borders are women and girls, and 50 percent of those are minors. And when women are trafficked, you can be assured they're going to be into situations of sexual exploitation. The public health issues around this are monumental.

Anyway, so here to talk to us about these issues, and specifically slavery and supply chains, is Ambassador Lagon. Thank you so much, Mr. Ambassador, for coming. And we look forward to your remarks.

MR. LAGON: Thank you for a super introduction, Diana. I thank you for taking the time for presiding today.

It's a delight to be with you at the Council on Foreign Relations, where I've been a term member and a permanent member and an international affairs fellow. It's nice to be back, having presented my work at one time as an international affairs fellow right here.

I'd like to thank my friend and former boss from Secretary of State Powell's policy planning staff, Richard Haass, for his invitation to address you this morning on a matter of utmost importance, combatting human trafficking -- or properly thought of, modern-day slavery.

Before we open things up for a real discussion, which is what's really important here, I hope to delve into the issue of trafficking for purposes of forced labor -- that area of human trafficking in particular -- and explore ways in which those in the private sector can work in partnership with those of us in government to confront this massive human rights challenge. Our success in confronting exploitation and coercion in the context of labor and supply chains will be found in our ability to work in partnerships.

As Secretary of State Rice has said, the solutions to the challenges of the 21st century are not going to be met by government alone. They come from all sectors of American society working together. Further, the secretary has stated we value business as a powerful partner in promoting accountable, non-corrupt government, the rule of law and transparency that attracts trade and investment. For that reason, included in the criteria of the annual Secretary of State's Award for Corporate Excellence, known as the ACE awards, is an emphasis on exemplary employment practices and provisions for a safe and healthy workforce.

Human trafficking is a dehumanizing crime that literally turns people into mere commodities. Globalization need not, in my mind, turn people into mere commodities. It's not an inexorable truth that happens. And we can do something about it.

But absent vigilance and a proactive effort, the era of globalization has witnessed not only sex trafficking but also slave labor. Goods enter the global marketplace while consumers have little or no knowledge of the supply chains and work conditions that resulted in their production. It's problematic for both the consumer and businesses, which are increasingly faced with the challenge of ensuring that complex supply chains aren't tainted by forced labor.

But American businesses are steadily moving to address this challenge in a quest to be socially responsible corporate citizens.

Let me give you an example. Last fall, Gap withdrew a line of embroidered blouses and ordered an internal investigation after news reports revealed apparent child labor abuses in a Delhi sweat shop. One child, Jivaj, from West Bengal, described his experience with these words: "Our hours are hard, and violence is used against us if we don't work hard enough. This is a big order for abroad; they keep telling us that. I was so tired I felt sick."

In the aftermath of these revelations, Gap publicly reiterated unequivocal opposition to such abusive child labor practices. In a tangible public-private partnership, Gap is now collaborating with the Global March Against Child Labor to establish an independent monitoring system for future production of its products and to examine industry-wide solutions to child labor issues. While Gap's response was swift, the frenzied media attention presents a nightmare scenario for even the best public relations specialist in the business.

More importantly, it gives us a glimpse of the nightmare scenario of a different sort, that of labor trafficking. As more labor is outsourced to developing-country markets, there's a greater likelihood that forced labor may occur with corporate headquarters possessing little or no knowledge before it's too late. Multiple layers of contractors, of subcontractors and a production chain present major challenges for accountability. Gap, for example, reportedly has 90 people located around the world whose job is to ensure compliance with their code of vendor conduct, and yet they still had the problem that they faced.

When I was lucky enough to lead the U.S. delegation to the U.N.'s Vienna forum on fighting trafficking last February, I met with the Gap's vice president for social responsibility. He spoke to me of the need to look at other issues besides the very important one of environmental issues, which he noted were the primary focus of many corporate social responsibility offices. I think that's right.

More recently, the American Center for International Labor Solidarity released a report that alleged labor violations in some operations in the shrimp processing sector in Thailand and Bangladesh.

The most egregious of the violations included forced labor, child labor abuses, and debt bondage. These acute cases of which I'm speaking are not only wage and hour disputes, not only health and safety violations but are indeed forms of human trafficking under the law and under international law.

While the Solidarity Center report was not the State Department report, the findings are consistent with anecdotal accounts of abuses in the sector which my office has received.

Just Monday, I met with the National Fisheries Institute, who initiated a meeting in light of the Solidarity Center report. Because their membership is keenly interested in working conditions at plants from which they purchase products, they recognize -- the National Fisheries Institute and the businesses within that coalition -- that such matters are important not only to my office but to the American consumer. Importantly, they're uniquely positioned to bring about change, which is what really matters, change in situations where forced labor and trafficking have been identified.

Before further exploring the opportunities for the private sector in the area of combating slave labor, I'd like to give you a little better sense of the scope of work of my office and trends we've been seeing globally in this realm.

The U.S. government has confronted human trafficking on a multitude of levels. In late 2000, the Congress passed and the president signed into law the Trafficking Victims Protection Act. This legislation authorized the creation of the office that I now direct and mandated the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which, by the way, this year is set to be released in just three weeks. That annual TIP Report is a prime tool for diplomatic engagement and international awareness, that kind of international awareness that's necessary for key efforts at prevention of the problem in the first place.

The bill institutionalized a cabinet-level task force chaired by the secretary of State to improve coordination and implementation of our anti-trafficking effort. I'm involved in the coordination of both domestic and international policy in fighting human trafficking -- be happy to speak to that in the discussion.

The reauthorization of the legislation in the year 2005 gives added attention to labor trafficking distinct from sex trafficking by requiring that the U.S. Department of Labor develop and make available to the public a list of goods from countries that the Department of Labor has reason to believe are produced by forced labor or child labor in violation of international standards.

The list is anticipated to be published next year, though there may be an interim report to Congress before then.

The list of products will serve as an awareness-raising tool to U.S. enforcement agencies, for the public, for governments, for NGOs, and ultimately, importantly, for the businesses community itself. The list is also consistent with U.S. government efforts to deny specific items produced in part or wholly by forced labor from getting access to the U.S. market. It's been the law since 1930.

Last year our Tracking in Persons Report shed light on the alarming trend of trafficking for forced labor purposes, including particularly through the use of debt to keep people in conditions of involuntary servitude. Debt is increasingly employed by traffickers as an instrument of coercion, especially for migrant laborers seeking a better life from developing countries.

In many regions of the world, such workers are required to pay extremely high commissions to local recruiters in order to secure a job abroad. The exorbitant commissions can be grossly disproportionate to the services rendered by the recruiter. In some instances, they amount to six months, or a full year, of the worker's actual pay once abroad. To pay the fees, workers either become indebted to the recruiter or take out formal or informal loans in their country of origin with the expectation of payment based on future wages earned abroad.

In many instances, workers arrive at the destination country as migrant workers, only to discover that they've been deceived by fraudulent representations of the recruiter as to the wages they can expect to earn in the new jobs. Moreover, the high debt that they've incurred makes them vulnerable to further exploitation by unscrupulous employers, particularly in destination countries where the enforcement of labor laws is weak and complaints of forced labor are likely to go unheeded.

Many multinational producers of goods have come to rely on low labor costs in their supply chains. As we better understand the processes which allow human trafficking to flourish, it becomes clear that it's not enough to simply monitor the conditions in supply chains. To get at the root of this problem, businesses must begin to ask how the workers arrived in the first place. The implications for companies, as for purchasers, are very real.

To get at the root of this problem, businesses must begin to ask how the workers arrived in their first place. The implications for companies, as the purchasers are very real.

Demand is of course also a factor in labor trafficking. Denying products made with forced labor access to markets is one key measure, that will ultimately reduce the incentive to exploit slave labor and encourage ethical business behavior.

There have been prominent allegations, concerning a wide range of products that have been potentially polluted, by forced labor in their supply chain, including cotton from Uzbekistan, apparel from India, shrimp from Thailand and Bangladesh and steel derived of Brazilian pig iron.

I believe consumers will increasingly demand, through their own benign market force -- that is to say, what they purchase -- they will demand that products be free of slave labor. If consumers have decided whether or not to buy a brand of tuna, based on whether dolphins are harmed in the catching of the tuna, they'll surely ask more and more over time if human beings are harmed in the production of imported products, particularly if the human beings are harmed by forced labor, by veritable enslavement.

Fortunately the news is not at all entirely bad. There are challenges, but there has also been marked progress. Some businesses are taking an active role in attempting to cleanse production chains of forced labor.

A promising example of such a voluntary effort is indeed the move by the pig iron producers of Brazil. The Charcoal Citizens Institute has established an effort to monitor the pig iron production chain for evidence of force labor. They're also notable corporate actors for using their individual expertise, their corporate strengths, their core competencies to counter trafficking and affect change.

This effort benefits the victims but it also benefits the companies, in that it builds trust and legitimacy, often garnering positive publicity, and earns support of increasingly socially conscious buyers and investors.

At a conference, hosted by Coca-Cola in Atlanta, on corporate social responsibility efforts to fight forced labor, where I was pleased to give the luncheon address, a top corporate manager at Hewlett-Packard talked about doing an investigation in Southeast Asia of a factory that HP was about to use.

Against the wishes of the factory's owners, their auditors insisted on seeing the residential facilities on factory grounds where the workers were housed. They found documents withheld, a common indicator of human trafficking. The workers were enduring forced overtime and no more than 15-minute breaks per day, not even enough to get to the commissary and back.

When the audit team informed the company that the site did not comply with the company's zero-tolerance rules against forced labor, they realized that they were helping nix a contract worth many millions of dollars. But the company took their recommendation to cancel the contract until conditions were changed.

And another example. LexisNexis is going beyond ensuring that they're not purchasing products from corporations and foreign governments that turn a blind eye towards human trafficking. In fact, they're supporting one of the leading anti-trafficking NGOs in Asia. At home, LexisNexis plans to develop a database of social service providers to assist the anti-trafficking NGO that manages the National Human Trafficking Resource Center and its hotline for the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

A business is providing a core competency to a leading anti- trafficking NGO which, as the most nimble actor, is staffing the hotline and resource center for a government entity. That's a marvelous picture of cooperative partnership. LexisNexis also plans to provide the same NGO with advanced LexisNexis products which allow them to research trafficking tips, better locate trafficking victims and determine linkages between trafficking rings.

And there are other notable initiatives undertaken by those in the private sector to combat human trafficking, which I'd be happy to talk about in our discussion, but our time is limited.

Let me conclude with a larger thought. Our message must be unambiguous and clear. Both the public and private sector have zero tolerance for labor trafficking of any kind. The unprecedented movement of labor and capital in chains of production of exportable goods promises enormous advances for the world, reaching many people.

But without rule of law, and without good corporate citizenship, it can lead to modern-day slavery.

I'm hopeful that we'll continue to see increased partnership with the private sector and civil society so that we might extend the manifold positive gains of globalization and curb the extreme forms of exploitation that I've been describing today. The field is wide open for opportunities and I'm really eager to help build partnerships with you.

Thank you for your attention, and I look forward to discussion. (Applause.)

MS. TAYLOR: Since I'm the moderator, I got the first question. (Laughs.)

Okay. Thank you so much and it's very -- it's good to know that there's a department within the State Department that's so involved in this issue.

During your remarks, you talked about the demand side of this problem. And it sounds very nice that people are going to buy products based on whether or not there's been human trafficking involved and wouldn't buy products where there wasn't, which brings up the question of how do they know whether there's been human trafficking involved and also the question of people -- especially when economies are going south -- are looking at buying the cheapest product as opposed to the product that has, you know, all these green things. They have a limited amount of money.

And so how do you answer that and the corporation that says, well, you know, these people wouldn't have jobs at all if it weren't for what we're doing for them? How would you --

MR. LAGON: You raise a really important point. I traveled to West Africa and looked at the sector of cocoa production, in which there's a good amount of child labor and, within it, some of the worst forms of child labor. So the question arises, if you were trying to clean up a form of human trafficking, the worst forms of child labor in a place like Cote d'Ivoire, do you have collateral damage against a bunch of people who are impoverished who might desperately need the work? Do you create disruptive effects on the sector?

You know, I think we need to take great care because, of course, government regulation and economic sanctions are a blunt instrument and you don't want to suggest that an entire sector is dirty. This Department of Labor report that I discussed, it will not mention specific companies, but it will mention countries from which imports come that may be tainted by slave labor.

This is tricky business. What happens for a company that isn't mentioned, but they export, I mean, they import something that's in the same sector?

I think we need to use the carrots rather than the stick. I think that we need to see companies feel that they can certify themselves, that they have clean supply chains, and try and communicate that as something, in addition to price, that would attract consumers.

But this is a problem that we need to get our head around. And I think we need some of the know-how from the business community, not just the money of the business community, to solve the problem.

MS. TAYLOR: So we were talking before. There was sort of a code that was put together by ECPAT, I believe that it's called, and I don't know what the acronym is. But basically it says to companies, what they can do within their companies, to figure out what's happening and combat trafficking in persons in the hospitality industry; training employees to know what the signs are that somebody is being exploited within their environs.

And I think that there is one U.S. company, that's signed up for this, and it's Carlson, which happens to be run by a woman.

Can you --

MR. LAGON: That helps, by the way.

MS. TAYLOR: Yeah.

Can you explain a little bit what's going on in this country, and what our corporations are doing along these lines? And why wouldn't more corporations have signed up for this code?

MR. LAGON: Yeah. Let me talk about the specific area that you asked about. This talk that I gave focused on the forced labor side of human trafficking. But this code of conduct has more to do with sex trafficking.

In particular, there's a, you know, horrifying form of sex trafficking, which is that when minors are pulled into prostitution, when they're exploited sexually. And those who are in the hospitality sector -- travel, tourism, hotels -- have a role to play to prevent this kind of grim phenomenon of child sex tourists, those who travel abroad looking for an opportunity to exploit children in prostitution.

Some great leaders in a partnership, ECPAT, which is a leading organization about child sexual exploitation being eradicated, the queen of Sweden, Carlson group, you cite, have come together pushing for a code of conduct.

Not enough actors abroad or at home have signed the code. Hundreds have.

I've actually travelled to coastal Kenya and to Cape Town, South Africa, and talked to hotel and hospitality industry people about fighting child sex tourism, and the larger hotels signing the code and then helping the smaller operation hotels also do it.

But you know, as I've talked to you about before, there's a perception on the part of industry -- oh, the discussion of human trafficking is kind of a downer. You don't -- you know, you don't want to include something in our in-flight magazine because it's not going to put people in the mood for travel if we're talking about child sex tourism. The fact is that there is a keen interest for business to demonstrate that it's on the right side of a moral issue. You can't expect businesses to do something that may require time and money if there isn't an interest as well as an ethical aim. And so I think the reputation of businesses of being clean is important.

You rightly note that it is women who play a leading-edge role. I was, you know, enormously impressed by the head of the Cape Town, South Africa, tourism association, who seems to be a human rights advocate. And she is determined that when Cape Town hosts the 2010 World Cup games, that it doesn't become an orgy of sexual exploitation in the form of human trafficking.

MS. TAYLOR: So let's get a little bit to the sexual exploitation side of this. There has been a heated debate among NGOs and women's organizations around prostitution and how it should be treated. Everyone has agreed that trafficking, slavery is wrong, and that smuggling people across borders for use as sex slaves is wrong, and forced labor is criminal and should be prosecuted. However, there is this debate over prostitution. Some activists say that routing it out will close the market for sex slaves. Others say that efforts to end trafficking should be concentrated on the underlying causes of that trafficking, which (is in general ?) the economic, social and political reasons that people end up in the hands of traffickers in the first place. Could you comment on the two sides of that issue?

MR. LAGON: You bet. I think there is -- this is a debate that often has too much heat and not enough light.

But I would like to explain the premise of the U.S. government. We believe that legalized prostitution helps create an enabling environment for the deeper problem of sex trafficking. People of decent, you know, moral standing believe that the more practical thing to do is to bring prostitution out into the open, regulate it, allow unionization.

It's my view and it's, in fact, been, you know, policy of the U.S. government for about six years that prostitution is a driver for sex trafficking and that it's dehumanizing and degrading by nature. And I see an inspiring coalition of people who range across the political spectrum who have been trying to raise awareness about that idea, from feminists on the left with Equality Now or the Coalition Against Trafficking in Women to the Christian conservative groups on the right.

I want to just go right at a question about whether there is a "witch hunt" to prevent funding to go to any NGOs who had the, quote, "wrong position" on prostitution. The actual policy of the U.S. government is to not give funding to NGOs to fight human trafficking if they are active proponents of legalized prostitution because of that enabling environment. An organization that has a neutral position is, you know, welcome to get money and frequently does. I've been involved in making decisions over and over again on grants. The question is whether a group is actively promoting the legalization of prostitution.

And I'd be -- I expect further questions, and I'd welcome it. But I think it shouldn't be a hot moralistic debate, a breast-beating one, but a question of practicality, of what's the best way to squeeze out the problem. And that's the way I look at it.

MS. TAYLOR: Let's talk about the best way to squeeze out the problem for a second here in the United States. If you go on Craigslist and you look under erotic services, there are thousands and thousands of entries there in every region of the United States.

What do you do about that? And the travel magazines and travel companies are saying, you know, have this great trip to whatever place it is and, you know, you're guaranteed to score. And how do you -- I mean, that's here in this country.

MR. LAGON: Well, this is very pertinent to the question of corporate social responsibility and how we can bring to bear the strengths in the business community to fight something. By the way, something that's really commendable is an effort by an NGO coalition, National Organization of Women and Coalition Against Trafficking Women, right here in New York, to try and get ads in the back of New York Magazine, that were very explicit about commercial sex, out of the magazine.

Craigslist has ads for sexual services. And it's not entirely clear that the individuals who have ads up, who are sort of -- you know, I will come meet you at a place to be determined, it's not in a brothel, but it's, you know, a place you'll -- the service will be delivered -- it's not clear that they're all adults. It's quite ambiguous. Some of them are under 18. Craigslist has taken a good step by putting up a disclaimer that suggests that they don't know whether the women involved are adults; but that's small potatoes. They need to go farther. That's one of the reasons why, on a trip to San Francisco on Friday, I'm going to be meeting with Craigslist.

Information technology has been, in fact, a driver of sex trafficking and sex tourism. Here's where you can go travel to use people as commodities, many of whom are sex trafficking victims. But information technology can also be an important tool for building awareness, for law enforcement tools, and we need to, instead of trying to deny the ways in which information technology fuels the problem, use it as a tool to fight the problem.

MS. TAYLOR: Thank you.

And with that, I'd like to open it up to the audience.

Yes, in the back? And actually, if you could stand up, take the microphone, state your name and your affiliation and then your question, that would be great. Thank you.

Q Hello. My name is James Tunkey, and I'm the CEO of a company called I-OnAsia. I have an investigator's background. And I have a comment and a question for you.

My comment is that the corporate social responsibility industry is big business, and it's really driven by a fear of lining up in front of Congress or on the cover of Time magazine.

What do you say to heads of corporate responsibility inside of companies who believe that hiring an audit firm to go out for them and do audits is all that they need to do, and who don't -- who rely on very open public audits to do this work. It appears to me that there are many out there who think that's all that they need to do, and I would go further and say that it seems to me that there's a number of a real perverse incentives in this whole racket. It seems to me that people who are providing the audits really are in many ways a public relations protection racket and the audits themselves are so open that they don't actually achieve their goals. How would you respond to that?

MR. LAGON: That's a great question. I wouldn't say that audits are a problem. I wouldn't reject them. I think it's great to try and build accountability, but I don't think they're enough. And I think, you know, the way to establish in the minds of business leaders that it's worthwhile to go farther, to establish that your supply chain is clean or to proactively fight human trafficking. You know, LexisNexis has done even more than I've described. I mean, it's underwritten a fantastic foundation in Cambodia, the Somaly Mam Foundation, fighting human trafficking.

I think the way to convince businesses to do that is for there to be exemplars. And I see my role is not to affect regulation and squeezing businesses and things that may have collateral damage, but -- nor to necessarily point the finger at bad actors and, you know, hope that consumers somehow, you know, pursue boycotts, but rather to raise up examples of those who are going farther than audits, that see that there's an interest in showing that they're better corporate citizens, to do something specifically aimed at helping fight human trafficking.

You know, business is in a position often not just to prove that it's not part of the problem but indeed to be part of the solution.

Poverty and desperation are drivers of human trafficking but without corruption and criminal behavior you wouldn't have people sucked into this situation. A company can help find victims. It can help that longer-term rehabilitation, retraining. It can help be a partner to governments in the developing world to develop rule of law to fight the problem. And while they're at it -- while they're cleaning up corruption and problems of rule of law they'll probably make a more benign environment in those developing countries in which to profit.

MS. TAYLOR: Isobel.

Q Hi, Isobel Coleman with the Council on Foreign Relations. Could you talk a little bit about the TIP Report which is coming out next month and the inevitable policy jockeying that goes on on the rating of countries? Traditionally, in years past, several Middle Eastern countries which are key allies of the United States have been named and given bad ratings in the TIP Report.

Could you talk about how -- behind the scenes, how those countries sort of jockey for a better rating or not and the role of corporations in influencing any of that decision and how the policy decisions are worked through interagency both within the State Department and with other governmental organizations?

MR. LAGON: Great question, and I welcome it.

I mean, our principal tool that our office has is the production of this international report. It is used for leverage with governments because it is the single one of the multiple human rights reports that has grades for countries, four different grades they can get. Countries complain because it's an irritant on our relationship but many are deeply interested in how they can get higher rankings and it becomes a form of leverage.

It's also a great tool for raising awareness around the world about the problems of sex trafficking and forced labor.

Each year, embassies come in with information they've garnered from governments and NGOs about the phenomenon of human trafficking and what governments are doing to fight it around the world. It comes out in early June each year. In the meantime, there's a process of my office writing the narrative about prosecutions against the bad guys, protection of victims and efforts at prevention, particularly through public awareness in each country. And we propose a ranking level.

Within the State Department we have a debate about whether that ranking level is right. Often the regional specialists who deal with the larger relationship with countries -- Brazil, Russia, India, you name it -- will argue about the broader context of what is possible in terms of the capacity of a country, other issues that we're dealing with. I will not deny the larger context is taken into account. It goes up to the most senior level of our department on some of these -- some friendly disputes about the rankings.

I'd say -- you asked about the role of the business community. I've seen precious little lobbying by businesses that we should go easy on a country. I've actually been surprised by that. It's almost been nonexistent in my experience.

But governments themselves go through elaborate campaigns as the report is being put together in the spring to talk. I've suddenly become a much more popular person in the spring for meetings.

There have a number of Persian Gulf states on the lowest tier of the report and they deserved it. I've got to say that in a number of Persian Gulf states to be a woman or to be a migrant laborer is a situation in which you're going to be treated as less than human. If you're a woman migrant laborer, you're really in a vulnerable position to not be accorded full human dignity.

But the report has gotten the attention of those governments and we've had some key successes in countries like the United Arab Emirates, which has improved. It's eliminated or tried to eliminate the phenomenon of camel jockeys, children who are migrants who are forced to be camel jockeys. It's tried to clean up a kind of boisterous -- a Dubai commercial sex scene.

And you know, we have tried to leverage change, including last year Kuwait knew that they might be raised from the lowest tier in a short term reassessment in September if they finally opened a shelter for victims of human trafficking that they'd been promising to do for four years.

And they did, which is a way of saying that our report does nudge people. And it appears as a carrot as well as a stick.

Q Hi. I'm Kate Hunt, the U.N. representative of CARE International, a humanitarian development organization. I know this isn't the key theme of your discussion. But there have been a lot of references to the root causes in the supply chain.

And I'm wondering if you could tell us a bit how you integrate your work with anti-poverty programs that provide particularly education opportunities for kids. Because that we find, in all of our studies, to be a major driver of children into labor.

MR. LAGON: I'm very glad you asked that, and there are many layers of it.

Let me start by saying, there's a lot of discussion about how poverty is the driver for human trafficking. And as I alluded to earlier, I think it's important that we realize how it is a driver, but that there are catalysts that go along with it -- lack of rule of law, corruption, frankly sadistic people who are willing to abuse people. Poverty alone is not the problem.

I think we'd be best off if we target certain areas of development work that really would have more fruit borne in fighting human trafficking. Clearly we need to create greater economic prosperity and opportunities worldwide, so that people aren't so desperate that they might believe a recruiter when they say, you're going to a wonderful job in another country if you just give me this exorbitant fee.

But I think targeting things like what you cite, in particular the education of girls, is essential. You know, I'm very fond of a program I was exposed to, as a Capitol Hill staffer and as an official on U.N. policy at the State Department before this job, of, you know, the Dole-McGovern program, funded for the Food and Agricultural Organization, of feeding girls in schools.

Which in traditional societies around the developing world, in which girls are typically not sent to school, when parents, when a father is shown, well maybe another mouth will be fed, they end up sending a girl to school. And that ends up being the lowest rungs of a ladder for a life of opportunity.

I think to diminish the vulnerability of a women, to both sex trafficking and labor trafficking, education is a really important thing. And so that's one area in particular.

As we try and develop our programs on -- we're quite involved, in my office, in giving grants to NGOs and international organizations, from UNICEF to the International Organization for Migration, to fight human trafficking.

We've increasingly, in the interagency group that I chair, built a coordination mechanism so that we talk about the foreign assistance given by my office, by the Population and Refugee Bureau of the State Department, by the Agency for International Development and by the Department of Labor. So the left hand knows what the right hand is doing and we make self-conscious decisions about who's spending what on child labor, on sex trafficking, on various things so we have complementary programs. And then from that context, we discuss the larger development agenda and where human trafficking fits in. I'd say there the leadership of Henrietta Fore succeeding Randy Tobias has really led us in the direction of vast improvement on coordination.

Q (Name and affiliation inaudible.) I'm looking for the numbers, what's happened in terms of human trafficking. Has it increased significantly over the years, or have we just discovered them more now we've got the ability to have cell phones, the Internet to tell these stories around from various countries? Or do you have an increase because of the ease with which you can have traffic, you know, transport around the world, both with supplies and also with, you know, certainly sex? So where does it go? Is it worse now or better now than it was 10 years ago?

MR. LAGON: Good question. I think that some elements of globalization are making it worse. This is a problem that we have some good estimates cited by our -- Diana, about -- we think there are about 800,000 victims each year, U.S. government estimate, although it's across borders, and millions more within countries like Russia, Brazil, India, who never cross borders. That's an important thing to know.

Trafficking in persons -- or human trafficking, a little easier way of putting it -- connotes that the movement or the smuggling of the person is the key thing. It's not. There's a reason why slavery is a better expression, not just because it, you know, gets the moral adrenaline going. What's distinctive by the legal definition of human trafficking -- under U.S. law and a U.N. treaty -- is the control and the level of exploitation. And so it's not just the crossing of borders.

We're trying to get a better sense of the scale of the problem.

But one thing I caution is that we not spend so much of our resources making sure we have the perfect global number when we can learn about more discrete patterns of human trafficking. If we can learn about the flow of people from South Asia to the Persian Gulf or if we can learn about particular phenomenon, it's a better focus of the U.S. government effort on getting data.

Q Alice Tepper Marlin, Social Accountability International. Thank you for that excellent presentation.

MR. LAGON: Thanks for coming.

Q I wanted to ask you -- in addition to talking about codes specifically on this one issue, to speak a bit more about broader corporate codes because there are hundreds of companies that have incorporated forced labor prohibitions into their own codes or joined multi-stakeholder organizations -- SAI, FLA, Ethical Trading Initiative -- whose codes include provisions against forced labor.

I think for this group it would be useful to look at any corporate code that your company may have and see whether the forced labor provisions in it are adequate and complete including items like possession of documents and to point out that the Department of Labor, Department of State and USAID have been active in supporting all of those groups.

And speak a little bit about what they do beyond auditing, going into integrated scorecards and development activities to help suppliers exporting to the U.S. to improve conditions and prevent child labor.

And one other thing -- it's a bit -- long question. But it's a very interesting policy issue. And that's the relationship between sugarcane in Brazil, one more sector, in addition to those you mentioned, in which child -- in which forced labor is endemic, and because of the relationship to the ethanol issue, makes for a rather complicated policy decision --

MR. LAGON: Yeah.

Q -- not only on labor but on energy that we'd very much appreciate your addressing. Thank you.

MR. LAGON: Let me start with the last. That's something that we were looking at in this upcoming report.

We have a lot of difficult energy decisions we need to face about dependence on oil. And so we're confronted with an interesting moral dilemma if you see that there seems to be not just exploitative labor practices, but the most acute exploitative labor practices -- slave labor -- that may be related to ethanol, in Brazil. And this is something we need to get at. And I hope we'll be talking about it more when we unveil our annual report on June the 4th. So I'm glad you asked that.

With regard to codes, a few things I'd say. And I won't present myself as the world's expert on codes. But there are lots of codes. I had a consciousness-raising experience when I went to this conference hosted by Coca-Cola in Atlanta on forced labor and how CSR could confront it, about, you know, the view of business is, oh, my goodness, there are all these codes and, you know, the venn diagram of them is all these crosscutting, overlapping circles. But I think it's important that codes that exist incorporate, you know, the issues that I'm raising.

Again, I want to present myself not as an office that dictates regulations, but that's a resource, and I hope will be a resource over the years for things that ought to be included in codes.

Now, if you want to look for a source that's not the State Department and not the U.S. government, I would highly commend principles that have been put out by the International Labor Organization, that's tried to form a business alliance against forced labor. And it has 10 principles that are quite good for trying to close the window of vulnerability, particularly in the area of migrant laborers becoming forced laborer human trafficking victims. And I commend those principles to you. There's a reason that they're going to be in the next annual report.

MS. TAYLOR: I just want to bring it back just quickly to the current administration's policy. The Bush administration's been accused of conflating sort of the two issues of trafficking and prostitution. In other words, their attitude seems to be that if you are a prostitute, you have been trafficked. How can these two issues be differentiated to help serve the best interests of those who have been trafficked against their will for multiple labor purposes versus those who engage in prostitution of their own accord?

MR. LAGON: This is a subtle issue. I have to say, you know, that on a conceptual level, you need to stop for a moment and think, when a woman or a girl is sold as a sex commodity, sometimes it's hard to draw lines between good prostitution and bad prostitution.

And I think that the degree of voluntarism becomes murky.

I'm sponsoring research by Harvard scholars around the world to ask the question of when people are drawn into the world of prostitution because under our law and as an international norm, there's a sense that a minor really doesn't have that voluntarism. And I think -- you know, there was a recent study that just indicated that in the sex industry in Chicago, the average age of entering it is a little over 16. So it's worth looking at.

Again, I try and offer a subtle position on this, not a direct equation, prostitution equals sex trafficking. But think of the situation as a world of prostitution and a sex industry driven by the demand of men seeking to use females -- as there is a demand, where do pimps turn to to boost the supply to meet that demand? They turn to foreign sources and they turn to those who are under 18. And so I think there is a clear connection.

And what I'd urge is those who have fought over this issue -- and I know people who share my premise have been just as involved in making this an issue of heat rather than light -- let's think about this. We all agree that the women or girls who are in a situation of prostitution ought not to be ostracized, ought not to be punished. We need to think about the customers who create the demand and we need to think about the exploiters. And perhaps we may have some disagreements of just how much an overlap there is between prostitution and sex trafficking, but that's a common approach. The most important thing is we ought not to punish those who are in prostitution. That's something we can agree on and that can help to find a way of moving forward, I hope.

MS. TAYLOR: I think you had your hand up before.

Q Thank you, Diana.

My name is Adam Green. I'm with the U.S. Council for International Business, and we organized the forum at Coca-Cola that Mark has been referencing.

A quick comment, then a question.

The comment was, at the forum -- it follows on the question you just raised -- it became clear that to engage the business community in a lot of these efforts, we really need to unpack the different issues and separate human trafficking from migration, from forced labor, from child labor, prostitution. And the forum really tried to focus specifically on forced labor, and even in that carve out things that aren't forced labor like mandatory overtime and things like that, and be very specific and only look at forced labor, because all these issues are -- are very different and you need a very different solution and engage in different ways to get there.

The question is, how -- what programs have you seen that effectively bring different factors together to resolve an issue? One of the -- one of the things we've struggled with is if industry tries to come in and solve forced labor on its own, it will really not work, because even in the pig iron example you had, it's the charcoal camps that feed the pig iron industry, and as companies dug back down into that supply chain they discovered that the local authorities knew full well where the camps were, which ones were good, which ones were bad. And after spending a lot of time and a lot of effort to discover this, find that locally it's all well known and a functioning part of the local economy. And so you end up hitting a brick wall, which is the lack of political will at the local level and corruption.

So are there areas where you've seen different actors come together to try to solve something collectively?

MR. LAGON: It's a great question. It's good to see you again.

You know, I'm terribly interested in ways that government works with civil society organizations. An important third actor besides government and business are civil society groups that can help the victims, help identify the problems. Often government around the world are allergic to NGOs and civil society organizations. And not just in dictatorial governments; let's face it, in a Japan, in an India, in a Mexico, there's an underdeveloped comfort with government working with NGOs. That's one thing that I think has been quite helpful.

I'm -- well, look, I mentioned the shrimp processing sector in Thailand. I've seen it myself. I mean, I've seen the Burmese migrant victims of forced labor with my own eyes in a shelter outside of Bangkok.

Let's look at a case recently of improvement. There was a raid in September 2006 of a forced labor camp in the shrimp sector. It -- a labor-oriented NGO pulled labor inspectors from the Thai government into an effort to have a raid. The raid happened.

Only the women who were among the victims were treated as victims. The men were deported. The law enforcement was an ancillary actor. There was no punishment for months and months. And the people ran the factory and the factory was never closed.

In March of this year, however, because of a developed dialogue between government, NGOs, business and within government -- importantly, law enforcement with labor inspectors -- there was a raid of another factory in the shrimp processing sector, but this time the men were treated as victims as well as the women. There was a closer cooperation of law enforcement with labor inspectors and prospects for accountability. And so those are some lessons I'd draw.

You asked me an important question. I just want to leave you with some idea of what human trafficking is. I mentioned before the word "trafficking" might connote movement when the real thing is the exploitation and control. You're right that we need to unpack what we're talking about.

I do not want to be ever accused of suggesting that cheap labor, petty exploitation, not paying full, you know, wages, is by nature human trafficking or forced labor. However, I do want to say something so people understand. Human trafficking includes forced labor. The worst forms of child labor and particularly forced labor are human trafficking. So when we're talking about forced labor it's one of the forms of human trafficking. It's wholly subsumed within human trafficking.

So while we should unpack that, please understand -- don't say, "Well, that's not a human trafficking problem. That's forced labor." It happens to be both.

Q Thank you.

Q (Name inaudible) -- New York Life International. It seems that the successes have been very episodic and that really the root solution is getting countries to either enforce or change their national labor laws. Speaking about the BRIC economies, what have you seen happen recently and what do you think we can expect to see happen over the next let's say 10 years?

MR. LAGON: I'll talk about a couple of the BRIC economies. Yes, the first step is to get a law on the books that establishes that human trafficking is a serious crime and in particular labor trafficking. Something we see around the world, however, is a problem of implementation.

In the annual report, there's a pattern over the years of a country rising up in the tier ranking because it's passed a law, and then a couple of years later it drops down because it hasn't implemented the law. We're seeing that there is a problem of countries not convicting those who are responsible for forced labor.

Let me just give you a thumbnail sketch of India and Brazil, since you mentioned the BRIC countries.

In India, there are three kinds of human trafficking: sex trafficking, child labor and bonded labor. There has been success, some real progress in India on helping victims, victim protection, working with NGOs in the area of sex trafficking and child labor. There's been rather limited success in holding the exploiters to account in all three of those areas of human trafficking. And noteworthy, despite laws on the books in India about bonded labor from the 1970s, it's an area of rather limited recognition of the problem, or action.

In Brazil, it's a really interesting mixed bag. This is a government in which the president, Lula, has said specifically that slavery is a problem, and it's a hot word in the history of Brazil. To connect today's forced labor with the legacies of slavery is really quite a striking thing on the part of Lula. They even have a "dirty list" of companies that have not cleaned up their supply chains and are held up, you know, in an ostracizing fashion.

Victims of human trafficking have been rescued by the thousands. And yet the problem remains law enforcement. The punishment for those who are responsible for forced labor has been minimal for some of the very reasons you mentioned, which is local authorities and local business wanting to smooth out the problem and not have anything more than a fine or a suspended sentence. That's a reason for more action.

Do you have any --

MS. TAYLOR: Oh. Do you have to -- do you have time for one more question?

MR. LAGON: The boss says -- (makes sound). (Laughter.)

MS. TAYLOR: No? Okay.

Thank you very much.

MR. LAGON: I'm delighted to spend time here. Thank you.

MS. TAYLOR: It was great. Thank you. (Applause.)

LOAD-DATE: May 15, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2008 Federal News Service, Inc.
All Rights Reserved

103 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

May 13, 2008 Tuesday 5:42 AM GMT

Malaysian accused of luring Thai women into sex work is first charged for human trafficking

BYLINE: By JULIA ZAPPEI, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 333 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR Malaysia

A Malaysian man who allegedly lured two Thai women into the country to become sex workers became the first person charged under a tough new law against human trafficking, a lawyer said Tuesday.

Ee Chin Kai pleaded innocent in a court in southern Malaysia on Monday to two charges of bringing in the 27-year-old women and exploiting them to work as prostitutes, said Ee's lawyer, Noordin Hussin.

If convicted, Ee faces up to 15 years in prison and a fine for each charge under the Anti-Human Trafficking Act that came into effect last year.

"This one could be a test" of the new law, Noordin said.

The court scheduled a hearing for Sept. 17 and released Ee on bail.

Ee was arrested in March while the women were allegedly staying with him, Noordin said.

Human rights groups have long lobbied for Malaysia to punish human traffickers, many of whom previously escaped prosecution because there was no specific law to use against them.

The U.S. State Department, in its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released last June, downgraded Malaysia from a watch list to a blacklist "for its failure to show satisfactory progress in combating trafficking in persons."

Malaysian officials have said the new law could resolve such complaints by encouraging police, immigration departments and other authorities to pursue, prosecute and convict alleged human traffickers.

Aegile Fernandez, a representative of Malaysian labor rights group Tenaganita, said the charge against Ee was a "plus point for Malaysia" and voiced hopes that there would be successful prosecutions in the near future.

Fernandez estimated that tens of thousands of people are trafficked into Malaysia each year. Most come from other Southeast Asian countries and end up in forced labor in the sex industry or in plantations, factories or other menial work.

According to police statistics, nearly 400 foreign women were rescued "from vice" between 2004 and 2006, but activists say there are many more victims because the sex industry is so lucrative.

LOAD-DATE: May 14, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

104 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

May 8, 2008 Thursday 1:10 AM GMT

US asks Asia to impose stiff punishment on labor traffickers

BYLINE: P. Parameswaran

LENGTH: 618 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, May 7 2008

The United States called on Asian governments Wednesday to slap stiff penalties on labor traffickers, some of whom it said were exploiting loopholes in bilateral agreements in the region.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's senior advisor on the human trafficking problem said smugglers in the region deserved "potent penalties" rather than "mere slaps on the wrist" under agreements aimed at managing rising workers' migration in the region.

"I would emphasize the need for those who are subject to labor trafficking, to forced labor to be granted justice in the form of the traffickers being punished not just through receiving suspended sentences or fines but serious penalties," Mark Lagon, the US envoy to combat human trafficking, told AFP.

The United Nations suggests that prescribed sentences should be at least three to four years for human traffickers.

"But if you look, precious few people in Asia or frankly in the world are receiving serious punishments for that half of human trafficking, which is forced labor -- the other half being sex trafficking," he said after speaking at an American Society of International Law forum.

He said his office, which blacklists nations considered the worst offenders of human trafficking every year, had noticed a rise in the number of reported cases of labor trafficking.

Some of the cases "are occurring within the context of otherwise legal transnational labor migration, which is itself on the rise," he said.

Lagon said "very few, if any," of agreements forged by governments, particularly in Asia and the Middle East, contained provisions explicitly protecting migrant workers from conditions of forced labor or other forms of trafficking in persons.

He said labor destination governments should consider steps to ensure that recruited workers were not victims of "fraudulent work offers" or "conditions of debt bondage" while labor source governments should "prohibit and punish" any such exploitation.

On the human trafficking issue in East Asia, he said there were "serious problems there and we are trying to act as the partner with governments in the region to fight this."

In Vietnam, for example, the problem of labor recruitment being vulnerable to human trafficking is "compounded by the fact that labor recruiters have a direct connection to the government," he said.

North Korea, Myanmar and Malaysia are the three East Asian nations included in the State Department human trafficking blacklist last year.

Unlike North Korea and Myanmar, which have been on the list for years, Malaysia was a surprise inclusion last year for failure to show "satisfactory" progress in areas such as punishing acts of trafficking and protecting migrant workers from "involuntary servitude."

Lagon said Washington wanted to hold talks on the issue with the Malaysian government.

"We are encouraged by Malaysia passing a law on human trafficking and I think we want to work more with Malaysia to have a dialogue about more assiduous steps that the government can take, because there are Malaysians who migrate and, importantly, people who migrate to Malaysia who end up victimized."

On China, he cited issues such as child labor, the "relocation apparently through manipulation and force" of Uighur Muslim women from the Xinjiang region as well as the "victimization" of North Korean refugees.

In India, there are "substantial problems" of sex trafficking, child labor and bonded labor, he said.

"While there had been some real efforts at victim protection in the areas of sex trafficking and child labor, efforts at enforcement, punishment of the traffickers have lagged and recognition of the breadth of bonded labor continues to be an area of omission by India," he said.

LOAD-DATE: May 8, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

105 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

May 7, 2008 Wednesday 12:29 PM EST

AMBASSADOR LAGON COMMENTS ON CLOSING WINDOW OF VULNERABILITY

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 4863 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

Ambassador Mark P. Lagon, Director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

It is good to be here this afternoon at the American Society of International Law-an organization whose work I have long admired.

Today, I plan to focus my talk on migrants and their vulnerability to becoming human trafficking victims. This phenomenon is not that of cheap labor or petty exploitation. I am talking about the acute but all too frequent cases of veritable enslavement. Its victims should be no less accorded basic human dignity than any other people. It is these universal principles of dignity and decency which, while not law in and of themselves, have historically informed our understanding of basic human rights from the Declaration of Independence to the Universal Declaration on Human Rights. The President and Secretary Rice have called these principles "the non-negotiable demands of human dignity." It is this fundamental respect for human dignity that has inspired both domestic and international legal efforts to combat trafficking in persons, a phenomenon to which migrant workers are particularly vulnerable.

Human trafficking is the slavery of our time. Exactly two hundred years ago Britain and the United States formally outlawed the transatlantic slave trade, and a few decades thereafter the practice of slavery was expunged from North America as well (with a heavy dose of justice enforced by the British navy and of bloodshed in the American Civil War). History is repeating itself by producing a reprehensible by-product of globalization that is today's analog to the transatlantic slave trade.

According to the U.S. State Department there are today 175 million migrant workers in the world, some of whom are susceptible to being lured into the trap of slave labor and sex trafficking. While the impetus for migration varies, more and more countries are economically dependent on the export of human capital and the promised income, or remittances generated for the source country. In today's global economy there are manifold and diverse contributing factors including poverty, lack of job opportunities, political instability and in some cases repression....all of which compel people to leave their homes, and the life that they know, sometimes spurred on by the false promises of malicious manipulators.

In order to understand the true horror of this exploitation it is important that we have a clear picture of the nature of human trafficking, or more plainly put, modern day slavery. It is a horror with which I am intimately acquainted having traveled the world in my capacity as Director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, meeting numerous victims, each with tragic stories unique to them as individuals but with common threads running throughout of recruitment, coercion, deception and ultimately an acute form of exploitation where they lose control of their lives.

Human trafficking is a dehumanizing crime which turns people into mere commodities. According to the U.S. intelligence community, of the estimated 800,000 people trafficked across international borders annually, 80 percent of victims are female, and up to 50 percent are minors. Every day, all over the world, people are coerced into bonded labor, exploited in domestic servitude, enslaved in agricultural work and in factories and forced into prostitution. In many cases they are raped, beaten, starved and brutalized. This figure does not account for the many millions more trafficked within their own countries - because under U.S. law and international law "trafficking in persons" is not necessarily defined by crossing international borders but by qualitative elements of exploitation and control.

My office is presently in the midst of writing our flagship publication, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report which ranks countries around the globe into tiers for their efforts to eliminate human trafficking. While there are certain elements of the Report that are consistent year after year-the report is ultimately organic not static. We gather input from embassy posts, non-governmental organizations, activists, foreign governments, academics and the media to inform our findings. The timeliness of the data allows us to be on the cutting edge of emerging trends and new realities in the field-of which the plight of some migrant workers figures prominently.

In the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report, we noted several disturbing global trends which speak directly to this issue-these are trends which we will explore further in our 2008 report set to be released in June of this year. One of these is use of debt, employed by traffickers, as a tool of coercion. In both labor and sexual exploitation, debt is increasingly used to keep people in servitude.

The very factors that push migrants to leave their countries are often the same factors which make some of them vulnerable to the exploitation of slavery when they arrive in a new destination- where people of ill intent seek to take advantage of them. For example, millions of Burmese, facing bleak economic conditions and the prospect of forced labor at home, have had to flee their homes and villages, usually without legal documents. The International Labor Organization considers Burma to harbor a significant share of the estimated 2.2 million victims of state-imposed forced labor globally. Burma's repression bleeds out into the surrounding region for as Harvard University professor Stanley Hoffmann wrote in the book Duties Beyond Borders in 1981, and it is no less true today, "There is no way of isolating oneself from the effects of gross violations abroad: they breed refugees, exiles and dissidents..."¹ The grim situation in Burma serves to drive desperate people from their homes often in irregular migration patterns.

Allow me to introduce you to one Burmese woman who I met shortly after starting in this job. Aye Aye Win was a young woman in search of work beyond her own tortured country. A recruiter painted a beautiful picture of work in a neighboring country. Aye Aye assumed substantial debt to cover up-front costs required by the recruiter for this job placement. Together with some 800 Burmese migrants, many children, Aye Aye was "placed" in a shrimp farming and processing factory. But it wasn't a job. It was a prison camp. The isolated 10-acre factory was surrounded by steel walls, 15 feet tall with barbed wire fencing, located in the middle of a coconut plantation far from roads. Workers weren't allowed to leave and were forbidden phone contact with anyone outside. They lived in run-down wooden huts, with hardly enough to eat.

Aye Aye tried to escape with three other women. But factory guards caught them and dragged them back to the camp. They were punished as an example to others, tied to poles in the middle of the courtyard, and refused food or water. Aye Aye told me how her now beautiful hair was shaved off as another form of punishment to stigmatize her. And how she was beaten for trying to flee.

This is forced labor. This is trafficking in human beings. This is modern day slavery.

The ILO estimates that at any given time more than 12 million men, women, and children are "deceived or coerced into forced and bonded labor, involuntary servitude, and sexual slavery." In countries where desperation leads people to migrate, it is easy for human traffickers and recruiters to market a dream, or a lie, to vulnerable men, women and children like Aye Aye Win.

Before we proceed, it is important to clear up any misunderstanding that may exist about the difference between the issues of human trafficking and human smuggling. Human smuggling is the illicit transfer of someone across sovereign borders, often with the consent of the person being smuggled. Human trafficking, by contrast, involves a defining element of gross exploitation and control over an individual. As recognized in both U.S. and international law, human trafficking victims either do not consent to their situations, or if they initially consent, later become victims of force, fraud or coercion. The ongoing exploitation of the trafficking victims generates illicit profits. Once we understand that migrants who are victims of human trafficking are just that-victims- the sooner we will have a proper perspective, which looks beyond simply law enforcement mechanisms, for grappling with how to confront this challenge.

National laws and policy, bilateral accords, and international instruments are among the legal mechanisms available to close the windows of vulnerability of migrants to enslavement.

The United States is Party to a number of international treaties pertinent to the severe victimization of migrants which constitutes human trafficking, including the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which explicitly says, "No one shall be held in slavery; slavery and the slave-trade in all their forms shall be prohibited. No one shall be held in servitude. No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labor."

We are a Party to the Slavery Convention as well as its Supplementary Convention which addresses "Practices Similar to Slavery" including the sort that some migrants are subjected to. These instruments require parties to, "prevent compulsory or forced labor from developing into conditions analogous to slavery...and provides for the complete abolition of debt bondage and serfdom..." The U.S. also belongs to two Optional Protocols to the Convention on the Rights of the Child. One protocol-on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography-provides Parties with detailed requirements to end the sexual exploitation and abuse of children and addresses ways children become victims of commercial sexual exploitation as a form of human trafficking. The other protocol addresses children in armed conflict-with forced child recruitment, often by means of abduction, constituting a unique and severe form of human trafficking involving the exploitation of minors in conflict zones. I'll join a delegation in Geneva later this month to present the U.S. record implementing these two important protocols to a U.N. monitoring body of experts.

Of perhaps greatest significance, the United States is party to the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime. Among other provisions, this Protocol, requires parties to criminalize all trafficking in persons, including trafficking for purposes of forced labor or services.

Notwithstanding such international agreements, however, my office has noticed in recent years a rise in the number of reported cases of labor trafficking, some of which are occurring within the context of otherwise legal transnational labor migration, which is itself on the rise.

Let me provide one example featured in the 2006 Trafficking in Persons Report which my office produces: A contract labor agency in Bangladesh advertised work at a garment factory in Jordan. The ad promised a 3-year contract, $425 per month, 8 hour workdays, 6 days a week, paid overtime, free accommodations, free medical care, free food, and no advance fees. Instead, upon arrival, workers (who had been obliged to pay exorbitant recruitment fees in Bangladesh) had their passports confiscated, were confined to miserable conditions, and prevented from leaving the factory. Months passed without pay, food was inadequate, and sick workers were tortured. While the Government of Bangladesh has taken some steps to crack down on illegal and abusive recruiters, clearly more needs to be done.

In some regions of the world, particularly Asia and the Middle East, a number of governments have entered into bilateral agreements or Memoranda of Understanding (MOUs) in order to encourage and formally manage the flow of migrant workers from one country to another. To date, however, very few if any of such agreements contain provisions explicitly protecting the workers in question from conditions of forced labor or other forms of trafficking in persons.

We are encouraging source and destination governments in these regions to collaborate in confronting the problem of labor trafficking, including, where appropriate, through incorporation in their bilateral agreements and Memoranda of Understanding specific measures to prevent trafficking in persons.

We are also encouraging governments participating in existing multilateral initiatives such as the Colombo Process and the Abu Dhabi Dialogue to collaborate with the ILO, in light of its mandate regarding the elimination of forced or compulsory labor, as an integral participant. Mark Taylor, Senior Coordinator for Reports and Political Affairs in my office, who has helped immensely to form my thinking on human trafficking in the area of migrant labor, took part in the Abu Dhabi Dialogue whereby Asian labor sending countries were able to share experiences and best practices on overseas employment.

Future bilateral agreements and MOUs regarding migrant labor should be negotiated in a transparent fashion, should be conducted in a transparent fashion, with participation of civil society and associations representing workers and employers, as appropriate. Such agreements should be made publicly accessible, and explicitly protect workers from conditions of forced labor and trafficking in persons.

Labor destination governments should consider steps to ensure that workers recruited for work in their countries are not the victims of fraudulent work offers or conditions of debt bondage. The activities and practices of local recruitment agencies should be monitored, and such agencies should be criminally accountable for acts of force, fraud and coercion committed against foreign workers. All criminals responsible for human trafficking deserve potent penalties rather than suspended sentences or fines worthy of only petty infractions or other mere slaps on the wrist.

Labor source governments should prohibit and punish the exploitation of migrant workers by labor recruiters who recruit workers through fraudulent offers of work conditions, or who impose fees that lead to situations of debt bondage. Source country governments should ensure that labor recruiters are properly vetted, licensed, and monitored, and should increase efforts to raise awareness of risk associated with labor recruitment and migration.

Too often, people are enticed into fraudulent offers of work abroad that require a steep payment up front for the services of a labor agency arranging the job or a payment that goes straight to the future employer. To pay such fees, workers in poorer countries either become indebted to the recruiter, or take out a formal or informal loan in their country of origin, with the expectation of payment based on future wages earned abroad. In many instances, worker expectations and repayment terms are based on exaggerated and false representations by recruiters as to wages they can expect to earn in their new jobs.

Once at the overseas worksite, however, such high levels of indebtedness can make workers vulnerable to further exploitation by unscrupulous employers. Such employers use this information as leverage to subject workers to terms much less favorable than promised at the time of recruitment (e.g. more hours, less pay, and harsher conditions) - including in some instances, conditions that amount to debt bondage.

The United Nations Protocol on Trafficking in Persons calls on governments to protect victims of trafficking within their respective territories, which includes foreign migrants. For purposes of the Annual Trafficking in Persons Report, one important component of victim protection that my office considers is whether foreign victims of trafficking are provided with legal alternatives to deportation to countries where they face hardship or retribution. Within the United States, the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (TVPA), the legislation which created my office, also created the T Visa which allows trafficking victims to remain in the United States and assist federal authorities in the investigation and prosecution of human trafficking cases, thereby giving victims a place of refuge in the aftermath of severe exploitation. This applies even to individuals who may have originally come here without proper documentation, if it is clear that they were recruited or transported through force, fraud or coercion, for the purpose of modern day slavery.

From 2001 through January 2008 the U.S. Department of Homeland Security granted approximately 2,000 T visas to trafficking victims and their families, allowing them to remain in the United States. Additionally, human trafficking survivors from as many as 77 countries have been certified to receive certain U.S. federally-funded or administered benefits.

While this victim-centered approach is laudable and something that we encourage foreign governments to implement, there is still room for us to improve at home. Many trafficking victims do not know that this form of relief exists. Greater government efforts need to be made to educate this highly vulnerable group of victims as to what protections are available to them. Otherwise, like in so many countries, victims hidden in the shadows of complex, insidious manipulation will be afraid to come forward and seek help - afraid to be treated themselves as criminals and illegal aliens, to be treated as what Kevin Bales, President of Free the Slaves, calls "disposable people".

The plight of exploited migrants, some of whom are susceptible to human trafficking, often becomes enmeshed in our own domestic debate on immigration. Regardless of where one falls on that particular issue, we should be able to agree that as a nation which holds dear the plight of the "huddled masses" depicted in Emma Lazarus' iconic poem at the base of the Statue of Liberty, that those who arrive on our shores only to experience victimization in the form of human trafficking, deserve proper care befitting our great nation, the global leader in the abolitionist movement to eradicate those in labor slavery and sex slavery.

It is important that labor destination governments encourage workers to report alleged cases of veritable forced labor to law enforcement authorities and institute measures to ensure a worker can leave an abusive employer and seek legal redress without fear of automatic detention and deportation. In short, destination countries should take steps to make migrant workers aware of their rights. These efforts may be more effective where there are incentives for workers, such as provision of shelter, medical care, free legal aid with translation services, the ability to work while awaiting resolution of investigations, and avenues for victims to claim and obtain restitution and attention to their safety against possible retribution for their having filed a complaint.

In many Gulf states, which rely heavily on foreign migrant labor, individuals working as domestic servants, often migrant women, are particularly vulnerable to acute sexual and labor exploitation. They labor in low-paying, poorly regulated sectors. In many such countries, to be a woman or a migrant often means less than equal treatment under the law and in practice. But to be a woman migrant leaves you in a particularly unenviable position.

So-called "sponsorship laws" prevalent throughout the Gulf have in practice been abused in too many cases by unscrupulous employers, who leverage the migrant worker to do whatever they demand or else run the risk of deportation due to alleged breach of contract, and the withholding of pay. Take Nour Miyati, an Indonesian woman who sought a brighter future for her nine-year old daughter. She worked as a domestic for four years in a Middle East state. She was treated fairly and was able to send money back home so that her daughter could stay in school. Then her fate took a turn under a new employer who confined her to his house, denied her pay, and tortured her. Injuries she suffered to her hands and feet resulted in gangrene that required the amputation of her fingers and toes.

Tragically Nour was twice victimized. Despite having escaped these horrific circumstances, she was arrested for 'running away' under the country's sponsorship laws and was not accorded proper status as a victim of trafficking. Workers such as Nour may escape abuse in private homes or work sites only to be denied an exit permit to leave the country. Labor destination countries should have procedures in place to ensure that foreign workers are screened for evidence of trafficking prior to being removed for lack of legal immigration status. Training law enforcement officials and immigration officers on victim identification, or the deployment of trained victim identification specialists, are among the measures destination countries should consider in order to improve their ability to identify trafficking victims.

It is our responsibility to accord status to migrants as rights-holding humans in full. In my work leading the U.S. anti-human trafficking office I urge governments in the Gulf and elsewhere to limit the power of recruiters and sponsors and strengthen the human rights of foreign workers, often viewed as sub-human. I delivered this message in Oman, Bahrain, UAE and Kuwait earlier this year.

Trafficking of migrant women is particularly relevant in the realm of commercial sexual exploitation. As migration becomes increasingly feminized more migrant women are at risk of being trafficked into prostitution. Thirty-year-old Mara migrated from Ukraine, leaving behind her husband and two children, to take a housekeeping job in Italy. Recruiters from an employment agency promised her a high salary. But once there, she was taken to a brothel where the owner said he had purchased her for several hundred dollars. He said she owed him money for the plane ticket. For nine months, Mara was controlled by this trafficker, who beat her when she refused a client. If a man complained about her, the brothel owner increased her debt. Mara was freed only when the Italian police raided the brothel. Charged with prostitution (blamed as the victim), she was deported to Ukraine.

Clinical evidence documents that many people used in prostitution want to escape. They are often beaten, raped, and terrorized. Many of those trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation exhibit signs of post-traumatic stress disorder on the same scale as combat veterans or victims of dictatorships' terror, according to Dr. Melissa Farley in field research published in the Journal of Trauma Studies in 2003. Research conducted by the International Organization for Migration found that, "Almost 100 per cent of the trafficking victims returning to Moldova who were forced into prostitution manifest various forms of post traumatic disorders, depression, anxiety and mental illness. In Ukraine, of the 249 trafficking victims assisted by IOM, 185 women had psychological problems and 59 women were reported to have psychiatric disorders."²

We must not fall into the trap of believing that more "management" in the realm of prostitution is what is necessary. Quite the contrary. Official U.S. policy since December 2002 has recognized that prostitution is inherently harmful and dehumanizing and contributes to the phenomenon of human trafficking. A few years ago, the U.S. Government offered a resolution at the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women that highlighted this link and called on countries to take steps to confront the demand for commercial sex but we still have not gotten far enough in addressing the demand which fuels the victimization of women, including migrant women.

As I have already noted, abuses of migrants do not simply involve far off lands. Allow me to share a story a bit closer to home. Molina, a 30-year-old Mexican, was held against her will and forced to work in a factory in Southern California, making dresses from 5:30 in the morning until 11 at night, seven days a week. She was not allowed to take a shower or leave the factory, at night sharing a small bed with another woman. She received one meal of beans and rice a day. If she didn't sew fast enough, her boss would pull her hair, pinch and slap her. The factory doors were locked during the day and at night a watchman prevented her from leaving. "If we wouldn't do what she [her boss] said, she told us somebody who we love would pay the consequences," says Molina. Fortunately, Molina qualified for a T Visa under U.S. law and she now works as a security guard in Los Angeles; she's completed English classes and is working toward her GED.

I chair the interagency Senior Policy Operating Group on human trafficking. To elicit cooperation from other nations, they need to see that we acknowledge having the same problem here in the U.S. as Molina's story illustrates, and that we are willing to share lessons learned as well as talk about areas where there is room for improvement. I work closely with domestic agencies to show other nations we are not just delivering diplomatic demands to change but rather are deeply committed to change ourselves. Several U.S. agencies' officials did so this past February at the UN Vienna Forum on Human Trafficking, where I had the privilege to lead the U.S. delegation.

I close with this story of Molina in the hopes of reminding us that in an age of globalization, and the tremendous benefits that international migration brings, we can not be blind to the dark side of this global economy-for it is in these shadows that an actual trade in human beings is permitted to flourish. Whether it is an Indonesian migrant worker trapped in factory in the Middle East, or an Eastern European prostituted girl held captive in a brothel in Western Europe, or a young North Korean bride forcibly married to a Chinese man-these are the faces of modern day slavery. These are migrants. They have intrinsic value every bit as much as any other fellow human being. They have become ensnared in forced labor and human trafficking and they demand our attention, they cry out for justice, they yearn for dignity.

Governments, both at the domestic level and through international cooperation, must work to improve protection for those migrants who are victims of trafficking as well as respect for their human rights, -ensuring they are not treated as non-people. As I have argued here today, most of these arrangements need not take the form of new treaties and multi-lateral institutions. As Anne-Marie Slaughter has argued in A New World Order, "In this context, a world order based on government networks, working alongside and even in place of more traditional international institutions, holds great potential."

When I was trained as a political scientist (not as a lawyer) I was exposed to the jurisprudential school, which while old fashioned, is the construct we need to figure out how to bring public law to bear to end the enslavement of some of the world's migrants. Spearheaded by Myres McDougal of the country's leading intellectual Law School, Yale University the so-called New Haven approach emerged. He worked closely with the social scientist Harold Lasswell, both very focused on value systems. In 1959, McDougal and Lasswell wrote, "Our overriding aim is to clarify and aid in the implementation of a universal order of human dignity." To decrease migrants' vulnerabilities to human trafficking, we indeed need to fashion tools in public law and also in less formal arrangements which self-consciously seek to serve the New Haven school of international law called "human dignity."

Most important of any of the existing instruments in accomplishing this end is the UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol, a state-of-the-art UN instrument completed shortly after our own domestic law passed. That Protocol should be the touchstone, even more than ILO conventions or migration agreements, when the problem is indeed the special calamitous horror of human trafficking. Even more important than ratifying the Protocol is implementing it. And even more important than enacting laws consonant with the Protocol is vigorously enforcing those laws.

I have tried to sketch for you some needed arrangements for that "world order of human dignity" McDougal wrote of fifty years ago and Slaughter has more recently. Some of them are more formal, such as the U.N. Protocol on Human Trafficking, and some less formal, such as MOUs between certain source and destination countries of migration. Yet make no mistake, the common denominator of these arrangements remains promoting human dignity.

1 Hoffmann, Stanley, Duties Beyond Borders: On the Limits and Possibilities of Ethical International Politics (Syracuse University Press, June 1981) 111.

2 International Organization for Migration: the Migration Agency, Particularly Vulnerable Migrants, April 3, 2008 <http://www.iom.int/jahia/Jahia/pid/610>

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

106 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal Grant Opportunities

April 15, 2008US Agency for International Development; Sustainable Interventions to Combat Trafficking in Persons in Bosnia and Herzegovina (SUSTAIN)

SECTION: OTHER

LENGTH: 270 words

TITLE: Sustainable Interventions to Combat Trafficking in Persons in Bosnia and Herzegovina (SUSTAIN)

DESCRIPTION: The overall objective of this three-year program is to support USG Trafficking in Persons Strategy (TIP) for Bosnia and Herzegovina (BiH), specifically helping BiH to remain a Tier 2 country and, if possible, to progress to a Tier 1 country. The program will help to strengthen the capacity of BiH's Government to combat TIP and to implement the country's National Action Plan. This objective will be accomplished through the following prevention and protection interventions:

- 1) Insertion of trafficking prevention education in schools
- 2) Support for victim assistance
- 3) Support to the implementation of the National Anti-Trafficking Plan of Action

This program will support, wherever possible, interventions that are by their nature self-sustaining.

DOCUMENT TYPE: Cooperative Agreement

FUNDING OPPORTUNITY NUMBER: 168-08-09

POSTED DATE: 20080415

ORIGINAL DUE DATE FOR APPLICATION: 05272008

CURRENT DUE DATE FOR APPLICATION:

ARCHIVE DATE:

FUNDING INSTRUMENT TYPE: Cooperative Agreement

CATEGORY OF FUNDING ACTIVITY: Other

CATEGORY INFORMATION: Sustainable Interventions to Combat Trafficking in Persons in Bosnia and Herzegovina (SUSTAIN)

EXPECTED NUMBER OF AWARDS: 1

ESTIMATED TOTAL PROGRAM FUNDING: 855000

AWARD CEILING: 855000

AWARD FLOOR: 855000

CFDA NUMBER: 98.001

COST SHARING OR MATCHING REQUIREMENT: N

ELIGIBLE APPLICANTS: 99

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION ON ELIGIBILITY: Not Available

AGENCY NAME: US Agency for International Development

OFFICE: Hungary USAID-Budapest

CONTACT: Ashraf Soos

Contracting Specialist

Phone 06304754698

LOAD-DATE: April 17, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

JOURNAL-CODE: FG

107 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

April 2, 2008 Wednesday 3:43 AM EST

GUINEA FEELS EFFECTS OF TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 525 words

DATELINE: CONAKRY, Guinea

The U.S. Agency for International Development issued the following press release:

An elderly man from a remote area of Guinea broke into tears when he related how he was powerless to assist an orphan boy taken from his family and sent to a gold mine where he was forced to work from dusk till dawn. In Upper Guinea a mother explained that her daughter left home one day and never returned, apparently suffering a fate similar to other children in the village. These cases are not isolated incidents, but form a disturbing pattern of trafficking in persons that targets young children and even babies.

The Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report ranks countries worldwide on a tier system based on their compliance with minimum standards for eliminating human trafficking. The four categories, indicating incrementally increasing levels of trafficking, include Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List, and Tier 3.

Guinea was recently upgraded to Tier 2 watch list, reflecting deepening concern and drawing special worldwide attention to the problem.

Along the border of Guinea authorities reported 52 cases of trafficked young boys and girls between one and 15 years old. Young children are trafficked for sexual exploitation, illegal adoptions, and cheap labor, particularly in the mining sector. In Guinea, the majority of trafficked children are taken to Conakry for work. The trafficking usually involves an intermediary who promises the parents to educate the child or help the child find work then sells the child into virtual slavery.

Guinea also serves as a transit country for international trafficking. UNICEF has identified a variety of trafficking operations including cross-border trafficking networks that transport young girls from Guinea, Togo and Burkina Faso to Nigeria, or from neighboring countries to Conakry for domestic or sexual work. Some children are transported to Europe, and some trafficking involves individuals who wish to immigrate illegally to other countries.

The two-year USAID project, Strengthening Communities against Trafficking and Exploitation (SCATE), is active in Guinea and Mali.

In this initiative, Save the Children program works to reinforce the capacity of village members, community councils, and government authorities face the threat of trafficking through training and legal reform. The effort also aims to alert authorities, particularly immigrations officials at the border, to detect trafficking in persons.

To help young trafficking victims readjust once they have been returned to their families, vocational training centers strive to provide children with useful skills. The program has met with success.

The USAID anti-trafficking program in Guinea yielded impressive results in 2007. Eleven 11 districts covered by a USAID-sponsored Save the Children project took part in the education and child protection assistance plan.

The 2008 report from Save the Children's indicates that 350 parenting association and management committees have been reinforced. Over 200 teachers have been trained in protection/education, and more than 3000 children sensitized to the dangers of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: May 11, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

108 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 25, 2008 Tuesday 10:38 AM EST

DIRECTOR LAGON SPEAKS AT PROMISING PRACTICES AND PUBLIC PRIVATE PARTNERSHIPS SYMPOSIUM

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 2560 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

As Director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, I'd like to thank you for coming to today's symposium on Promising Practices and Public Private Partnerships in the fight against modern day slavery. I know you've had a busy morning, filled with compelling speakers, and my hope is that the break-out sessions that will commence later this afternoon will provide you with the opportunity to look toward the critical stage of implementing that which you've heard discussed thus far.

I am delighted to be able to join you for a bit this afternoon after having been sequestered away in my office reading through countless country narratives for my office's flagship publication, the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which ranks countries around the globe into tiers for their efforts implement the three "P" approach for the elimination of human trafficking: Prosecution, Protection and Prevention.

This Congressionally mandated report is due to be released in June. It is our prime tool for diplomatic engagement and international awareness needed to achieve prevention. The report was included in the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act--legislation which created the office I direct. That Act also institutionalized a cabinet-level taskforce, chaired by Secretary of State Rice, to improve coordination and implementation of our anti-trafficking efforts. Combating modern day slavery is unquestionably a high priority for the United States Government.

My office has grown from a staff of six in 2001, including I should note Amy O'Neill Richard--a real pioneer of this movement--to a staff today nearly thirty. Included in that number are several staff members whose portfolios would be of significant interest to many of you. Amy focuses on combating child sex tourism which includes partnering with many in the tourism and hospitality industry to raise awareness and elicit pledges of active support. She also works tirelessly to elevate public private partnerships and corporate social responsibility, following the leadership of Secretary Rice, who aptly noted that, "The solutions to the challenges of the 21st century are not going to be met by government alone. They come from all sectors of American society working together." Our office believes that success in confronting exploitation, abuse and coercion endemic in human trafficking will be found in our ability to work toward that end in partnership with substantial players outside of government.

Recently too, I recruited a former U.S. ambassador, Steve Steiner, to join our team focusing specifically on labor slavery and the mechanics of supply chains. We also have a dedicated Outreach Team which collaborates daily with faith-based and philanthropic communities. I mention these various components of our office as they may not be generally well-known, but they are a testament to institutionalizing at the working level our will to look outside of government--including to the corporate sphere--to further abolitionist efforts.

The field of Corporate Social Responsibility (CSR) has expanded over the last several decades with over 3,000 corporations having signed the UN Global Compact committing themselves to its ten universal principles focused on human rights, labor, the environment, and anti-corruption. Non-governmental organizations with a mission of promoting CSR have been created. College and universities have added courses on CSR, and some have even launched Centers for Corporate Citizenship. Religious organizations have promoted faith-based investing. Websites and online resource guides have been established to enable the public to research corporate philanthropic donations or to view information on companies' CSR activities. Symposiums, workshops, and conferences on CSR have promoted consultancy services and explored the latest trends in CSR. Many of you here are exemplars in your field and pioneers in expanding the borders of the CSR world. You have exhibited leadership and forward-thinking in the arena of combating human trafficking.

Just last week my office hosted a 2-day symposium which brought together leading non-governmental organizations (NGOs), many of whom we fund, to explore promising practices in the realm of victim aftercare. We have come to realize that NGOs, faith-based groups and now some businesses are advancing the anti-trafficking cause, but the lessons they have learned along the way are not well known within the broader abolitionist community. This reality was in part the impetus for today's gathering.

For example, we sought to invite participants from the same fields such that you could inform each other's work. It is our hope that if there is someone from the travel and tourism industry who has signed the Code of Conduct that they would be able to collaborate with colleagues from the same industry and dialogue about how they got to that point, what sorts of concerns or questions they had along the way and how they advanced the issue within their corporation. We recognize that you can speak to one another from within the context of your shared fields with far greater credibility than any government official can.

But before we get too far ahead of ourselves, it is important to understand the scope and the nature of the challenge we face--as this will ultimately be what informs our collective work. Human trafficking is a dehumanizing crime which turns people into mere commodities. While we recognize the merits of globalization, there is a dark side that fuels not only sex trafficking but also slave labor. Trafficking rings ensnare and exploit victims in prostitution, sweatshop labor, and domestic servitude, subjecting them to violence, rape, battery and cruelty. Individuals who sought to make a better life for themselves are exploited by traffickers who view them as highly profitable, low risk, expendable commodities.

Large and small companies have started to pay attention to the issue of human trafficking, specifically as it relates to labor practices. Goods enter the global market place while consumers have little or no knowledge of the supply chains and work conditions that resulted in their production. This is problematic for both the consumer and businesses which are increasingly faced with the challenge of ensuring that complex supply chains are untainted by forced labor.

A recent example highlights the difficulty: Last fall, Gap withdrew a line of embroidered blouses and ordered an internal investigation after media reports revealed apparent child labor abuses in a Delhi sweatshop. One child, Jivaj, from West Bengal described his experience: "Our hours are hard and violence is used against us if we don't work hard enough. This is a big order for abroad, they keep telling us that...I was so tired I felt sick."

Gap has publicly pledged opposition to such child labor practices and now reports a partnership with the Global March Against Child Labor to establish an independent monitoring system for future production of its products, and to examine industry-wide solutions to child labor issues. It is our hope that this reflects a trend whereby more American businesses will actively move to address human rights challenges in a proactive way in their quest to be socially responsible corporate citizens. But those of you who are gathered here today don't need convincing that clean supply chains must be a priority for any business. We are looking beyond this important effort to deeper partnerships in the name abolishing contemporary slavery.

Several weeks ago I returned from a 2 week trip to three regions of Africa. In Mombasa, Kenya and Cape Town, South Africa I met with the hotel and tourism industry leaders about expanding efforts to reduce the presence of sex tourists. With the World Cup on the horizon, South Africa is working to develop comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, and it's tourism community is rapidly building anti-sex tourism initiatives into Cape Town's planning and visitor strategy for 2010, when sex tourism is expected to boom. I met with a compelling woman who is working to ensuring that her home city is free of child sex tourism. Mariette du Toit-Helmbold, the chief executive officer of Cape Town Tourism, with over 2,300 tourism and related industry members, has promised to sign a code of conduct, establish ethical policies, raise awareness among her members and give all visitors information about sex tourism. She captured the nature of the challenge and how they plan to confront it when she said, "Unconfirmed reports say that Cape Town rates among the top 10 sex tourism destinations. Here you can order anything from an uncut diamond, fresh sushi and a 10 year old boy delivered to your door in less than 20 minutes...Our message must be very clear. Cape Town welcomes the world to our beautiful destination, but visitors who engage in sexual exploitation of women and children are not welcome."

The efforts of Ms. Du Toit-Helmbold are indicative of a trend I have noted in my travels around the world. Whether in human resources or extractive sectors or high technology industries, the commitment to CSR in the area of human trafficking ultimately rests with individual champions who steer his or her company in this direction--ranging from CEOs to middle-level management to line officers personally investing themselves.

Allow me to share with you a few more examples of what I mean. A top corporate manager at Hewlett-Packard talked about doing an investigation in Southeast Asia of a factory HP was about to use. Against the wishes of the factory's owners, their auditors insisted on seeing residential facilities on factory grounds where workers were housed. They found men and women whose documents were withheld (a common indicator of human trafficking). The workers were enduring forced overtime work and no more than 15 minute breaks per day (which was not enough time to get to the commissary and back). When the audit team informed the company that the site did not comply with the company's zero tolerance rules against forced labor, they realized they were helping nix a contract worth many millions. But the company took their recommendation to cancel the contract until conditions were changed.

Another example is Columbia Gem House which became the first jewelry industry company committed to fair trade practices including refusing to employ child or slave labor, and prohibiting business practices such as demanding workers work grueling hours for grossly low pay. In poor, isolated regions where mining is a mainstay, people are vulnerable to labor schemes that promise good wages or education, but deliver abuse instead. To address this problem in the broadest way, Columbia Gem House, under the leadership of their President Eric Braunwart, made extensive human capital investments around the mines where gems are born--starting a school for children vulnerable to exploitative labor schemes, providing housing for teachers, financing a hospital, drilling wells, and committing to a 30% local ownership plan. Some of these investments, like the school, were explicitly trafficking prevention measures. Others, which sought to strengthen the community and generate sustainable economic development, created an atmosphere whereby families were less susceptible to "too good to be true" schemes by prospective traffickers. Not only were Columbia Gem Houses' activities good for the communities where they were operating, they were good for the company as well which experienced a 5-15% increase in the wholesale value of the gems. The investments allowed Columbia to increase production by about ten times at an estimated 10-20% increased cost.

This example proves that corporate engagement in one of the U.S. Government's top human rights priorities can benefit the corporate bottom line. It's an excellent example of how human trafficking is an issue gradually making its way onto the menu of issues addressed by corporate social responsibility programs.

Eric Braunwart created an example of corporate engagement to end human trafficking--on a continent where trafficking of children into forced labor is heart-breakingly common. After surveying U.S. consumers, I am convinced that, increasingly, consumers will not only support such policies but will demand fair trade practices from companies they patronize.

One final example is a gentleman who I met at the recent UN Global Initiative to Fight Human Trafficking gathering in Vienna. In 1996, a Swiss businessman made a commitment to assist victims of human trafficking Cambodia through the creation of three viable victim-assistance enterprises in Phnom Penh: a soy milk factory, a high-end silk design and manufacturing company, and a catering business that serves meals to garment factory workers. He did so with the financial support and backing from the State Department and International Finance Corporation, based on his business model of trying social programs with commercially viable business activities. More than a decade later, his organization, Hagar International, has empowered thousands of trafficking survivors and "at-risk" women with counseling, literacy training, and vocational skills. Hagar silks and handbags are now sold around the globe, further raising awareness as each item has a tag with information about human trafficking.

We know that different industries have unique and invaluable corporate strengths to contribute. As a starting point, I hope that each of the businesses represented here today will ensure that you have a code of ethical conduct, centered on zero tolerance for trafficking in persons, any form of commercial sexual exploitation of children, and forced labor. Such policies should be well publicized within the organization and--of paramount importance--distributed to all contractors and suppliers. I urge you, if you are not already doing so, to train your staff, including auditors, human resource and compliance officers, to recognize, monitor and report on human trafficking.

The anti-human trafficking movement is burgeoning in international organizations, non-government organizations, and the public as evidenced by the steady stream of movies, documentary films, TV magazine pieces, newspaper editorials. Taking such steps can only win kudos. I intend to call attention to good corporate citizens, to raise you up as exemplars for others.

I appeal to you on the diplomatic front as well. Many of you represent multinational companies. Do not underestimate the power of your "economic voice" in letting foreign business and political leaders know that your company cares about human trafficking and chooses to do business in countries where strong anti-trafficking policies are in place.

Our message must be unambiguous and clear: both the public and private sector have zero tolerance for human trafficking of any kind. I hope today's symposium paves the way for increased partnership with the private sector-- partnerships that come in all shapes and sizes such that any company can contribute tangibly to not just mitigating but eradicating modern-day slavery. I am happy to take your questions.

LOAD-DATE: April 20, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

109 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 16, 2008 Sunday

RAHALL STATEMENT: FULL COMMITTEE OVERSIGHT HEARING ON ILLEGAL WILDLIFE TRADE

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 755 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Natural Resources:

U.S. Rep. Nick J. Rahall (D-WV), Chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, delivered the following statement today at a full Committee oversight hearing today on "Poaching American Security: Impacts of Illegal Wildlife Trade."

Testifying before the Committee were Claudia McMurray, Assistant Secretary for Oceans, Environment and Science, U.S. Department of State; John Seller, Senior Officer, Office of the Secretary General, CITES Secretariat; Benito Perez, Chief, Office of Law Enforcement, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service; Steven Galster, Director of Field Operations, Wildlife Alliance; John Hart, Scientific Director, Tshuapa-Lomami-Lualaba Project; William Clark, Illegal Wildlife Trade Expert; William Mortiz, Safari Club International Foundation; and Peter Pueschel, Illegal Wildlife Trade Program Director, International Fund for Animal Welfare.

Statement of U.S. Rep. Nick J. Rahall, II

Chairman, Committee on Natural Resources

Oversight hearing on

"Poaching American Security: Impacts of Illegal Wildlife Trade"

March 5, 2008

"The Committee is meeting today to receive testimony on a disturbingly real and growing challenge the illegal trade of wildlife and the role it may be playing in financing and fostering dangerous, violent elements around the globe including those engaged in terrorism.

"For many years, illegal weapons and illegal drugs have been the commodities of choice to some of the globe's most brazen underworld figures, even spawning the term "narco-terrorism."

"Yet the illegal wildlife trade, which has received considerably less public attention, is an increasing concern and may be on the rise. As a result, illegal wildlife trafficking poses a risk, not just to the survival of God's creatures but also to the safety and stability of our world and the American people.

"This, then, is the wildlife version of blood diamonds.

"I felt this was an important topic for investigation by this Committee. In preparation for this hearing, the Congressional Research Service at my request has examined the threats that the international illegal trade in wildlife pose today. That report is eye-opening, both in what it has uncovered and in what it was not able to thoroughly discern.

"For example, CRS found that wildlife trade now ranks in the upper tier of the world's most lucrative illicit economies, behind only illegal drugs and possibly human trafficking and arms trafficking.

"CRS also found that many of the same criminal entities that deal in arms and drugs - including organized criminals - are hawking wildlife as well. It discovered that poachers are becoming increasingly sophisticated, often using the same tactics and the same complex, secretive distribution networks frequented by sinister criminal organizations.

"And CRS notes that pricey endangered wildlife often serves as a type of untraceable currency in the underworld money-laundering system.

"Particularly disconcerting is the anecdotal evidence linking terrorist activity to illegal wildlife trade. Given that the industry thrives in many countries also vulnerable to fostering terrorism - those with a weak capacity to govern, poor law enforcement, high government corruption, and porous borders - this anecdotal evidence deserves sober consideration.

"Unfortunately, due to the clandestine nature of illegal trafficking in wildlife, it is exceedingly difficult to know the breadth of this sinister trade or the extent to which it may be supporting terrorist organizations.

"But that fact - in and of itself - and the dense interconnections among numerous dark-world activities are enough to convince me that this Committee, the Congress as a whole, and the rest of the U.S. government ought to be taking a close look at the lucrative illegal wildlife trade and the role that rare and endangered species may be playing in underwriting those groups that wish to do our Nation harm.

"The brutal maiming and killing of animals is certainly a grave issue, but when the beneficiaries of that trade are using these funds to corrupt, injure and exploit human beings, it is our duty to act.

"Today's hearing is a jumping off point. Here we seek to gain enlightenment about the menace of illegal wildlife trade in today's reality.

"And we hope to receive advice about how we might better address it.

"With that, I thank our witnesses, particularly those who have traveled great distances to join us today, and look forward to your testimony."

LOAD-DATE: March 17, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

110 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

March 14, 2008 Friday 11:48 AM GMT

Arabs urged to step up fight against human trafficking

BYLINE: Faisal BaatoutLENGTH: 499 wordsDATELINE: DOHA, March 14 2008

A conference in Qatar on human trafficking has urged Arab states to step up the fight against the scourge, seen as widespread in the oil-rich Gulf region.

Delegates called for an agreement within the framework of the Arab League "to combat human trafficking in all its forms," according to a statement issued at the close of the conference late on Thursday.

They urged the Riyadh-based secretariat of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) to take the lead in boosting "coordination and cooperation among member states to enhance measures to fight human trafficking."

The two-day conference was organised by Qatar and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, with the participation of representatives of the United Nations Children's Fund, jurists and human rights organisations.

Delegates called for "a network to exchange information and expertise on combating human trafficking under the supervision of the Arab League," and the inclusion in school and university curricula of material on fighting the phenomenon.

Five of the six GCC member states -- Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar and Saudi Arabia -- are on a US blacklist of countries trafficking in people.

GCC countries, which also include the United Arab Emirates, are close allies of the United States.

International human rights groups have also highlighted the problem of human trafficking in the Gulf area, which hosts more than 13 million expatriates, many of them unskilled and low-paid Asian workers vulnerable to abuse.

The US State Department human trafficking report in 2006 upgraded the UAE from the "Tier 3" of worst offenders to "Tier 2 Watch List" comprising countries making "significant" efforts to deal with the problem.

The UAE maintained its rank in the 2007 edition of the report, but Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar were downgraded to Tier 3, joining oil powerhouse Saudi Arabia.

Three other Arab countries -- Algeria, Sudan and Syria -- are on the list of worst offenders.

Qatar-based Muslim scholar Sheikh Yusuf al-Qaradawi told the conference human trafficking was banned under Islam. He slammed companies that bring in "migrant workers, give them a bare minimum of wages and pen them up like sheep" in crammed rooms as living quarters.

Nihal Fahmi, of the regional office of the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, said annual profits from human trafficking come second to gains from drug trafficking, at 31 billion dollars.

She said the UN estimates that around 27 million of the world's people live in a state of servitude, with "around 100,000 women and children victims of sexual exploitation."

According to other UN estimates, around 2.5 million people -- 80 percent of them women and children -- are being trafficked around the world at any given time for such purposes as forced labour, sexual exploitation, the removal of organs and body parts, forced marriages, child adoption and begging.

The estimates also put annual global profits from trafficked forced labour at 31.6 billion dollars.

LOAD-DATE: March 15, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

111 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

March 12, 2008 Wednesday 3:22 PM GMT

Arab schools urged to teach ills of human trafficking

LENGTH: 339 wordsDATELINE: DOHA, March 12 2008

Qatar proposed on Wednesday that Arab countries introduce material on the fight against human trafficking into their school curriculums in order to raise awareness of the scourge.

"The issue of human trafficking must figure in modern curriculums in order to raise awareness and ensure a secure future for our societies," the secretary general of Qatar's Higher Family Council, Abdullah bin Nasser al-Khalifa, told the opening session of a conference on human trafficking.

Mariam al-Maliki, who coordinates the drive to combat human trafficking in the gas-rich Gulf state, said the campaign had been made more pressing by "the big economic and social changes experienced by Gulf societies," in particular population growth and the growing need for expatriate labour.

The two-day conference is organised by Qatar and the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation, with the participation of representatives of the United Nations Children's Fund.

The United States and international human rights groups have highlighted the problem of human trafficking in the oil-rich Gulf states, home to more than 13 million expatriates, many of them unskilled and low-paid Asian workers vulnerable to abuse.

The US State Department human trafficking report in 2006 upgraded the United Arab Emirates from the "Tier 3" of worst offenders to "Tier 2 Watch List" comprising countries which are making "significant" efforts to deal with the problem.

The UAE maintained its rank in the 2007 edition of the report, but other Gulf countries -- Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar -- were downgraded to Tier 3, joining Saudi Arabia.

According to UN estimates, around 2.5 million people -- 80 percent of them women and children -- are being trafficked around the world at any given time for purposes such as forced labour, sexual exploitation, the removal of organs and body parts, forced marriages, child adoption and begging.

Global annual profits from the exploitation of trafficked forced labour are estimated at 31.6 billion dollars.

fb-tm/lg/kir

LOAD-DATE: March 13, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

112 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Global Insight

March 5, 2008

Two U.S. Nationals Arrested in Cambodia on Murder and Sexual Abuse Charges

BYLINE: Chietigj BajpaeSECTION: In BriefLENGTH: 180 words

Two U.S. nationals have been arrested in separate cases of sexual abuse and murder. Yesterday police arrested an American man in the capital Phnom Penh for sexually abusing two girls, including a Vietnamese girl. Meanwhile, another American national was charged yesterday for the murder of his Vietnamese girlfriend in Phnom Penh. He was arrested on 22 February.

Significance: Cambodia is attempting to shed its reputation as a haven for paedophiles. The government has arrested or deported numerous foreigners for child sex crimes since 2003. In 2006 the U.S. State Department Trafficking in Persons Report upgraded Cambodia to the Tier 2 "Watch List" for making efforts to meet minimal standards after it was downgraded to the Tier 3 category the previous year for being a "source, destination, and transit country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour". Nonetheless, the country's lax legal and law enforcement system, endemic corruption and high levels of poverty have continued to fuel child trafficking and prostitution.

LOAD-DATE: March 5, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

113 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 5, 2008 WednesdaySTATEMENT OF U.S. REP. NICK J. RAHALL, II CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON NATURAL RESOURCES OVERSIGHT HEARING ON "POACHING AMERICAN SECURITY: IMPACTS OF ILLEGAL WILDLIFE TRADE"*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 581 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Natural Resources:

"The Committee is meeting today to receive testimony on a disturbingly real and growing challenge the illegal trade of wildlife and the role it may be playing in financing and fostering dangerous, violent elements around the globe including those engaged in terrorism.

"For many years, illegal weapons and illegal drugs have been the commodities of choice to some of the globe's most brazen underworld figures, even spawning the term "narco-terrorism."

"Yet the illegal wildlife trade, which has received considerably less public attention, is an increasing concern and may be on the rise. As a result, illegal wildlife trafficking poses a risk, not just to the survival of God's creatures but also to the safety and stability of our world and the American people.

"This, then, is the wildlife version of blood diamonds.

"I felt this was an important topic for investigation by this Committee. In preparation for this hearing, the Congressional Research Service at my request has examined the threats that the international illegal trade in wildlife pose today. That report is eye-opening, both in what it has uncovered and in what it was not able to thoroughly discern.

"For example, CRS found that wildlife trade now ranks in the upper tier of the world's most lucrative illicit economies, behind only illegal drugs and possibly human trafficking and arms trafficking.

"CRS also found that many of the same criminal entities that deal in arms and drugs - including organized criminals - are hawking wildlife as well. It discovered that poachers are becoming increasingly sophisticated, often using the same tactics and the same complex, secretive distribution networks frequented by sinister criminal organizations.

"And CRS notes that pricey endangered wildlife often serves as a type of untraceable currency in the underworld money-laundering system.

"Particularly disconcerting is the anecdotal evidence linking terrorist activity to illegal wildlife trade. Given that the industry thrives in many countries also vulnerable to fostering terrorism - those with a weak capacity to govern, poor law enforcement, high government corruption, and porous borders - this anecdotal evidence deserves sober consideration.

"Unfortunately, due to the clandestine nature of illegal trafficking in wildlife, it is exceedingly difficult to know the breadth of this sinister trade or the extent to which it may be supporting terrorist organizations.

"But that fact - in and of itself - and the dense interconnections among numerous dark-world activities are enough to convince me that this Committee, the Congress as a whole, and the rest of the U.S. government ought to be taking a close look at the lucrative illegal wildlife trade and the role that rare and endangered species may be playing in underwriting those groups that wish to do our Nation harm.

"The brutal maiming and killing of animals is certainly a grave issue, but when the beneficiaries of that trade are using these funds to corrupt, injure and exploit human beings, it is our duty to act.

"Today's hearing is a jumping off point. Here we seek to gain enlightenment about the menace of illegal wildlife trade in today's reality.

"And we hope to receive advice about how we might better address it.

"With that, I thank our witnesses, particularly those who have traveled great distances to join us today, and look forward to your testimony."

LOAD-DATE: March 17, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 States News Service

114 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 5, 2008 Wednesday 8:12 AM ESTREP. RAHALL ISSUES STATEMENT ON 'POACHING AMERICAN SECURITY: IMPACTS OF ILLEGAL WILDLIFE TRADE'*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 607 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The House Natural Resources Committee issued the following statement from a full committee hearing:

Statement of U.S. Rep. Nick J. Rahall, II

Chairman, Committee on Natural Resources

Oversight hearing on

"Poaching American Security: Impacts of Illegal Wildlife Trade"

"The Committee is meeting today to receive testimony on a disturbingly real and growing challenge the illegal trade of wildlife and the role it may be playing in financing and fostering dangerous, violent elements around the globe including those engaged in terrorism.

"For many years, illegal weapons and illegal drugs have been the commodities of choice to some of the globe's most brazen underworld figures, even spawning the term "narco-terrorism."

"Yet the illegal wildlife trade, which has received considerably less public attention, is an increasing concern and may be on the rise. As a result, illegal wildlife trafficking poses a risk, not just to the survival of God's creatures but also to the safety and stability of our world and the American people.

"This, then, is the wildlife version of blood diamonds.

"I felt this was an important topic for investigation by this Committee. In preparation for this hearing, the Congressional Research Service at my request has examined the threats that the international illegal trade in wildlife pose today. That report is eye-opening, both in what it has uncovered and in what it was not able to thoroughly discern.

"For example, CRS found that wildlife trade now ranks in the upper tier of the world's most lucrative illicit economies, behind only illegal drugs and possibly human trafficking and arms trafficking.

"CRS also found that many of the same criminal entities that deal in arms and drugs - including organized criminals - are hawking wildlife as well. It discovered that poachers are becoming increasingly sophisticated, often using the same tactics and the same complex, secretive distribution networks frequented by sinister criminal organizations.

"And CRS notes that pricey endangered wildlife often serves as a type of untraceable currency in the underworld money-laundering system.

"Particularly disconcerting is the anecdotal evidence linking terrorist activity to illegal wildlife trade. Given that the industry thrives in many countries also vulnerable to fostering terrorism - those with a weak capacity to govern, poor law enforcement, high government corruption, and porous borders - this anecdotal evidence deserves sober consideration.

"Unfortunately, due to the clandestine nature of illegal trafficking in wildlife, it is exceedingly difficult to know the breadth of this sinister trade or the extent to which it may be supporting terrorist organizations.

"But that fact - in and of itself - and the dense interconnections among numerous dark-world activities are enough to convince me that this Committee, the Congress as a whole, and the rest of the U.S. government ought to be taking a close look at the lucrative illegal wildlife trade and the role that rare and endangered species may be playing in underwriting those groups that wish to do our Nation harm.

"The brutal maiming and killing of animals is certainly a grave issue, but when the beneficiaries of that trade are using these funds to corrupt, injure and exploit human beings, it is our duty to act.

"Today's hearing is a jumping off point. Here we seek to gain enlightenment about the menace of illegal wildlife trade in today's reality.

"And we hope to receive advice about how we might better address it.

"With that, I thank our witnesses, particularly those who have traveled great distances to join us today, and look forward to your testimony."

LOAD-DATE: May 18, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

115 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 5, 2008 Wednesday 12:23 AM EST

REP. RAHALL ISSUES STATEMENT ON FULL COMMITTEE OVERSIGHT HEARING ON ILLEGAL WILDLIFE TRADE

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 765 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The House Natural Resources Committee issued the following statement:

U.S. Rep. Nick J. Rahall (D-WV), Chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, delivered the following statement today at a full Committee oversight hearing today on "Poaching American Security: Impacts of Illegal Wildlife Trade."

Testifying before the Committee were Claudia McMurray, Assistant Secretary for Oceans, Environment and Science, U.S. Department of State; John Seller, Senior Officer, Office of the Secretary General, CITES Secretariat; Benito Perez, Chief, Office of Law Enforcement, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service; Steven Galster, Director of Field Operations, Wildlife Alliance; John Hart, Scientific Director, Tshuapa-Lomami-Lualaba Project; William Clark, Illegal Wildlife Trade Expert; William Mortiz, Safari Club International Foundation; and Peter Pueschel, Illegal Wildlife Trade Program Director, International Fund for Animal Welfare.

Statement of U.S. Rep. Nick J. Rahall, II

Chairman, Committee on Natural Resources

Oversight hearing on

"Poaching American Security: Impacts of Illegal Wildlife Trade"

March 5, 2008

"The Committee is meeting today to receive testimony on a disturbingly real and growing challenge the illegal trade of wildlife and the role it may be playing in financing and fostering dangerous, violent elements around the globe including those engaged in terrorism.

"For many years, illegal weapons and illegal drugs have been the commodities of choice to some of the globe's most brazen underworld figures, even spawning the term "narco-terrorism."

"Yet the illegal wildlife trade, which has received considerably less public attention, is an increasing concern and may be on the rise. As a result, illegal wildlife trafficking poses a risk, not just to the survival of God's creatures but also to the safety and stability of our world and the American people.

"This, then, is the wildlife version of blood diamonds.

"I felt this was an important topic for investigation by this Committee. In preparation for this hearing, the Congressional Research Service at my request has examined the threats that the international illegal trade in wildlife pose today. That report is eye-opening, both in what it has uncovered and in what it was not able to thoroughly discern.

"For example, CRS found that wildlife trade now ranks in the upper tier of the world's most lucrative illicit economies, behind only illegal drugs and possibly human trafficking and arms trafficking.

"CRS also found that many of the same criminal entities that deal in arms and drugs - including organized criminals - are hawking wildlife as well. It discovered that poachers are becoming increasingly sophisticated, often using the same tactics and the same complex, secretive distribution networks frequented by sinister criminal organizations.

"And CRS notes that pricey endangered wildlife often serves as a type of untraceable currency in the underworld money-laundering system.

"Particularly disconcerting is the anecdotal evidence linking terrorist activity to illegal wildlife trade. Given that the industry thrives in many countries also vulnerable to fostering terrorism - those with a weak capacity to govern, poor law enforcement, high government corruption, and porous borders - this anecdotal evidence deserves sober consideration.

"Unfortunately, due to the clandestine nature of illegal trafficking in wildlife, it is exceedingly difficult to know the breadth of this sinister trade or the extent to which it may be supporting terrorist organizations.

"But that fact - in and of itself - and the dense interconnections among numerous dark-world activities are enough to convince me that this Committee, the Congress as a whole, and the rest of the U.S. government ought to be taking a close look at the lucrative illegal wildlife trade and the role that rare and endangered species may be playing in underwriting those groups that wish to do our Nation harm.

"The brutal maiming and killing of animals is certainly a grave issue, but when the beneficiaries of that trade are using these funds to corrupt, injure and exploit human beings, it is our duty to act.

"Today's hearing is a jumping off point. Here we seek to gain enlightenment about the menace of illegal wildlife trade in today's reality.

"And we hope to receive advice about how we might better address it.

"With that, I thank our witnesses, particularly those who have traveled great distances to join us today, and look forward to your testimony."

Contact: Allyson Groff, 202/226-9019.

LOAD-DATE: March 30, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

116 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

March 4, 2008

Speeches: A Struggle for Survival: Trafficking of North Korean Women

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT PRESS RELEASE

LENGTH: 1226 words

Speeches: A Struggle for Survival: Trafficking of North Korean Women Mon, 3 Mar 2008 22:00:00 -0600

A Struggle for Survival: Trafficking of North Korean Women

Mark P. Lagon, Director, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons

Remarks at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars Washington, DC March 3, 2008

I would like to begin by thanking the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars for hosting this morning's discussion and also thank Bob Hathaway, a former colleague on the Hill, for the kind introduction and for putting together this forum on a very important issue: the exploitation and trafficking of North Koreans, specifically women and girls.

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) is a source country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor, and for the fifth consecutive year has been placed in Tier 3, the lowest tier, in our annual Trafficking in Persons Report because it is making no discernible efforts to combat the trafficking of its citizens.

It has been well-documented, and publicized, that the dire conditions in North Korea include a severe shortage of food, a lack of basic freedoms, and a system of political repression which includes a network of government-operated prison camps, where as many as 200,000 prisoners are subjected to reeducation and slave-like conditions. The circumstances in the DPRK lead many North Koreans to seek a way out across the border into Northeast China where tens of thousands of North Koreans may reside illegally, of whom it is estimated that more than half are women.

Commonly, North Korean women and children voluntarily cross the border into China, but some of these individuals, after they enter the P.R.C. in a vulnerable, undocumented status, are then sold into prostitution, marriage, or forced labor. The trend of North Korean women trafficked into and within China for forced marriage is well-documented by NGOs and international organizations. Sometimes North Korean women are lured out of North Korea with the promise of a "better life" as waitresses or factory workers, and then are forced into prostitution in brothels, or exploitative labor arrangements.

A potential factor, among others, in the trafficking of brides is the gender imbalance caused by China's one-child policy. There is, in short, a demographic man surplus relative to marriageable women. All agree that the two governments are not doing enough to prevent or punish the practice of forced marriage. NGOs and international organizations find it difficult to work independently in the PRC, so little assistance reaches this vulnerable group of DPRK women who have crossed into China.

North Koreans crossing the border are extremely vulnerable to trafficking given their illegal status in China and their inability to return home. A core principle of an effective anti-trafficking strategy is the protection of victims. The United Nations Protocol on Trafficking in Persons calls on governments to protect foreign victims of trafficking, including legal alternatives to deportation to countries where they face hardship or retribution. Greater government efforts need to be made to protect this highly vulnerable group of victims.

Unfortunately, China classifies North Korean refugees as "economic migrants" and forcibly returns some to the DPRK where they may face severe punishment, including in some cases execution. The PRC stands by this policy; however, the U.S. consistently urges China to treat North Korean asylum seekers in line with international agreements to which it is a signatory. China's poor transparency and the political sensitivity of the issue hamper our efforts to effectively advocate for change on this issue.

Some steps to address the problem are being taken in China. The International Labor Organization (ILO) recently began a new project to work closely with the China Enterprise Confederation to educate entrepreneurs, owners, and managers of various enterprises that in the past have been linked to trafficking, such as hotels, karaoke bars, restaurants, bars, and massage parlors. The All-China Women's Federation (ACWF) and non-governmental organizations have a number of ongoing prevention and education projects in affected provinces. In the past five years, with assistance from UNICEF and international non-governmental organizations, China has established transfer, training and recovery centers for trafficking victims in four provinces and has assisted more than 1,000 trafficked women and children. ACWF works closely with law enforcement agencies and border officials to raise their awareness of the problem of trafficking.

China has also engaged the U.S. government and international and non-governmental organizations to work on other anti-trafficking initiatives, and has made progress. China hosted a Children's Forum in Beijing, a joint project sponsored by the ILO and organized by the ACWF that brought child representatives from across the country to discuss measures to prevent vulnerable youth from being trafficked and to increase protection and prevention. Provincial public security officials have traveled to the U.S. to learn about how multiple sectors of U.S. society - federal and state law enforcement and courts and civil society - protect victims, whether in the U.S. legally or illegally - and prosecute traffickers.

It will be interesting to see if these officers are indeed affected and that there is an impact, but the United States is offering its experience on seeing that trafficking victims are indeed treated as victims, not criminals or illegal aliens to be deported. MTV's special, regionally-tailored anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, funded by the US government, was broadcast nationwide and received state media coverage.

Most notably, in December 2007, the PRC agreed upon the China National Plan of Action on Combating Trafficking in Women and Children. The Plan of Action has been developed in order to: effectively prevent and severely combat the criminal activities of trafficking in women and children; actively provide assistance and give appropriate aftercare to rescued women and children; and earnestly safeguard the legal rights and interests of women and children.

With sustained efforts to combat TIP and improvements in their identification and treatment of victims, and transparency in criminal law enforcement, China could be a constructive partner in the region on this issue.

While much of the world's attention regarding North Korea is rightly focused on the Six-Party talks, the goal of which is verifiable denuclearization of North Korea and even the visit of the New York Philharmonic to Pyongyang last week, we must not ignore the tragic circumstance of thousands of trafficked North Korean men, women, and children.

As Secretary Rice has said, "We are major proponents of the North Korean people." We seek to help those who are vulnerable to human trafficking in North Korea and when they flee North Korea. At the heart of the U.S. Government's victim-centered approach to ending human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity - a desire not only to rescue people, but restore their dignity. Our hope is to foster regional cooperation to end this violation against human dignity, and to abolish modern-day slavery.

LOAD-DATE: March 4, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

JOURNAL-CODE: STD

117 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

March 3, 2008 Monday

REMARKS BY MARK P. LAGON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS (AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT); SUBJECT: A STRUGGLE FOR SURVIVAL: TRAFFICKING OF NORTH KOREAN WOMEN; LOCATION: WOODROW WILSON INTERNATIONAL CENTER FOR SCHOLARS, WASHINGTON, DC

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 1224 words

REMARKS BY MARK P. LAGON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS (AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT) SUBJECT: A STRUGGLE FOR SURVIVAL: TRAFFICKING OF NORTH KOREAN WOMEN LOCATION: WOODROW WILSON INTERNATIONAL CENTER FOR SCHOLARS, WASHINGTON, DC DATE: MONDAY, MARCH 3, 2008

MR. LAGON: I would like to begin by thanking the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars for hosting this morning's discussion and also thank Bob Hathaway, a former colleague on the Hill, for the kind introduction and for putting together this forum on a very important issue: the exploitation and trafficking of North Koreans, specifically women and girls.

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) is a source country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor, and for the fifth consecutive year has been placed in Tier 3, the lowest tier, in our annual Trafficking in Persons Report because it is making no discernible efforts to combat the trafficking of its citizens.

It has been well-documented, and publicized, that the dire conditions in North Korea include a severe shortage of food, a lack of basic freedoms, and a system of political repression which includes a network of government-operated prison camps, where as many as 200,000 prisoners are subjected to reeducation and slave-like conditions. The circumstances in the DPRK lead many North Koreans to seek a way out across the border into Northeast China where tens of thousands of North Koreans may reside illegally, of whom it is estimated that more than half are women.

Commonly, North Korean women and children voluntarily cross the border into China, but some of these individuals, after they enter the P.R.C. in a vulnerable, undocumented status, are then sold into prostitution, marriage, or forced labor. The trend of North Korean women trafficked into and within China for forced marriage is well-documented by NGOs and international organizations. Sometimes North Korean women are lured out of North Korea with the promise of a "better life" as waitresses or factory workers, and then are forced into prostitution in brothels, or exploitative labor arrangements.

A potential factor, among others, in the trafficking of brides is the gender imbalance caused by China's one-child policy. There is, in short, a demographic man surplus relative to marriageable women. All agree that the two governments are not doing enough to prevent or punish the practice of forced marriage. NGOs and international organizations find it difficult to work independently in the PRC, so little assistance reaches this vulnerable group of DPRK women who have crossed into China.

North Koreans crossing the border are extremely vulnerable to trafficking given their illegal status in China and their inability to return home. A core principle of an effective anti-trafficking strategy is the protection of victims. The United Nations Protocol on Trafficking in Persons calls on governments to protect foreign victims of trafficking, including legal alternatives to deportation to countries where they face hardship or retribution. Greater government efforts need to be made to protect this highly vulnerable group of victims.

Unfortunately, China classifies North Korean refugees as "economic migrants" and forcibly returns some to the DPRK where they may face severe punishment, including in some cases execution. The PRC stands by this policy; however, the U.S. consistently urges China to treat North Korean asylum seekers in line with international agreements to which it is a signatory. China's poor transparency and the political sensitivity of the issue hamper our efforts to effectively advocate for change on this issue.

Some steps to address the problem are being taken in China. The International Labor Organization (ILO) recently began a new project to work closely with the China Enterprise Confederation to educate entrepreneurs, owners, and managers of various enterprises that in the past have been linked to trafficking, such as hotels, karaoke bars, restaurants, bars, and massage parlors. The All-China Women's Federation (ACWF) and non-governmental organizations have a number of ongoing prevention and education projects in affected provinces. In the past five years, with assistance from UNICEF and international non-governmental organizations, China has established transfer, training and recovery centers for trafficking victims in four provinces and has assisted more than 1,000 trafficked women and children. ACWF works closely with law enforcement agencies and border officials to raise their awareness of the problem of trafficking.

China has also engaged the U.S. government and international and non-governmental organizations to work on other anti-trafficking initiatives, and has made progress. China hosted a Children's Forum in Beijing, a joint project sponsored by the ILO and organized by the ACWF that brought child representatives from across the country to discuss measures to prevent vulnerable youth from being trafficked and to increase protection and prevention. Provincial public security officials have traveled to the U.S. to learn about how multiple sectors of U.S. society - federal and state law enforcement and courts and civil society - protect victims, whether in the U.S. legally or illegally - and prosecute traffickers.

It will be interesting to see if these officers are indeed affected and that there is an impact, but the United States is offering its experience on seeing that trafficking victims are indeed treated as victims, not criminals or illegal aliens to be deported. MTV's special, regionally-tailored anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, funded by the US government, was broadcast nationwide and received state media coverage.

Most notably, in December 2007, the PRC agreed upon the China National Plan of Action on Combating Trafficking in Women and Children. The Plan of Action has been developed in order to: effectively prevent and severely combat the criminal activities of trafficking in women and children; actively provide assistance and give appropriate aftercare to rescued women and children; and earnestly safeguard the legal rights and interests of women and children.

With sustained efforts to combat TIP and improvements in their identification and treatment of victims, and transparency in criminal law enforcement, China could be a constructive partner in the region on this issue.

While much of the world's attention regarding North Korea is rightly focused on the Six-Party talks, the goal of which is verifiable denuclearization of North Korea and even the visit of the New York Philharmonic to Pyongyang last week, we must not ignore the tragic circumstance of thousands of trafficked North Korean men, women, and children.

As Secretary Rice has said, "We are major proponents of the North Korean people." We seek to help those who are vulnerable to human trafficking in North Korea and when they flee North Korea. At the heart of the U.S. Government's victim-centered approach to ending human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity - a desire not only to rescue people, but restore their dignity. Our hope is to foster regional cooperation to end this violation against human dignity, and to abolish modern-day slavery.

LOAD-DATE: March 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

All Rights Reserved

118 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

March 3, 2008 Monday

A STRUGGLE FOR SURVIVAL: TRAFFICKING OF NORTH KOREAN WOMEN

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1184 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

MARK LAGON: I would like to begin by thanking the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars for hosting this morning' discussion and also thank Bob Hathaway, a former colleague on the Hill, for the kind introduction and for putting together this forum on a very important issue: the exploitation and trafficking of North Koreans, specifically women and girls.

The Democratic People' Republic of Korea (DPRK) is a source country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor, and for the fifth consecutive year has been placed in Tier 3, the lowest tier, in our annual Trafficking in Persons Report because it is making no discernible efforts to combat the trafficking of its citizens.

It has been well-documented, and publicized, that the dire conditions in North Korea include a severe shortage of food , a lack of basic freedoms, and a system of political repression which includes a network of government-operated prison camps, where as many as 200,000 prisoners are subjected to reeducation and slave-like conditions. The circumstances in the DPRK lead many North Koreans to seek a way out across the border into Northeast China where tens of thousands of North Koreans may reside illegally, of whom it is estimated that more than half are women.

Commonly, North Korean women and children voluntarily cross the border into China, but some of these individuals, after they enter the P.R.C. in a vulnerable, undocumented status, are then sold into prostitution, marriage, or forced labor. The trend of North Korean women trafficked into and within China for forced marriage is well-documented by NGOs and international organizations. Sometimes North Korean women are lured out of North Korea with the promise of a better life as waitresses or factory workers, and then are forced into prostitution in brothels, or exploitative labor arrangements.

A potential factor, among others, in the trafficking of brides is the gender imbalance caused by China' one-child policy. There is, in short, a demographic man surplus relative to marriageable women. All agree that the two governments are not doing enough to prevent or punish the practice of forced marriage. NGOs and international organizations find it difficult to work independently in the PRC, so little assistance reaches this vulnerable group of DPRK women who have crossed into China.

North Koreans crossing the border are extremely vulnerable to trafficking given their illegal status in China and their inability to return home. A core principle of an effective anti-trafficking strategy is the protection of victims. The United Nations Protocol on Trafficking in Persons calls on governments to protect foreign victims of trafficking, including legal alternatives to deportation to countries where they face hardship or retribution. Greater government efforts need to be made to protect this highly vulnerable group of victims.

Unfortunately, China classifies North Korean refugees as economic migrants and forcibly returns some to the DPRK where they may face severe punishment, including in some cases execution. The PRC stands by this policy; however, the U.S. consistently urges China to treat North Korean asylum seekers in line with international agreements to which it is a signatory. China' poor transparency and the political sensitivity of the issue hamper our efforts to effectively advocate for change on this issue.

Some steps to address the problem are being taken in China. The International Labor Organization (ILO) recently began a new project to work closely with the China Enterprise Confederation to educate entrepreneurs, owners, and managers of various enterprises that in the past have been linked to trafficking, such as hotels, karaoke bars, restaurants, bars, and massage parlors. The All-China Women' Federation (ACWF) and non-governmental organizations have a number of ongoing prevention and education projects in affected provinces. In the past five years, with assistance from UNICEF and international non-governmental organizations, China has established transfer, training and recovery centers for trafficking victims in four provinces and has assisted more than 1,000 trafficked women and children. ACWF works closely with law enforcement agencies and border officials to raise their awareness of the problem of trafficking.

China has also engaged the U.S. government and international and non-governmental organizations to work on other anti-trafficking initiatives, and has made progress. China hosted a Children's Forum in Beijing, a joint project sponsored by the ILO and organized by the ACWF that brought child representatives from across the country to discuss measures to prevent vulnerable youth from being trafficked and to increase protection and prevention. Provincial public security officials have traveled to the U.S. to learn about how multiple sectors of U.S. society a" federal and state law enforcement and courts and civil society a" protect victims, whether in the U.S. legally or illegally a" and prosecute traffickers.

It will be interesting to see if these officers are indeed affected and that there is an impact, but the United States is offering its experience on seeing that trafficking victims are indeed treated as victims, not criminals or illegal aliens to be deported. MTV' special, regionally-tailored anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, funded by the US government, was broadcast nationwide and received state media coverage.

Most notably, in December 2007, the PRC agreed upon the China National Plan of Action on Combating Trafficking in Women and Children. The Plan of Action has been developed in order to: effectively prevent and severely combat the criminal activities of trafficking in women and children; actively provide assistance and give appropriate aftercare to rescued women and children; and earnestly safeguard the legal rights and interests of women and children.

With sustained efforts to combat TIP and improvements in their identification and treatment of victims, and transparency in criminal law enforcement, China could be a constructive partner in the region on this issue.

While much of the world' attention regarding North Korea is rightly focused on the Six-Party talks, the goal of which is verifiable denuclearization of North Korea and even the visit of the New York Philharmonic to Pyongyang last week, we must not ignore the tragic circumstance of thousands of trafficked North Korean men, women, and children.

As Secretary Rice has said, We are major proponents of the North Korean people. We seek to help those who are vulnerable to human trafficking in North Korea and when they flee North Korea. At the heart of the U.S. Government' victim-centered approach to ending human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity a" a desire not only to rescue people, but restore their dignity. Our hope is to foster regional cooperation to end this violation against human dignity, and to abolish modern-day slavery.

LOAD-DATE: March 5, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

119 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

March 3, 2008 Monday 11:40 AM EST

DIRECTOR LAGON SPEAKS AT WOODROW WILSON INTERNATIONAL CENTER FOR SCHOLARS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 1208 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons issued the text of the following speech:

Remarks at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars:

I would like to begin by thanking the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars for hosting this morning's discussion and also thank Bob Hathaway, a former colleague on the Hill, for the kind introduction and for putting together this forum on a very important issue: the exploitation and trafficking of North Koreans, specifically women and girls.

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) is a source country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor, and for the fifth consecutive year has been placed in Tier 3, the lowest tier, in our annual Trafficking in Persons Report because it is making no discernible efforts to combat the trafficking of its citizens.

It has been well-documented, and publicized, that the dire conditions in North Korea include a severe shortage of food, a lack of basic freedoms, and a system of political repression which includes a network of government-operated prison camps, where as many as 200,000 prisoners are subjected to reeducation and slave-like conditions. The circumstances in the DPRK lead many North Koreans to seek a way out across the border into Northeast China where tens of thousands of North Koreans may reside illegally, of whom it is estimated that more than half are women.

Commonly, North Korean women and children voluntarily cross the border into China, but some of these individuals, after they enter the P.R.C. in a vulnerable, undocumented status, are then sold into prostitution, marriage, or forced labor. The trend of North Korean women trafficked into and within China for forced marriage is well-documented by NGOs and international organizations. Sometimes North Korean women are lured out of North Korea with the promise of a "better life" as waitresses or factory workers, and then are forced into prostitution in brothels, or exploitative labor arrangements.

A potential factor, among others, in the trafficking of brides is the gender imbalance caused by China's one-child policy. There is, in short, a demographic man surplus relative to marriageable women. All agree that the two governments are not doing enough to prevent or punish the practice of forced marriage. NGOs and international organizations find it difficult to work independently in the PRC, so little assistance reaches this vulnerable group of DPRK women who have crossed into China.

North Koreans crossing the border are extremely vulnerable to trafficking given their illegal status in China and their inability to return home. A core principle of an effective anti-trafficking strategy is the protection of victims. The United Nations Protocol on Trafficking in Persons calls on governments to protect foreign victims of trafficking, including legal alternatives to deportation to countries where they face hardship or retribution. Greater government efforts need to be made to protect this highly vulnerable group of victims.

Unfortunately, China classifies North Korean refugees as "economic migrants" and forcibly returns some to the DPRK where they may face severe punishment, including in some cases execution. The PRC stands by this policy; however, the U.S. consistently urges China to treat North Korean asylum seekers in line with international agreements to which it is a signatory. China's poor transparency and the political sensitivity of the issue hamper our efforts to effectively advocate for change on this issue.

Some steps to address the problem are being taken in China. The International Labor Organization (ILO) recently began a new project to work closely with the China Enterprise Confederation to educate entrepreneurs, owners, and managers of various enterprises that in the past have been linked to trafficking, such as hotels, karaoke bars, restaurants, bars, and massage parlors. The All-China Women's Federation (ACWF) and non-governmental organizations have a number of ongoing prevention and education projects in affected provinces. In the past five years, with assistance from UNICEF and international non-governmental organizations, China has established transfer, training and recovery centers for trafficking victims in four provinces and has assisted more than 1,000 trafficked women and children. ACWF works closely with law enforcement agencies and border officials to raise their awareness of the problem of trafficking.

China has also engaged the U.S. government and international and non-governmental organizations to work on other anti-trafficking initiatives, and has made progress. China hosted a Children's Forum in Beijing, a joint project sponsored by the ILO and organized by the ACWF that brought child representatives from across the country to discuss measures to prevent vulnerable youth from being trafficked and to increase protection and prevention. Provincial public security officials have traveled to the U.S. to learn about how multiple sectors of U.S. society - federal and state law enforcement and courts and civil society - protect victims, whether in the U.S. legally or illegally - and prosecute traffickers.

It will be interesting to see if these officers are indeed affected and that there is an impact, but the United States is offering its experience on seeing that trafficking victims are indeed treated as victims, not criminals or illegal aliens to be deported. MTV's special, regionally-tailored anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, funded by the US government, was broadcast nationwide and received state media coverage.

Most notably, in December 2007, the PRC agreed upon the China National Plan of Action on Combating Trafficking in Women and Children. The Plan of Action has been developed in order to: effectively prevent and severely combat the criminal activities of trafficking in women and children; actively provide assistance and give appropriate aftercare to rescued women and children; and earnestly safeguard the legal rights and interests of women and children.

With sustained efforts to combat TIP and improvements in their identification and treatment of victims, and transparency in criminal law enforcement, China could be a constructive partner in the region on this issue.

While much of the world's attention regarding North Korea is rightly focused on the Six-Party talks, the goal of which is verifiable denuclearization of North Korea and even the visit of the New York Philharmonic to Pyongyang last week, we must not ignore the tragic circumstance of thousands of trafficked North Korean men, women, and children.

As Secretary Rice has said, "We are major proponents of the North Korean people." We seek to help those who are vulnerable to human trafficking in North Korea and when they flee North Korea. At the heart of the U.S. Government's victim-centered approach to ending human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity - a desire not only to rescue people, but restore their dignity. Our hope is to foster regional cooperation to end this violation against human dignity, and to abolish modern-day slavery.

LOAD-DATE: March 30, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

120 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CQ Transcriptions

"All materials herein are protected by United States copyright law and may not be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, displayed, published or broadcast without the prior written permission of CQ Transcriptions. You may not alter or remove any trademark, copyright or other notice from copies of the content."

March 3, 2008 Monday

MARK P. LAGON DELIVERS REMARKS AT THE WOODROW WILSON INTERNATIONAL CENTER FOR SCHOLARS

LENGTH: 1228 wordsSPEAKER:

MARK P. LAGON, DIRECTOR, OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS

LOCATION: WASHINGTON, D.C.

DIRECTOR LAGON DELIVERS REMARKS AT THE WOODROW WILSON INTERNATIONAL CENTER FOR SCHOLARS, AS RELEASED BY THE STATE DEPARTMENT

MARCH 3, 2008

SPEAKER: MARK P. LAGON,
DIRECTOR,
OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE

LAGON: I would like to begin by thanking the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars for hosting this morning's discussion and also thank Bob Hathaway, a former colleague on the Hill, for the kind introduction and for putting together this forum on a very important issue: the exploitation and trafficking of North Koreans, specifically women and girls.

The Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK) is a source country for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor, and for the fifth consecutive year has been placed in Tier 3, the lowest tier, in our annual Trafficking in Persons Report because it is making no discernible efforts to combat the trafficking of its citizens.

It has been well-documented, and publicized, that the dire conditions in North Korea include a severe shortage of food, a lack of basic freedoms, and a system of political repression which includes a network of government-operated prison camps, where as many as 200,000 prisoners are subjected to reeducation and slave-like conditions. The circumstances in the DPRK lead many North Koreans to seek a way out across the border into Northeast China where tens of thousands of North Koreans may reside illegally, of whom it is estimated that more than half are women.

Commonly, North Korean women and children voluntarily cross the border into China, but some of these individuals, after they enter the P.R.C. in a vulnerable, undocumented status, are then sold into prostitution, marriage, or forced labor. The trend of North Korean women trafficked into and within China for forced marriage is well-documented by NGOs and international organizations. Sometimes North Korean women are lured out of North Korea with the promise of a "better life" as waitresses or factory workers, and then are forced into prostitution in brothels, or exploitative labor arrangements.

A potential factor, among others, in the trafficking of brides is the gender imbalance caused by China's one-child policy. There is, in short, a demographic man surplus relative to marriageable women. All agree that the two governments are not doing enough to prevent or punish the practice of forced marriage. NGOs and international organizations find it difficult to work independently in the PRC, so little assistance reaches this vulnerable group of DPRK women who have crossed into China.

North Koreans crossing the border are extremely vulnerable to trafficking given their illegal status in China and their inability to return home. A core principle of an effective anti-trafficking strategy is the protection of victims. The United Nations Protocol on Trafficking in Persons calls on governments to protect foreign victims of trafficking, including legal alternatives to deportation to countries where they face hardship or retribution. Greater government efforts need to be made to protect this highly vulnerable group of victims.

Unfortunately, China classifies North Korean refugees as "economic migrants" and forcibly returns some to the DPRK where they may face severe punishment, including in some cases execution. The PRC stands by this policy; however, the U.S. consistently urges China to treat North Korean asylum seekers in line with international agreements to which it is a signatory. China's poor transparency and the political sensitivity of the issue hamper our efforts to effectively advocate for change on this issue.

Some steps to address the problem are being taken in China. The International Labor Organization (ILO) recently began a new project to work closely with the China Enterprise Confederation to educate entrepreneurs, owners, and managers of various enterprises that in the past have been linked to trafficking, such as hotels, karaoke bars, restaurants, bars, and massage parlors. The All-China Women's Federation (ACWF) and non-governmental organizations have a number of ongoing prevention and education projects in affected provinces. In the past five years, with assistance from UNICEF and international non-governmental organizations, China has established transfer, training and recovery centers for trafficking victims in four provinces and has assisted more than 1,000 trafficked women and children. ACWF works closely with law enforcement agencies and border officials to raise their awareness of the problem of trafficking.

China has also engaged the U.S. government and international and non-governmental organizations to work on other anti-trafficking initiatives, and has made progress. China hosted a Children's Forum in Beijing, a joint project sponsored by the ILO and organized by the ACWF that brought child representatives from across the country to discuss measures to prevent vulnerable youth from being trafficked and to increase protection and prevention. Provincial public security officials have traveled to the U.S. to learn about how multiple sectors of U.S. society - federal and state law enforcement and courts and civil society - protect victims, whether in the U.S. legally or illegally - and prosecute traffickers.

It will be interesting to see if these officers are indeed affected and that there is an impact, but the United States is offering its experience on seeing that trafficking victims are indeed treated as victims, not criminals or illegal aliens to be deported. MTV's special, regionally-tailored anti-trafficking public awareness campaign, funded by the US government, was broadcast nationwide and received state media coverage.

Most notably, in December 2007, the PRC agreed upon the China National Plan of Action on Combating Trafficking in Women and Children. The Plan of Action has been developed in order to: effectively prevent and severely combat the criminal activities of trafficking in women and children; actively provide assistance and give appropriate aftercare to rescued women and children; and earnestly safeguard the legal rights and interests of women and children.

With sustained efforts to combat TIP and improvements in their identification and treatment of victims, and transparency in criminal law enforcement, China could be a constructive partner in the region on this issue.

While much of the world's attention regarding North Korea is rightly focused on the Six-Party talks, the goal of which is verifiable denuclearization of North Korea and even the visit of the New York Philharmonic to Pyongyang last week, we must not ignore the tragic circumstance of thousands of trafficked North Korean men, women, and children.

As Secretary Rice has said, "We are major proponents of the North Korean people." We seek to help those who are vulnerable to human trafficking in North Korea and when they flee North Korea. At the heart of the U.S. Government's victim-centered approach to ending human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity - a desire not only to rescue people, but restore their dignity. Our hope is to foster regional cooperation to end this violation against human dignity, and to abolish modern-day slavery.

END

LOAD-DATE: March 4, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

TYPE: NEWS EVENT

NOTES:

[????] - Indicates Speaker Unknown

[-] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.[off mike] - Indicates could not make out what was being said.

Copyright 2008 Congressional Quarterly, Inc. All Rights Reserved.

121 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

February 27, 2008 Wednesday 10:56 AM GMT

UAE to open shelters for victims of human trafficking

LENGTH: 331 wordsDATELINE: DUBAI, Feb 27 2008

The United Arab Emirates will set up shelters for victims of human trafficking, a regional problem highlighted by the United States and international rights groups, the local press reported on Wednesday.

The centres will provide shelter, health care and social support to women and child victims and will operate under the umbrella of the UAE Red Crescent Authority, the English-language Gulf News said.

"(The UAE) strongly supports international efforts to fight human trafficking," Deputy Prime Minister Sheikh Hamdan bin Zayed al-Nahayan, also chairman of the Red Crescent Authority, was quoted as saying.

In 2006, the oil-rich UAE introduced stiff penalties including life sentences to combat human trafficking.

And in July last year, two Indian nationals were jailed for 15 years in the first punishment under the legislation aimed at cleaning up the Gulf state's human rights record. Several more suspects have since gone on trial on human trafficking charges.

The US State Department human trafficking report in 2006 upgraded the UAE from the "Tier 3" of worst offenders to "Tier 2 Watch List" comprising countries which are making "significant" efforts to deal with the problem.

But it described the UAE as "a destination country for men, women and children trafficked from South and East Asia, eastern Europe, Africa and the Middle East for involuntary servitude and for sexual exploitation," saying the government was not doing enough to combat either.

The UAE maintained its rank in the 2007 edition of the report, while other Gulf Arab countries -- Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar -- were downgraded to Tier 3, joining Saudi Arabia.

In 2005, the UAE banned the use of children as camel jockeys and has funded the repatriation of child jockeys to their home countries in Asia and Africa as well as their rehabilitation.

Hundreds of thousands of foreigners work in the UAE, where expatriates make up nearly 85 percent of the 5.6-million population, according to a recent unofficial study.

LOAD-DATE: February 28, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

122 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

February 26, 2008 Tuesday

Indonesian paper: ASEAN cooperation needed to combat human trafficking

LENGTH: 808 words

Excerpt from report in English by influential Indonesian newspaper The Jakarta Post English-language website on 25 February

The writer is an Indonesian diplomat. The article represents her personal view. She can be reached at rossyverona91@yahoo.com

In Indonesia sex trafficking will remain a threat to the community. It is estimated that 130 women from North Sumatra were traded and later sent to Malaysia between July 2006 and January 2008. North Sumatra Police have recently placed four victims in their early 20s from Bandung and West Java -Reni, 25, Leni, 24, Rina, 25, and Elsa, 20 -under protective custody. They were traded as prostitutes by organized crime syndicates (The Jakarta Post, 21 Feb, 2008).

Child trafficking is also on the rise in Indonesia. The Ministry for Women's Empowerment, at a three-day workshop on the commercial sexual exploitation of children in Bali in 2006, revealed Indonesian authorities were battling a growing trend in child trafficking. Unfortunately, efforts to rescue children and babies in trafficking cases were ambiguous. Eight hundred-and-eighty babies have been sold abroad with only 25 babies saved.

Indonesia has enacted the national plan of action to combat human trafficking -Presidential Decree No 88/2002 -and has established a task force to lead anti-trafficking efforts. It has also passed laws and regulations including the protection of the victims of trafficking and the prevention of criminal activities, namely Law No 13/2006 on witness and victim protection and Law No 21/2007 on anti-trafficking.

To properly address human trafficking, apart from strengthening preventive measures at national levels, countries must involve themselves in bilateral, regional and international cooperation.

Human trafficking in ASEAN bears relations to human rights and migrant worker issues. As a regional security issue, these were discussed and coordinated closely under the framework of ASEAN cooperation to combat transnational crimes. ASEAN is also determined to establish national and regional focal points on human trafficking and to provide data on the development of national efforts to combat human trafficking.

Without accurate and reliable data, the majority of trafficking cases will stay undiscovered and it will be too difficult for ASEAN authorities to effectively combat trafficking issues and at the same time provide adequate protection and assistance to victims.

It has been more than three years since the signing of the ASEAN declaration against trafficking, yet ASEAN still lacks relevant and reliable data on trafficking and not all countries in ASEAN have established a national focal point on human trafficking or enacted anti-trafficking laws.

Until now, five member countries of ASEAN have passed anti-trafficking laws: the Philippines, 2003; Brunei Darussalam, 2004; Burma, 2005; Indonesia, 2007; and Cambodia, 2007.

Vietnam, Indonesia, Cambodia, Thailand and the Philippines have enacted national plans of action, while Burma has established a national task force. Singapore, Malaysia, Laos, and Brunei Darussalam have not yet endorsed specific national plans of action.

While ASEAN and the UN strive to improve their data on human trafficking, the United States released a report on human trafficking on 12 June, 2007. Indonesia was placed in 'Tier 2' together with Laos, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand and Vietnam. Cambodia was placed in 'Tier 2 Watch List', while Malaysia and Burma were placed in 'Tier 3'. Brunei Darussalam did not appear in the report.

The US report also indicated Indonesia was a source, transit and destination country for women, children and men trafficked for the purposes of sexual exploitation and forced labour.

UNICEF estimates 100,000 women and children in Indonesia are trafficked annually for commercial sexual exploitation, allegedly to Malaysia, Singapore, Brunei Darussalam, Japan, Hong Kong and the Middle East.

Indonesia has realised successful efforts in combating human trafficking will require more resources and engagement not only in the framework of ASEAN but also at bilateral levels, particularly with two neighbouring countries, Singapore and Malaysia, seen as potential 'destinations'.

The role of the security sector, in particular law enforcement agencies, in combating human trafficking issues is critical. In addition, specific programmes to strengthen cooperation between police, immigration, border patrol, armed forces and customs officials among ASEAN member countries should also be given priority.

National public awareness programmes should also be developed further by utilising media, NGOs and the private sector.

In the end, the issue of human trafficking needs to be well managed before it becomes the source of tension between ASEAN states. [passage omitted]

Source: The Jakarta Post website, Jakarta, in English 25 Feb 08

LOAD-DATE: February 26, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

123 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

February 15, 2008 Friday 4:16 PM GMTBYLINE: By VERONIKA OLEKSYN, Associated Press WriterSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 650 wordsDATELINE: VIENNA Austria

The United Arab Emirates, on a U.S. watch list for its shortcomings in fighting human trafficking, is committed to combatting the crime and is actively doing so, a senior government official said Friday.

"I don't think the stigma is in having a human trafficking problem. The stigma is not doing anything about it," Anwar Gargash, minister for federal affairs, told The Associated Press.

Gargash, who is also the chairman of the UAE National Committee to Combat Human Trafficking, was speaking on the sidelines of the Vienna Forum to fight Human Trafficking, a gathering of experts, legislators, law enforcement teams, business leaders, non-governmental organizations and victims.

"The UAE is committed and is doing something about it," he said.

The Emirates is among several Persian Gulf countries that have been criticized by human rights groups for not doing enough to counter exploitative conditions for foreign laborers who've been drawn to the oil-rich region's booming economies.

A Human Rights Watch report in November singled out the plight of housemaids in the Gulf, who it said worked long hours without medical care and for little pay and were sometimes subjected to violence. Workers' passports were seized by employers and there were few protections for them under national labor laws, the report said.

The Vienna forum, which wrapped up Friday, was convened by the United Nations Global Initiative to Fight Human Trafficking, which was launched with the help of a $15US million grant from the Crown Prince of Abu Dhabi on behalf of the UAE.

"The $15 million ... comes from an interest in the UAE to tackle human trafficking," Gargash said.

"We understand that human trafficking cannot be tackled purely nationally that it's actually a transnational crime and needs to be also dealt with (through) transnational cooperation," he said.

Still, the UAE has not ratified a U.N. protocol on human trafficking. And in June, for the second consecutive year, it was placed on a watch list by the U.S. State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report" for failing to take meaningful steps to address the problem of foreign workers subjected to involuntary servitude and of women trafficked for sexual exploitation.

The report put the UAE and other countries on the "Tier 2 Watch list," warning them that without improvements they could be moved to a "Tier 3," making them subject to sanctions.

The report said the government did not demonstrate vigorous law enforcement or victim protection efforts, adding that it should dedicate resources for the prosecution of trafficking crimes, encourage victims to testify against suspected traffickers and give them alternatives to detention and deportation.

Gargash said the UAE tries to look at such reports objectively but added it was important to realize that "good work" was being done.

"We don't think that these reports are able to accurately assess our commitment and our work on the ground, but we respect criticism and some of the points that are being brought up," he said.

In his speech to forum participants, Gargash outlined the UAE's four-point action plan focused on legislation, enforcement, victim support and an intention to pursue and build on bilateral and international cooperation.

"In May 2007, the UAE ratified the United Nations Conventions Against Transnational Organized Crime, which includes provisions for international cooperation in anti-human trafficking efforts," Gargash told participants. "Further, the government is actively considering ratifying the Palermo Trafficking in Persons Protocol of 2000," he added.

Mark Lagon, the State Department's anti-human trafficking official, acknowledged that the UAE has taken some "tangible steps to improve."

"It's the first government in the Persian Gulf to enact a comprehensive anti-trafficking law," Lagon told the AP.

On the Net:

Vienna Forum to Fight Human Trafficking: <http://www.ungift.org/>

LOAD-DATE: February 16, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

124 of 445 DOCUMENTS

University Wire

February 14, 2008 Thursday

NYU questioned on human rights

BYLINE: By Ariel Siegel, Washington Square News; SOURCE: NYU

LENGTH: 414 words

DATELINE: NEW YORK

Duncan Meisel wants to know what NYU is hiding.

The Gallatin junior is a member of Students Creating Radical Change, a group that calls for the university to disclose information.

Meisel, as well as many other students, is asking questions about NYU Abu Dhabi, and he says it's harder than it should be to find answers.

Wednesday night, the Office of LGBT Student Affairs hosted a forum for conversation on NYU's human rights responsibilities on their satellite campuses in other countries.

As soon as the floor opened for questions, Meisel raised his hand. He unfurled a bright yellow banner, covered with questions that students feel are not being addressed about Abu Dhabi. Questions included: How will NYU protect worker's rights? Who is paying for this? How much? Who made the decision to build in Abu Dhabi, and why weren't students included in that decision? Why Abu Dhabi and not somewhere else in the Middle East?

Other audience members had questions for the panel, too. The topics included the LGBT community, migrant laborers, financial aid and intellectual freedom.

Mariet Westermann, the vice chancellor of NYU Abu Dhabi, said that many of the misconceptions about Abu Dhabi are caused by UAE law, alluding to legislation outlawing homosexuality.

"Universities, especially American universities, ought to help their community engage and go places and try to do mutually adaptive work of trying to learn to live with one another in complicated places," Westermann said.

Westermann said that Abu Dhabi's willingness to engage with NYU shows the possibility of future discourse and change.

But some students weren't satisfied with that answer.

"They're trying to keep the appearance of an effort up; we have received no good answers, only bureaucratic spatter," CAS senior Colin Dillon said.

LGBT issues in Abu Dhabi have been at the forefront of discussion since NYU first announced its intention to build a campus in Abu Dhabi last October.

Migrant labor was also a topic of discussion. Migrant workers make up 90 percent of the UAE's workforce, according to Human Rights Watch. Kerwin Kaye, a doctoral candidate in American Studies, said that the UAE's labor issues were a concern, noting that the U.S. State Department has put the country on a watch list for human trafficking.

The panel also included Lyle Ashton Harris, a professor of art and education, and Sofian Merabet, director of graduate studies in the near eastern studies program.

(C) 2008 Washington Square News via U-WIRE

LOAD-DATE: February 14, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 Washington Square News via U-Wire

125 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

February 14, 2008 Thursday 6:33 PM GMTUS says India needs to battle bonded labor, prosecute exploiters*BYLINE: By VERONIKA OLEKSYN, Associated Press WriterSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 330 wordsDATELINE: VIENNA Austria

India is helping victims of sex trafficking and child labor but needs to take action against bonded labor and do more to prosecute exploiters, a senior U.S. official said Thursday.

Mark Lagon, director of the U.S. State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, said he traveled to India in September and the country deserved some credit for assisting victims.

"But as far as the prosecution of the exploiters, the sex traffickers, the exploiters of children and labor India needs to do more. And I believe that India needs to recognize openly and take action on the question of bonded labor," he said, referring to the use of debts to subjugate workers.

Lagon spoke to The Associated Press on the sidelines of the Vienna Forum to Fight Human Trafficking, held in the Austrian capital.

On Wednesday, he met informally with Oscar Fernandes, India's labor minister. Lagon, referring to India as a "proud democracy," described the discussion as productive and forthright.

"The United States and India are allies. Friends talk to each other about their problems," he said, noting that he thought India had made "some modest progress."

In June, for the fourth consecutive year, India was warned in the State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report" that it could be added to a blacklist of countries not meeting minimum standards in fighting what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

The report put India and 31 other countries on its "Tier 2 watch list," warning them that without improvements they could be demoted to a "Tier 3," making them subject to sanctions.

The report cited estimates that tens of millions of Indians were subjected to forced labor and said sex trafficking also continues to be common. Following the release, the State Department came under criticism for failing to blacklist India for persistently landing on the watch list.

"This report has had results; it has prompted countries to look at themselves and take action," Lagon said.

LOAD-DATE: February 15, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

126 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

February 13, 2008 Wednesday 11:32 PM GMTHuman trafficking is slavery and must be battled, celebrities and UN official say*BYLINE: By VERONIKA OLEKSYN, Associated Press WriterSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 860 wordsDATELINE: VIENNA Austria

Human trafficking is a modern form of slavery and cannot be tolerated, a senior U.N. official and celebrities said Wednesday in urging action against the global "scourge."

Pop star Ricky Martin, Oscar-winning actress Emma Thompson, Egyptian first lady Suzanne Mubarak and Antonio Maria Costa, the United Nation's top anti-crime official, were among those to make the appeal on the first day of a U.N. gathering of experts, legislators, law enforcement teams, business leaders, non-governmental organizations and victims.

The three-day event, which is expected to draw at least 1,000 participants from more than 100 countries, is not only aimed at urging action.

Through workshops and other events, participants will explore factors that make people vulnerable to the crime and discuss its impact on their lives, their communities and the economies of places where victims are recruited and where they end up.

"Two hundred years after the end of the trans-Atlantic slave trade, we have the obligation to fight a crime that has no place in the 21st century," Costa, head of the U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime, told the forum's opening session.

"Let's call it what it is: modern slavery."

According to U.N. estimates, some 2.5 million people are involved in forced labor at any given time as a result of trafficking, and every continent and type of economy is affected by the crime.

The U.N. says 161 countries are reported to be affected and the majority of victims are between the ages of 18 and 24. An estimated 1.2 million children are trafficked each year.

"How can we allow so many children to be kidnapped and exploited?" said Mubarak, president of the Suzanne Mubarak Women's International Peace Movement, which aims to enhance the conditions conducive to sustainable peace and human security.

Mubarak, in outlining her country's efforts to tackle the issue, said the problem was "growing in severity and magnitude" and called it a "complex, multidimensional and ever-increasing scourge."

Martin, who set up the Ricky Martin Foundation to advocate for the well-being of children around the globe, said he first witnessed the horror of human trafficking during a trip to India several years ago.

"My hope is to secure every child the right to be a child," the five-time Grammy winner said. "Human trafficking has no place in our world today and my slogan is react. It's time."

During the opening session, the global coalition Stop the Traffik handed Costa a petition of more than 1.5 million signatures that called for just that.

"This is a historic global declaration," Stop the Traffik's chairman, Steve Chalke, said in a statement. "Millions of people are not only aware of this crime but committed to do something for the millions who are trafficked."

Often, victims are tricked into thinking they will be brought to a better life.

Thompson, who chairs the Helen Bamber Foundation, a Britain-based group that helps rebuild the lives of victims of cruelty, told the story of a young victim from Moldova who was searching for a better life when she was lured to England by a local woman she befriended and trusted. Once she got to Britain, she was forced into prostitution.

Costa warned that efforts to fight the crime were inadequate and that the exact magnitude of the problem has yet to be nailed down.

While the moral imperative to stop human trafficking has found its way onto policy agendas, governments are still not doing all they should, Costa warned.

"Our girls are beautiful ... it's only prostitution,' high-ranking officials have told me," Costa said, referring to trafficking as a "monster" lurking in the shadows.

At a news conference later, Costa said "benign neglect" by government officials and concerns about protecting national reputations were hampering the fight.

Estimated annual profits from the exploitation of trafficked, forced labor is around $31US.6 million (euro21.7 million), according to material provided by the U.N. Global Initiative to Fight Human Trafficking, launched by UNODC in March 2007 with a grant from the Crown Prince of Abu Dhabi. UN.GIFT is convening this week's forum.

The United States, which placed the United Arab Emirates on a watch list in its 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report, is represented by Mark Lagon, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons.

In a statement delivered to participants, Lagon said it was important to address the demand for commercial sex and goods made by forced or child labor, as well as the lack of government commitment, weak laws to hold exploiters to full account and corruption by officials.

"It is not just poverty and desperation that make human trafficking possible, but also the extreme greed and sadism of the exploiters and the catalyst of corruption," Lagon said.

On the Net:

United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime: <http://www.unodc.org/>

Ricky Martin Foundation: <http://www.rickymartinfoundation.org/english/default.aspx>

Helen Bamber Foundation: <http://www.helenbamber.org/>

Suzanne Mubarak Women's International Peace Movement:
<https://www.womenforpeaceinternational.com/EN/Index.aspx>

STOP THE TRAFFIK: <http://www.stopthetraffik.org/language.aspx>

LOAD-DATE: February 14, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

127 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Korea Times

February 12, 2008 Tuesday

US Eased Sanctions on North Korea in 2007

LENGTH: 349 words

By Yoon Won-sup

Staff Reporter

The United States eased some of its sanctions on North Korea last year, according to a U.S. government broadcaster Tuesday.

The Voice of America (VOA) said that U.S. President George W. Bush approved the lifting of some sanctions imposed on Pyongyang under an act governing human trafficking in mid-October, 2007. Washington notified the North of the decision.

The State Department designated North Korea as one of the worst states involved in human trafficking, and the act prevented the United States from offering any aid except humanitarian assistance.

But the easing allowed Washington to provide assistance in educational and cultural exchanges to the extent that the aid doesn't damage its national interest.

This is the first time for the United States to lift any sanctions on North Korea since the communist country first appeared on its blacklist for human trafficking in 2003.

An official of the State Department said the rare measure came in order to improve ties and expand exchange with North Korea.

"Though Washington wants to expand exchanges in various fields with Pyongyang, in reality, all the efforts are affected by the results of the six-party talks," the official said on condition of anonymity. "The lifting of sanctions indicates the U.S. intention to open its doors for more exchanges and better relations with North Korea."

In a report on human trafficking in 2007, the State Department said prostitution and forced labor often take place in North Korea and human trafficking of female North Korean defectors also exists in China.

The department classified North Korea as the third-worst nation in the world in terms of human trafficking because Pyongyang hasn't made any effort to improve the situation.

Meanwhile, Vitit Muntarbhorn, the U.N. special rapporteur said last month that North Korea has shown no improvement in its human rights record including human trafficking and still systematically tortures its citizens.

Muntarbhorn condemned North Korea's practice of public executions, inhumane prison conditions, and oppression of dissidents.

LOAD-DATE: February 13, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

128 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

February 2, 2008 Saturday

Hanoi's help sought to track local link to human trafficking

BYLINE: Lee Shi-IanSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 19LENGTH: 431 words

KUALA LUMPUR: The Malaysian and Vietnamese police will work closely together to find out whether local criminal gangs are working with human trafficking rings there to smuggle Vietnamese women into Malaysia as prostitutes.

Deputy Inspector-General of Police Datuk Ismail Omar was commenting yesterday on an Agence France Presse (AFP) report which stated that four people had been arrested in Hanoi for human trafficking.

The international news wire reported that scores of young women from the poverty-stricken Mekong Delta were promised well-paid work as waitresses in Malaysia.

The ring would organise their passports and flight tickets, and then force them into prostitution. If they refused, they were locked up, beaten and starved, according to the report.

Ismail said police were waiting for the full facts on whether or not local gangs were working with human trafficking rings in Vietnam.

"Human trafficking involves both local and foreign crime syndicates. It is a very lucrative business, and police are determined to stamp it out," he said.

"Our Criminal Investigation Department and Interpol are investigating these syndicates, and liaising with their counterparts abroad."

According to a United Nations report, human trafficking is the second largest illegal trade after drugs worldwide, with about 2.5 million victims at any one time. Criminal gangs earn an estimated $10US billion (RM35 billion) from human trafficking each year.

Last year, a United States State Department report on global efforts to combat human trafficking "downgraded" Malaysia from Tier 2 to Tier 3. It joined 16 other countries said to be making no "significant effort to comply with minimum standards".

Due to the rise in human trafficking, the government has approved the Anti-Trafficking In Persons Act 2007, which gives enforcement agencies the power to arrest, prosecute and convict offenders and makes provision to provide support to the victims.

Statistics released by government agencies and by non-governmental organisations reveal that many of the foreign prostitutes working in Malaysia are from Indonesia, Thailand, the Philippines, China, Cambodia and Uzbekistan.

Federal CID figures show that most of the prostitutes detained are from Indonesia, followed by China, Thailand and the Philippines.

The number of foreign prostitutes held has increased on average 20 to 25 per cent per year from 2000 to last year.

Most were lured by agents of trafficking rings who promised them jobs as maids, or work in the food industry and factories.

There have also been cases of Malaysian women trafficked abroad.

LOAD-DATE: February 4, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH; MALAY

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

129 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Cape Times (South Africa)

January 30, 2008 Wednesday
e1 Edition

US Report puts SA on 'watch list'

BYLINE: COURTNEY BROOKS

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 6

LENGTH: 554 words

SOUTH Africa is in danger of falling into the category of countries with the grimmest human trafficking record, according to a 2007 report released by the US government.

The report places countries in three tiers, all of which have a significant human trafficking problem, said Mark Lagon, US ambassador and director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which released the report.

Countries in the first tier are making significant efforts to combat the problem and have the tools to do so. Countries in the second tier are also making significant efforts but are lacking the tools.

Countries on the tier 2 "watch list", which South Africa is on for the third consecutive year, lack the tools to deal with the problem and are also not making sufficient efforts. These countries are in danger of falling into the tier 3 category, comprised of countries that are making minimal efforts to combat the problem.

Lagon is visiting authorities in Cape Town and Johannesburg, advocating the creation of a comprehensive law devoted to prosecuting perpetrators of human trafficking and protecting the victims.

South Africa currently has two human trafficking laws; the Children's Bill, which is not yet operational although it was passed in June 2006, and the Sexual Offences Bill, which specifically prohibits the sexual exploitation of women.

South Africa needs a law which will address both sexual exploitation and forced labour, and will protect men, women and children alike, Lagon said - but for now authorities must take advantage of the laws that the country does have in place.

Lagon will also be advising on training judges to prosecute the perpetrators fully with the current laws, training police to recognise the crimes and how to deal with them, and creating more social services and NGOs.

Another purpose of the trip is to learn how the US can support South Africa in stopping human trafficking, Lagon said.

South Africa is a source, transit, and destination country for human trafficking. Forced labour and sex trafficking are both serious issues, he said.

Young girls are often trafficked from within South Africa, typically from rural areas to cities, to become domestic workers or prostitutes. Young men are often trafficked from rural areas as well and used for manual labour.

Women and girls are also trafficked from other African countries to South Africa, and sometimes onward to Europe, Lagon said.

South Africa attracts migrants looking for better lives, who are often taken advantage of.

Women from other countries such as Thailand, China, and eastern Europe are also trafficked to South Africa for sexual exploitation. They are often offered a job in return for a substantial fee and when they find out that the "job" involves prostitution they are already deeply indebted and are afraid to leave.

Sexual tourism might spike during the 2010 World Cup, Lagon said. He met the CEO of Cape Town Tourism, Mariette du Toit-Helmbold, to discuss how to raise awareness of the issue and educate people on what to do when they suspect someone is being sexually exploited.

"Having legal instruments in place and the Children's Bill operational will be very important (in 2010)," he said.

Lagon, who is spending four days in South Africa, also visited Nigeria, the Ivory Coast, and Kenya.

courtney.brooks@inl.co.za

LOAD-DATE: January 29, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: CT

Copyright 2008 Independent News and Media Ltd
All Rights Reserved

130 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Pretoria News (South Africa)

January 30, 2008 Wednesday
e1 Edition

US report: slave trade on rise in SA

BYLINE: COURTNEY BROOKSSECTION: NEWS; Pg. 3LENGTH: 459 words

South Africa is in danger of becoming one of the worst countries in the world as regards human trafficking, according to a 2007 report released by the United States government.

The report places countries in three tiers, all of which have a significant human trafficking problem, said Mark Lagon, US ambassador and director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, which released the report.

Countries in the first tier are making significant efforts to combat the problem, and have the tools to do so. Countries in the second tier are also making significant efforts but lack the tools.

Countries on the second tier "watch list", which South Africa is on for the third consecutive year, lack the tools to deal with the problem and are also not making sufficient efforts. These countries are in danger of falling into the third tier, comprising countries that are making minimal efforts to combat the problem.

Lagon is visiting authorities in Cape Town and Johannesburg, advocating the creation of a comprehensive law devoted to prosecuting perpetrators of human trafficking and protecting the victims. South Africa currently has two human trafficking laws: the Children's Bill, which is not yet operational although it was passed in June 2006, and the Sexual Offenses Bill, which specifically prohibits the sexual exploitation of women.

South Africa needs a law which will address both sexual exploitation and forced labour, and will protect men, women and children alike, Lagon said, but for now authorities must take advantage of the laws that the country does have in place.

"South Africa has so often been the trailblazer on legal instruments in Africa. Hopefully they will be a trendsetter," Lagon said.

Lagon will also advise on training judges to prosecute the perpetrators fully with the current laws, training police to recognise the crimes and how to deal with them, and creating more social services and NGOs.

South Africa was a source, transit, and destination country for human trafficking. Forced labour and sex trafficking were both serious issues, he said.

Young girls were often trafficked from within South Africa, typically from rural areas to cities, to become domestic workers or prostitutes.

Young men were often trafficked from rural areas as well and used for manual labour.

Women and girls were also trafficked from other African countries to South Africa, and sometimes onward to Europe, Lagon said.

Women from other countries, such as Thailand, China, and Eastern European countries, were also trafficked to South Africa for sexual exploitation.

Sexual tourism might spike during the 2010 World Cup, Lagon said.

"Having legal instruments in place, and the Children's Bill operational, will be very important (in 2010)," he said.

LOAD-DATE: January 29, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: PN

Copyright 2008 Independent News and Media Ltd
All Rights Reserved

131 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

January 24, 2008 Thursday

Uganda; Sh855m to Fight Human Trafficking

BYLINE: New VisionLENGTH: 206 words

THE U.S. government has offered Uganda $500,000 (sh855m) to fight human trafficking. The funds were channelled through the International Criminal Investigations Training Assistance Programme under the Department of Justice.

Community affairs Police chief Asan Kasingye said the money would facilitate the training of Police officers to stem the vice.

Starting next month, the training will involve investigating, reporting, data management and prevention of human trafficking.

"It will help us work with the international community to curb human trafficking," he added.

Over 500 Police officers will benefit from the training to be carried out at Kibuli in Kampala and Masindi in western Uganda.

"Initially, 50 Police officers will undergo training before the programme rolls out," Kasingye said.

Staff from the gender ministry, immigration and the Director of Public Prosecution's office will also participate in the project.

Last year, the U.S. placed Uganda on its watch list of countries dogged by human trafficking.

According to the 2007 U.S. trafficking in Persons Report, Uganda falls in "Tier 2", which refers to countries that do not meet the standards of combating human trafficking but are making significant efforts to ensure compliance.

LOAD-DATE: January 25, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

132 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

January 15, 2008 Tuesday

Nigeria; Trafficked Children - 'We Are Human, Not Commodities'

BYLINE: This DayLENGTH: 2616 words

For millions of children under various forms of modern day slavery, life, definitely, could have been better if there was a genuine determination to end the menace.

Olaolu Olusina writes that from Ekorì in South-south, Nigeria to the coast of Yeji on the Volta Lake in Ghana, trafficked children are suffering the same fate

An unusual scene played out at the Aminu Kano International Airport in Kano, Nigeria some years ago. A young boy caused a stir when he refused to board an aircraft heading for London. Poor soul! He had never come close to an aircraft, not to talk of boarding one. His blunt refusal aroused the curiosity of immigration officials who were watching the drama. They eventually discovered that the "village boy" was a victim of child trafficking. He was promptly rescued from his abductors and taken back to his village in South-east Nigeria.

Shinny, as he is called, is 12 but slaves under the tropical sun in one of the pig farms scattered around the villages off the Lagos-Ibadan Expressway in South-west Nigeria. When this reporter sought to know where he came from, a dry smile was what he could offer. Upon further inquiries, however, he said in pidgin English: "I come from Akwa Ibom." Not satisfied with his defensive tactics, a further probe immediately gave him out. "I be from Calabar...", he said as he tried to parry further questions about his family background with the stuff one hears everyday from such kids.

In Ekorì, a rural community in Yakurr local government area of Cross River State in South-south, Nigeria, this reporter was faced with the stark realities of child trafficking. A once vibrant farming community is being depleted daily by the activities of modern day slave merchants and their collaborators. A generation of youths; the community's strength and future, now faces the threat of going into extinction. Ekorì is believed to be the headquarters of a thriving trade in kid slaves and a hotbed for child trafficking.

Ofem Ubangha is from Ekorì. He told this reporter that returnee slave kids usually return from the cocoa farms in South-west Nigeria about mid-December. "They always return from Ondo as from December 15, and the villagers welcome them with thundering shouts of Ondo-he! Ondo-he! Ondo-he! (meaning Ondo people have come) as trucks conveying them enter the village in droves," he said.

It was gathered that from December 10, every year, few of these kid slaves that have finished their contracts, or have been released by their masters, start returning home in trucks, with the attendant dangers to their lives while on transit. "Onward movement takes place in January and between January 3 and 10 of a particular year, about 30 trailers conveyed these children from Ekorì to destinations in Ondo, Oyo, Osun, Ogun, Ekiti and Lagos States. Few of them are also ferried into neighbouring countries such as Cameroon, Gabon and Equatorial Guinea to work in plantations and farms," said a source who spoke on condition of anonymity.

It will recalled that few years ago, the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) carried the story of one Felicia, an African (Nigerian) girl who was abducted into slave labour. She was being ferried from London to Italy when she smartly escaped from her abductors at the Heathrow Airport by disappearing into the toilet where she later asked for help. If Felicia was lucky to have escaped unhurt, 'Boy Adam' was not in any way.

His story should still be fresh in the memory of those that followed the case. When his remains were found dumped in River Thames in the United Kingdom. The London Metropolitan Police that investigated the murder discovered, through a forensic report, that he was a victim of child trafficking and that his murder had some ritual dimensions more so as his head was severed and taken away before his remains were dumped into the river. Further tests carried on his remains led the Metropolitan Police to Benin City as the boy is believed to have come from Edo State in Nigeria.

Human trafficking, no doubt, has become the current social issue of the time. The startling revelation of the frightening dimension the menace is assuming makes it even more worrisome. And just like HIV/AIDS, it crosses local, national and international borders. Every year, some 600-800 million modern day slaves are trafficked internationally. Human trafficking, according to the United States' Department of State, is the third most lucrative business in the world, after drugs and trading of arms, with an estimated annual earning of $5-$7 billion. The United Nations also estimates that about 706,000 to four million women and children are trafficked every year. Out of this figure, 50 per cent are children, with some as young as six years.

Vision Media, an American organisation, reports that poverty is the factor in the global economy that leads to suffering. "Those toiling under the horrendous conditions of abject slavery cannot be viewed simply as victims of unfortunate circumstances in the melee of world trade and commerce," says Bill Butler, writer for Vision Media. "Modern day slavery must be acknowledged for the social issue it is; the result of a crime perpetrated by cruel and greedy individuals and criminal enterprises lacking in compassion for other people's suffering."

It was therefore not a surprise as this reporter watched in awe as Emelia Oguuah, filled with compassion, almost burst into tears on a live discussion programme on a Ghanaian television station recently. A mother, of course, with the milk of human kindness flowing in her, the Deputy Director, African Centre for Human Development, a non-governmental organisation (NGO), could not hold back her emotions as she narrated the ordeals that young boys and girls, victims of child trafficking and forced labour, go through on a daily basis.

"Imagine an eight year old boy rearing about 150 cattle! He gets bitten by snakes, have dementia, his growth is stunted and retarded, he suffers all forms of deprivation," she said. "The Kayayes (female porters) at Tudu and Tema stations are sexually abused on a daily basis in order to get protection." Oguuah said that in such situation, "generations of children are born on the streets, raised on the streets and are going to die on the streets," adding, "we are building wasted generations."

Eric Appiah Okrah who works with the International Labour Organisation (ILO) as the coordinator for the international programme on Eradication of Child Labour (IPEC) in Ghana also painted a gloomy and more frightening picture of the menace. Speaking on the same programme as Oguuah, Okrah disclosed that in Kokrobite, a settlement on the outskirts of Accra, a kid slave said he knew that some of them (kid slaves) were actually used for rituals. According to Okrah, a Togolese trafficker arrested in Ghana, in fact, confessed that his first victim, a young boy obtained from Ghana, was used for ritual by his father back in Togo.

The ILO official said when about 100 slave children working with fishermen on the coast of Yeji on the Volta Lake were rescued by the International Organisation for Migration (IOM) in September 2003, and returned to their families, "it was discovered that these kids, as young as three-and-a-half years were being used as baits to catch fish by the slave masters who deliberately drown them on the river."

The case on the Volta Lake is pathetic; it is indeed one that has continued to generate the attention of the international community. And quite in line with trends in modern day slavery, where traffickers seek vulnerability in their intended victims, they also seek environments in which they can exploit victims with minimal threat of the victims' escape or law enforcement action. On the Volta Lake, quite a number of children find themselves confined and work under terrible conditions with no means of escape or help as the case may be.

Many of the unfortunate kids are subjected to beatings, deprived of food and water, and enough sleep. They are exposed to highly unsanitary conditions and infectious diseases as they are forced to perform life-threatening work in unsafe conditions without pay. One can then understand the emotional outburst of Oguuah and Okrah as they made a passionate case for the protection of the rights of the Ghanaian child.

It is however interesting that with all these developments, the US Department of State's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report still classifies Ghana as a Tier two country; a country with an improvement on her anti-trafficking efforts. According to the report, "trafficking within the country is more prevalent than transnational trafficking, with majority of victims being children (boys and girls) engaging in forced labour in the fishing industry, agriculture and mines."

Observers are, however, not convinced that Ghana is doing enough. Prior to the IOM's intervention, the country had no law to prosecute traffickers. And in spite of her leading role in the sub-region, the country is yet to ratify the 2000 UN Trafficking in Persons Protocol. Though the country made an effort with its 2005 Human Trafficking Act that prescribes a minimum penalty of five years' imprisonment for all forms of trafficking, there is no maximum penalty for the offence. It is however gratifying to note that Ghana obtained its first conviction in February 2005 as a trafficker got a six-year jail term under the 2005 law. The 17-member Human Trafficking Board is also awaiting presidential approval.

And just as the countdown to the African Cup of Nations football competition, tagged Ghana 2008, begins, the Ghanaian government has been called upon to put adequate measures in place to prevent human traffickers from having their way. This followed the disclosure by the Criminal Investigation Department (CID) of the Ghana Police Service and some organisations that some people have perfected plans to recruit children for prostitution during the games.

The secret association of commercial sex workers in Accra and Takoradi had earlier expressed concern, though for selfish reasons, about media reports of invasion of prostitutes from neighbouring Nigeria and Cote d'Ivoire in the run up to the African Cup of Nations tournament.

Bright Appiah, an activist with the Children Right International, an NGO also said he had information from Kumasi that some "underground agents" have been paid to recruit sex workers, with children as some of their targets. Speaking at a two-day workshop organised by the Ghana Journalists Association (GJA) and sponsored by the British High Commission at Senchi near Akosombo in the country's Eastern region recently, Appiah said as the security agencies beefed up their watchdog role in host cities and surrounding towns of Ghana 2008, tournament, children could also be protected if government imposed a curfew on children during the tournament. While this may appear a sincere suggestion, observers are not in any way in support of this as it will definitely be an infringement of the rights of the child to free movement.

International sporting events, no doubt, have become fertile ground for human trafficking and sexual exploitation of women and children. The case of Ghana 2008 cannot, therefore, be an exception, say observers of the development. Adu Poku, director general of the Criminal Investigation Department of the Ghana Police Service confirmed this as well. "The international sporting events have become a fertile ground for human trafficking for sexual exploitation, the documented patterns of frequent trafficking of children for forced prostitution during World Cups and others as well as the increase of recruitment of children for prostitution in South Africa for the upcoming World Cup create a dire picture. We need to fight it to ensure zero tolerance for human trafficking," said the Ghana CID boss.

Tatiana Kotlyarenko, executive director of Enslavement Prevention Alliance West Africa, however, put the challenge at hand in proper perspective. "In South Africa, there are media reports of how street children as young as nine years old are being lured and prepared for prostitution for World Cup 2010," she said, even as she warned: "With no preventive measures in place and relatively easy border crossings for other ECOWAS members prior to, and during, the CAN 2008, it is highly probable that thousands of women and children will be trafficked into Ghana for the purposes of exploitation, as well as recruited internally."

The ECOWAS Commission estimates that not less than 300,000 children have fallen victim to trafficking in the sub-region, citing an International Labour Organisation (ILO) report. The sub-regional body already has a protocol among member states that makes trafficking an offence. Member states are currently being encouraged to embark on reform of national laws with a view to harmonising them with international and regional conventions and protocol on trafficking in Persons.

Organisations around the world are also expressing sincere and serious concerns about the problem of human trafficking into the Southern African region in the run up to the World Cup 2010. The need to adequately prepare for the upcoming World Cup was one of the topics on the agenda at a conference held by the Global Alliance Against Trafficking in Women (GAATW) in Bangkok, Thailand last November.

The situation in Nigeria is not in any way better, though the country is also classified as a Tier 2 country by the 2007 TIP Report of the US State's Department. Nigeria, according to the report, remains a major source country for women trafficked to Europe and a transit and destination country for trafficked children to and from other parts of Africa.

Collateral Damages, a new report by the GAATW, which examines anti-trafficking measures and their impact on human rights of trafficked people in eight countries across the globe, however describes Nigeria's 2005 anti-trafficking act as a step in the right direction. It nonetheless notes that the act has many loopholes and shortfalls, which it says may be "the result of acting too quickly." Victoria Nwogu, author of the Nigerian chapter in the report said "the act essentially reproduces the UN Trafficking Protocol, without effectively adapting it to the local context. Some of the points of the Protocol are inappropriate for Nigeria and so the Act, in some places, misses its mark."

It would be recalled that following the endorsement of the UN Protocol on Trafficking In Persons, Nigeria went ahead to promulgate the 2003 Trafficking In Persons Law Enforcement and Administration Act. The National Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) was created in August 2003, with Carol Ndaguba as the executive secretary. The 2005 amendment to the Child Rights Act also increases penalties for traffickers and their collaborators.

Though sentences imposed have been inadequate, NAPTIP has continued to make commendable efforts as the country reported 81 trafficking investigations, 23 prosecutions and three convictions in 2006. The national action plan against trafficking developed in 2006 is also awaiting presidential approval.

The UN Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children came into force in 2003. It defines human trafficking as, "the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, or abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation."

LOAD-DATE: January 16, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2008 AllAfrica, Inc.

133 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

January 14, 2008 Monday

Antihuman trafficking efforts can improve

BYLINE: Darwin T. Wee

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 473 words

ZAMBOANGA CITY - The government's program to combat human trafficking has been moving well, United States Ambassador Kristie A Kenney said at the weekend.

But the Philippines has yet to improve its status on the US government's watch list - from tier 2 to tier 1 - that will indicate significant strides in combating human trafficking.

"It's hard to say... this is a kind of crime that you got to keep working on it," Ms. Kenney said when pressed for comment at the weekend if the Philippines's status could be upgraded in the near term.

She said the Philippines is seriously addressing the problem. "The Philippines is making an important stride and we want to continue that here."

Ms. Kenney was here on Friday as special guest in the inauguration of a P3-million halfway house or Bahay Silungan sa Daungan, a temporary shelter for human trafficking victims.

She said the US government has given P40 million to the Philippines in 2007 and the country will likely get another similar grant financing this year.

"You can never stop and say well we have done enough and that's it. This is a sort of crime that all of us [should help and solve]," the US diplomat said.

The setting up of the shelter house was a joint effort of the Philippine Ports Authority's Zamboanga office and the Visayan Forum Foundation, Inc. a nongovernmental organization that has been working to combat human trafficking for the last 16 years.

Justice department records showed 248 human trafficking-related complaints had been filed from 2003 to 2006. Of these, only eight convictions were reported since the law took effect in 2003.

The most recent conviction was on March 27, 2007 in this city when a local court sentenced a human trafficker life imprisonment with a fine of P6 million.

That conviction was the second time in Zamboanga City, said City Prosecutor Ricardo C. Cabaron.

The first conviction was in 2005 when three persons were proven to be involved in trafficking a Filipino woman in Sabah, Malaysia.

In this city alone, there are more than five pending cases in court, said Darlene R. Pajarito, third assistant prosecutor, who handles human trafficking cases.

Mindanao reportedly has the highest cases of human trafficking in the three groups of islands with more than 50% of the total cases, said Visayan Forum Foundation.

Arthur E. Necesito, head of the foundation's Mindanao bureau, said 1,449 victims were documented by the Department of Social Welfare and Development from 2003 to 2006, of which 40% were minors and more than 50% were women and children.

Ma. Cecilia Flores-Oebanda, foundation president, attributed the large number of cases to poverty, unstable peace and order, and low awareness on human trafficking.

She said the ports agency and the foundation are setting up at least two more halfway houses in Iloilo City and Surigao del Norte this year.

LOAD-DATE: January 13, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2008 BusinessWorld Publishing Corporation
All Rights Reserved

134 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

January 10, 2008 Thursday

CORNYN STATEMENT ON NATIONAL HUMAN TRAFFICKING AWARENESS DAY

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 723 wordsDATELINE: COLLEGE STATION

The following information was released by Texas Senator John Cornyn:

U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, made the following statement Thursday in advance of the first observance of the National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11. Sens. Cornyn and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., introduced and passed a bipartisan resolution in the Senate last June in support of establishing the awareness day, which is intended to be observed annually.

We must continue working to eradicate human trafficking by raising awareness and strengthening efforts to combat it at home and abroad. This remains one of the most pressing human rights concerns of our time.

Americans would be shocked to learn that slavery still exists today not just in remote parts of the world, but hidden away in communities across our nation. So we need to improve protection of victims, punish the criminals and prevent more innocent people from suffering this fate.

This national awareness day will focus attention on a terrible crime that targets primarily women and children, and will help generate opposition to it.

Sen. Cornyn's resolution states: Congress supports the goals and ideals of observing the National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11 of each year and all other efforts to raise awareness of and opposition to human trafficking.

There are more than 12 million people in forced labor, bonded labor, forced child labor and sexual servitude at any given time, according to estimates by the International Labor Organization.

Background on Sen. Cornyn's efforts to combat human trafficking

Sen. Cornyn introduced the Stop Trafficking of Persons (STOP) Act, in the 108th Congress, to strengthen U.S. efforts to combat human trafficking. This legislation would specify that governments engaging in human trafficking are not immune from prosecution within the U.S. court system; require the U.S. State Department to include in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report accounts of steps foreign governments are taking to combat the sex tourism industry; and ensure that nongovernmental organizations investigating human trafficking in foreign countries are not required by U.S. law to notify foreign governments or targets of investigative activities.

Sen. Cornyn introduced the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005, which built on the STOP Act by continuing to combat commercial sex trade activities by targeting the demand for this atrocity. This legislation would protect children from being exploited by these activities, prohibit the operation of sex tours, assist state and local enforcement of laws prohibiting commercial sexual activities, and reduce trafficking in persons.

The Senate unanimously passed a Cornyn-sponsored resolution in 2004 urging all states to adopt legislation that will ensure the full coordination of local, state and federal efforts to fight the scourge of human slavery and sex trafficking.

Provisions in Sen. Cornyn's End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005 were passed, in part, in the reauthorization of the anti-sex trafficking legislation in 2006 the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act.

Sen. Cornyn helped pass the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 in the 108th Congress. This legislation would authorize appropriations to combat human trafficking, refined the criteria for judging whether countries meet standards for combating human trafficking, and created a new country watch list. Since passage of this legislation, countries that, according to the Trafficking in Persons Report, do not cooperate in the fight against trafficking are subject to U.S. sanctions.

In 2005, Sen. Cornyn chaired a hearing titled Examining U.S. Efforts to Combat Human Trafficking and Slavery, in his capacity as then-chairman of the Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights subcommittee.

Sen. Cornyn serves on the Armed Services, Judiciary and Budget Committees. In addition, he is Vice Chairman of the Senate Republican Conference and the Senate Select Committee on Ethics. He serves as the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee's Immigration, Border Security and Refugees subcommittee and the Armed Services Committee's Airland subcommittee. He served previously as Texas Attorney General, Texas Supreme Court Justice, and Bexar County District Judge.

LOAD-DATE: January 10, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

135 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

January 10, 2008 Thursday 12:16 AM EST

SEN. CORNYN ISSUES STATEMENT ON NATIONAL HUMAN TRAFFICKING AWARENESS DAY

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 736 wordsDATELINE: COLLEGE STATION

The office of Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, issued the following news release:

U.S. Sen. John Cornyn, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, made the following statement Thursday in advance of the first observance of the National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11. Sens. Cornyn and Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., introduced and passed a bipartisan resolution in the Senate last June in support of establishing the awareness day, which is intended to be observed annually.

"We must continue working to eradicate human trafficking by raising awareness and strengthening efforts to combat it at home and abroad. This remains one of the most pressing human rights concerns of our time.

"Americans would be shocked to learn that slavery still exists today--not just in remote parts of the world, but hidden away in communities across our nation. So we need to improve protection of victims, punish the criminals and prevent more innocent people from suffering this fate.

"This national awareness day will focus attention on a terrible crime that targets primarily women and children, and will help generate opposition to it."

Sen. Cornyn's resolution states: "Congress supports the goals and ideals of observing the National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11 of each year and all other efforts to raise awareness of and opposition to human trafficking."

There are more than 12 million people in forced labor, bonded labor, forced child labor and sexual servitude at any given time, according to estimates by the International Labor Organization.

Background on Sen. Cornyn's efforts to combat human trafficking

* Sen. Cornyn introduced the Stop Trafficking of Persons (STOP) Act, in the 108th Congress, to strengthen U.S. efforts to combat human trafficking. This legislation would specify that governments engaging in human trafficking are not immune from prosecution within the U.S. court system; require the U.S. State Department to include in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report accounts of steps foreign governments are taking to combat the sex tourism industry; and ensure that nongovernmental organizations investigating human trafficking in foreign countries are not required by U.S. law to notify foreign governments or targets of investigative activities.

* Sen. Cornyn introduced the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005, which built on the STOP Act by continuing to combat commercial sex trade activities by targeting the demand for this atrocity. This legislation would protect children from being exploited by these activities, prohibit the operation of sex tours, assist state and local enforcement of laws prohibiting commercial sexual activities, and reduce trafficking in persons.

* The Senate unanimously passed a Cornyn-sponsored resolution in 2004 urging all states to adopt legislation that will ensure the full coordination of local, state and federal efforts to fight the scourge of human slavery and sex trafficking.

* Provisions in Sen. Cornyn's End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005 were passed, in part, in the reauthorization of the anti-sex trafficking legislation in 2006--the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act.

* Sen. Cornyn helped pass the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 in the 108th Congress. This legislation would authorize appropriations to combat human trafficking, refined the criteria for judging whether countries meet standards for combating human trafficking, and created a new country "watch list." Since passage of this legislation, countries that, according to the Trafficking in Persons Report, do not cooperate in the fight against trafficking are subject to U.S. sanctions.

* In 2005, Sen. Cornyn chaired a hearing titled "Examining U.S. Efforts to Combat Human Trafficking and Slavery," in his capacity as then-chairman of the Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights subcommittee.

Sen. Cornyn serves on the Armed Services, Judiciary and Budget Committees. In addition, he is Vice Chairman of the Senate Republican Conference and the Senate Select Committee on Ethics. He serves as the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee's Immigration, Border Security and Refugees subcommittee and the Armed Services Committee's Airland subcommittee. He served previously as Texas Attorney General, Texas Supreme Court Justice, and Bexar County District Judge.

LOAD-DATE: January 12, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2008 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

136 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

January 9, 2008 Wednesday 4:29 PM GMT

Bahrain passes human trafficking law ahead of Bush visit

LENGTH: 244 wordsDATELINE: MANAMA, Jan 9 2008

Bahrain moved to crack down Wednesday on human trafficking as the Gulf state prepared to host US President George W. Bush, whose administration has accused Manama of trafficking in people.

King Hamad bin Issa al-Khalifa promulgated the law combating human trafficking which provides for imprisonment and fines for perpetrators, the official BNA news agency reported.

The law is designed to stop the illegal movement of people across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labour.

A national committee to combat human trafficking and protect its victims is to be established under the provisions of the new law, BNA said.

Convicted traffickers are liable to unspecified prison terms and fines ranging from two thousand to 10,000 dinars (5,300 to nearly 27,000 dollars), with tougher penalties for non-Bahrainis.

King Hamad published the law three days before Bush arrives in Bahrain, a close US ally that is home to the US Navy's Fifth Fleet, as part of a Middle East tour he began in Israel on Wednesday.

Manama angrily rejected US accusations last June that it was not doing enough to fight human trafficking, after the State Department added Bahrain and regional allies Kuwait, Oman and Qatar to its blacklist of countries for the crime.

It accused the Gulf countries of mistreating foreign workers, which they heavily rely on.

Countries on the blacklist are liable for sanctions, including the withholding by of US foreign aid.

LOAD-DATE: January 10, 2008LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

137 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

January 4, 2008 Friday

Congo-Kinshasa; Representative Smith Reinforces U.S. Support of Kivus Peace Conference

BYLINE: United States Congress

LENGTH: 825 words

U.S. Rep Chris Smith arrived here Thursday launching a four-day human rights mission that will focus on combating human trafficking, child soldiers and sexual violence while at the same time underscoring US commitment to critical peace negotiations due to convene on January 7, 2008.

The DRC and the success of its young democracy is a top priority within US foreign policy, said Smith, who is Ranking Member on the House Subcommittee on Africa and Global Health and a Senior Member of the full House Foreign Affairs Committee. The ongoing conflict in the eastern area of the country severely threatens the newly-elected government. If the new leaders cannot deliver the benefits of democracy namely citizen protection, accountable government and respect for human rights the county could easily fall back into the devastating wars that took the lives of more than 4 million people over the decade leading up to the 2006 parliamentary elections, said Smith.

The Congolese people want and deserve a working democracy. The US has both a humanitarian and a national security interest in helping them attain stability and security in this critical region of Africa. I m here to reinforce American support for the peace conference and emphasize our long-term commitment to securing universal human rights as the most effective means to obtaining a genuine and lasting peace.

The US is expected to play a significant role in the January 7th conference scheduled to take place in the North Kivu provincial capital of Goma where insurgent fighting has intensified after the 2006 elections. Rebel forces as well as the government military have recently committed some of the worst human rights abuses in the world in this region of Congo. UN peacekeepers in the region have also come under fire for sexually abusing and trafficking Congolese women and young girls in 2004. As Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations, Smith convened a hearing on the sex trafficking abuse issue in Congo and he remains concerned that the UN must continue to aggressively to address this abuse.

To my dismay and anger I have learned on this mission that the UN is planning on cutting back and downgrading their investigative effort to combat human trafficking by UN personnel, Smith said. That is unacceptable and I will be working to restore the anti-trafficking investigative positions here in Congo.

The UN peacekeeping mission in Congo (MUNUC Mission de l'Organisation des Nations Unies en Republique Democratique du Congo) is the largest and most expensive UN peacekeeping operation in history. Smith said. US contributions to the effort top $300 million per year and we have a deep and abiding responsibility to ensure that those sent to establish peace do not become the abuser, exploiting the young girls, they are sent to protect.

Hundreds of political leaders, parliamentarians, religious leaders and tribal leaders will come together here in Goma next week in an attempt to end the conflict and enable the people of the DRC to move forward with their democracy. The US is a willing international partner and we will continue to work with the new government leadership as it seeks a nation-wide peace and transparent governance for the Congolese people.

Smith, the author of the nation s first anti-trafficking law, the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (P.L. 106-386) and its two subsequent reauthorizations, noted that, The DRC government must do more to combat trafficking and the use of child soldiers in the current conflict. In the latest Trafficking in Persons Report produced by the US State Department in June, the DRC is listed as a Tier 2 country and is a source country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation with the majority of known trafficking occurring within the unstable eastern provinces.

The most recent reauthorization bill, the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2007 (HR 3887) of which Smith is the lead Republican, passed the House of Representatives last month by a vote of 405-2. This most recent bill includes a prohibition on U.S. military assistance to foreign governments that recruit or use child soldiers. Congressman Smith introduced similar legislation, the Child Soldier Prevention Act of 2006 (HR 5966) in the 109th Congress.

While in Congo, Smith will also be advancing US support for global health initiatives in the region.

In addition to security, health matters constitute our most important development effort in Congo, said Smith. The public health system here is near collapse and many preventable infectious diseases are prevalent, notably malaria, HIV-AIDS and tuberculosis. US expertise and money are desperately needed especially in the areas of pediatric care to help reduce suffering and save lives.

LOAD-DATE: January 4, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

Copyright 2008 AllAfrica, Inc.

138 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

January 4, 2008 Friday 4:58 AM EST

REP. SMITH HUMAN RIGHTS MISSION TO CONGO REINFORCES US SUPPORT OF CRITICAL KIVUS PEACE CONFERENCE

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 842 wordsDATELINE: GOMA, Congo

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following news release:

U.S. Rep Chris Smith arrived here Thursday launching a four-day human rights mission that will focus on combating human trafficking, child soldiers and sexual violence while at the same time underscoring US commitment to critical peace negotiations due to convene on January 7, 2008.

"The DRC and the success of its young democracy is a top priority within US foreign policy," said Smith, who is Ranking Member on the House Subcommittee on Africa and Global Health and a Senior Member of the full House Foreign Affairs Committee. "The ongoing conflict in the eastern area of the country severely threatens the newly-elected government. If the new leaders cannot deliver the benefits of democracy--namely citizen protection, accountable government and respect for human rights--the county could easily fall back into the devastating wars that took the lives of more than 4 million people over the decade leading up to the 2006 parliamentary elections," said Smith.

"The Congolese people want and deserve a working democracy. The US has both a humanitarian and a national security interest in helping them attain stability and security in this critical region of Africa. I'm here to reinforce American support for the peace conference and emphasize our long-term commitment to securing universal human rights as the most effective means to obtaining a genuine and lasting peace."

The US is expected to play a significant role in the January 7th conference scheduled to take place in the North Kivu provincial capital of Goma where insurgent fighting has intensified after the 2006 elections. Rebel forces as well as the government military have recently committed some of the worst human rights abuses in the world in this region of Congo. UN peacekeepers in the region have also come under fire for sexually abusing and trafficking Congolese women and young girls in 2004. As Chairman of the Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations, Smith convened a hearing on the sex trafficking abuse issue in Congo and he remains concerned that the UN must continue to aggressively to address this abuse.

"To my dismay and anger I have learned on this mission that the UN is planning on cutting back and downgrading their investigative effort to combat human trafficking by UN personnel," Smith said. "That is unacceptable and I will be working to restore the anti-trafficking investigative positions here in Congo.

"The UN peacekeeping mission in Congo (MUNUC--Mission de l'Organisation des Nations Unies en Republique Democratique du Congo)" is the largest and most expensive UN peacekeeping operation in history," Smith said. "US contributions to the effort top $300 million per year and we have a deep and abiding responsibility to ensure that those sent to establish peace do not become the abuser, exploiting the young girls, they are sent to protect.

"Hundreds of political leaders, parliamentarians, religious leaders and tribal leaders will come together here in Goma next week in an attempt to end the conflict and enable the people of the DRC to move forward with their democracy. The US is a willing international partner and we will continue to work with the new government leadership as it seeks a nation-wide peace and transparent governance for the Congolese people."

Smith, the author of the nation's first anti-trafficking law, the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act (P.L. 106-386) and its two subsequent reauthorizations, noted that, "The DRC government must do more to combat trafficking and the use of child soldiers in the current conflict." In the latest Trafficking in Persons Report produced by the US State Department in June, the DRC is listed as a "Tier 2" country and is a source country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation with the majority of known trafficking occurring within the unstable eastern provinces.

The most recent reauthorization bill, the William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2007 (HR 3887) of which Smith is the lead Republican, passed the House of Representatives last month by a vote of 405-2. This most recent bill includes a prohibition on U.S. military assistance to foreign governments that recruit or use child soldiers. Congressman Smith introduced similar legislation, the Child Soldier Prevention Act of 2006 (HR 5966) in the 109th Congress.

While in Congo, Smith will also be advancing US support for global health initiatives in the region.

"In addition to security, health matters constitute our most important development effort in Congo," said Smith. "The public health system here is near collapse and many preventable infectious diseases are prevalent, notably malaria, HIV-AIDS and tuberculosis. US expertise and money are desperately needed especially in the areas of pediatric care to help reduce suffering and save lives."

Contact: Ryan Goodwin, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: January 8, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

139 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

December 20, 2007 Thursday

Uganda; Masiko Tables Bill On Human Trafficking

BYLINE: New VisionLENGTH: 303 words

RUKUNGIRI Woman MP Winifred Masiko (NRM) has tabled a Bill that seeks to prevent human trafficking. "The Bill seeks to prosecute traffickers and protect victims," she told Parliament on Tuesday.

Masiko said the majority of the victims are women and children. According to the Bill, the offenders will either be jailed, fined or their operations wound up.

Edward Ssekandi, the Speaker of Parliament, said a parliamentary committee would study the Bill.

Damalie Lwanga, the assistant director of public prosecutions, said Uganda had no specific law on human trafficking although it seeks to prevent and punish the offenders.

She said forms of human trafficking included prostitution, early or forced marriages, child labour, illegal adoption, human sacrifice and slavery.

The US has placed Uganda on its watch-list of countries dogged by human trafficking.

According to the 2007 U.S. Trafficking in Persons Report, Uganda falls in 'Tier 2', which refers to countries that do not meet the minimum standards of combating human trafficking but are making significant efforts to ensure compliance.

The report said 7,000 to 12,000 children in the country were victims of commercial sexual exploitation. Of these, about 28% were assisted by third parties such as taxi drivers, bar and brothel owners.

It said the cross-border trade between Uganda and the DR Congo had increased commercial sexual exploitation in Arua district.

Also commercial sexual exploitation was occurring internally in the country, where victims are moved from rural areas to urban centres like Kampala.

People involved in human trafficking were individuals operating on their own, small trafficking groups, militia groups and large criminal syndicates, it added.

The victims are coerced, deceived, kidnapped, sold by their families or separated from their families.

LOAD-DATE: December 21, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

140 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Africa - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

December 18, 2007 Tuesday

US puts Uganda in human trafficking watch list

LENGTH: 342 words

Text of report by Joyce Namutebi entitled "US monitors Uganda on human trafficking" published by Ugandan newspaper The New Vision website on 18 December

The US has placed Uganda on its watch-list of countries dogged by human trafficking. According to the 2007 US Trafficking In Persons Report, Uganda falls in "Tier 2", which refers to countries that do not meet minimum standards of combating human trafficking but are making significant efforts to ensure compliance.

Although Uganda is a source, transit and a destination for trafficking in persons, it does not have a specific law addressing the phenomenon, revealed Rogers Kasirye, the executive director of Uganda Youth Development Link.

Kasirye told a consultative workshop organized by the Uganda Women Parliamentary Association at Ridar Hotel in Seeta, Mukono yesterday that Uganda had not ratified the Palermo Protocol on fighting trafficking although it signed it in 2000.

Parliament recently allowed the chairperson of the Women MPs, Winnie Masiko, to move a private members' bill on human trafficking. Kasirye said although there was scanty information on the actual numbers of persons trafficked; boys were trafficked as early as 10 years and girls at 15 years.

Women and girls are more vulnerable because of their gender roles, he added. He noted that internal trafficking was the highest form, with children brought to Kampala and Mukono from Karamoja, Kisoro, Rakai, Lyantonde, Mbarara, Masaka, Fort Portal, Luwero, Bugerere and Kayunga. The victims, he said, are taken by the traffickers to work as sex slaves in lodges, do manual labour and dance in bars.

Others are taken for marriage, sacrifice, cross-border trade, while others end up as street children. On cross-border trafficking, Kasirye noted that Ugandan children were being exchanged for guns and medicine in Kenya.

The women legislators had invited selected male counterparts to sensitize them on the subject, with a view to seeking their support when the bill is debated.

Source: The New Vision website, Kampala, in English 18 Dec 07

LOAD-DATE: December 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

141 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

December 17, 2007 Monday

Uganda; U.S. Monitors Country On Human Trafficking

BYLINE: New VisionLENGTH: 307 words

THE U.S. has placed Uganda on its watchlist of countries dogged by human trafficking. According to the 2007 U.S. Trafficking in Persons Report, Uganda falls in "Tier 2", which refers to countries that do not meet minimum standards of combating human trafficking but are making significant efforts to ensure compliance.

Although Uganda is a source, transit and a destination for trafficking in persons, it does not have a specific law addressing the phenomenon, revealed Rogers Kasirye, the executive director of Uganda Youth Development Link.

Kasirye told a consultative workshop organised by the Uganda Women Parliamentary Association at Ridar Hotel in Seeta, Mukono yesterday that Uganda had not ratified the Palermo Protocol on fighting trafficking although it signed it in 2000.

Parliament recently allowed the chairperson of the Women MPs, Winnie Masiko, to move a private members' Bill on human trafficking. Kasirye said although there was scanty information on the actual numbers of persons trafficked; boys were trafficked as early as 10 years and girls at 15 years.

Women and girls are more vulnerable because of their gender roles, he added.

He noted that internal trafficking was the highest form, with children brought to Kampala and Mukono from Karamoja, Kisoro, Rakai, Lyantonde, Mbarara, Masaka, Fort Portal, Luwero, Bugerere and Kayunga. The victims, he said, are taken by the traffickers to work as sex slaves in lodges, do manual labour and dance in bars.

Others are taken for marriage, sacrifice, cross-border trade, while others end up as street children. On cross-border trafficking, Kasirye noted that Ugandan children were being exchanged for guns and medicine in Kenya.

The women legislators had invited selected male counterparts to sensitise them on the subject, with a view to seeking their support when the Bill is debated.

LOAD-DATE: December 18, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

142 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Jerusalem Post

November 20, 2007, Tuesday

Israel still falls short over human trafficking problem. US Ambassador Jones warns Knesset of growing danger

BYLINE: Ruth Eglash

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 4

LENGTH: 772 words

Trafficking in human beings for the purpose of slave labor and prostitution is a serious threat to Israel's national security US Ambassador to Israel Richard Jones told a joint session of the Knesset Committee for Foreign Workers and the Subcommittee on the Trafficking in Women Monday.

"Once the channels of trafficking humans have been established then they can easily be used to smuggle drugs arms and even terrorists into the country Jones warned those gathered at the meeting, including representatives of the Justice, Interior, Welfare and Social Services ministries, as well as law enforcement officials and non- governmental organizations.

Jones presented the committee with the findings of the US State Department's 2007 annual Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP), which was published in June. Israel was placed in the Tier 2 category of countries who have made efforts to combat trafficking in human beings but have yet to fully comply with the minimum requirements of the US State Department.

Israel's standing slightly improved on the previous year, when it was placed on the report's Tier 2 Watch List, which is just one level higher than the lowest - countries that completely refuse to comply with the State Department's requirements.

Israel's elevation to Tier 2 and off of the watch list was due in part to legislation passed in the Knesset last October, which broadened the definition of human trafficking and outlined stiffer punishments for those caught trafficking humans, explained Jones. However, Israel needed to make a greater effort to actually prosecute the perpetrators and increase awareness among the victims of their rights, he added.

Israel has made significant progress in combating trafficking into the country but there are still many steps that can and should be taken to improve the situation Jones said, adding that he hoped by the time of next year's report Israel would be elevated to the optimum Tier 1 status.

I believe that Israel not only has to make every effort to reach Tier 1 by next year it actually has no choice but to make it there MK Ran Cohen (Meretz), chair of the Foreign Workers Committee, told The Jerusalem Post following the meeting. I think that with all the pressure from politicians interested in this subject we have a good chance of getting there."

Jones pointed to the appointment in June 2006 of Rachel Gershuni Israel's inter-office liaison on trafficking in persons as another step in the right direction.

A lawyer by training Gershuni presented to the committee some of the efforts initiated over the past year including an agreement with Thailand to ensure basic conditions for workers arriving here. She also said that her department would use the TIP report to evaluate activities in other countries around the world including leveraging private companies to combat trafficking. Israel's national airline carrier El Al is one example of a company that could be utilized to disseminate information to foreign workers coming into Israel said Gershuni.

Among other activities to be put in motion in the coming months Gershuni described the establishment of safe houses countrywide for foreign workers and prostitutes who fall victim to trafficking or slave labor conditions and increased legal assistance for those victims to prosecute their former employees.

Another issue that was raised in the meeting was the handing out of visas to victims of trafficking who want to stay in Israel following their ordeal.

MK Zehava Gal-On (Meretz) head of the Subcommittee on the Trafficking of Women said a firm policy should be established by the Interior Ministry to issue visas to all foreign nationals that have been enslaved in Israel either for purposes of labor or prostitution. Currently the ministry assesses each case individually and hands out visas as a humanitarian gesture.

A representative of the Interior Ministry's Population Registry said When it has been determined the person is a victim we usually do not have a problem handing out the required visas. Our staff has started to undergo training to identify such victims.

"Trafficking in humans is not only a threat to our national borders Gal-On said. Fortitude is also measured by how a country protects its weakest people."

Jones ended the meeting by calling on all governmental bodies and NGOs to work together to eliminate trafficking completely from our society.

"Just as traffickers use networks to transfer people around the world so do governments need to establish networks to prevent or eliminate such exploitation he said.

LOAD-DATE: December 4, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Photo: TRAFFICKING IN HUMANS will lead to drugs arms and even terrorist smuggling US Ambassador to Israel Richard Jones said yesterday at the Knesset. (Credit: Ariel Jerozolimski/The Jerusalem Post)

Copyright 2007 The Jerusalem Post

143 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

November 19, 2007 Monday

Nigeria; Human Trafficking - a View From Edo State

BYLINE: Daily Trust

LENGTH: 2526 words

Annually, some 800,000 persons, made up mainly of women and children, are trafficked across national borders.

Recently, Edo state hosted journalists and experts for a two day anti human trafficking workshop organised by the National agency for the prohibition of traffic in persons (NAPTIP), where the role the media could play in combating trafficking in persons was discussed.

This city was possibly chosen as the venue for this workshop, because Edo state has been labelled as the most endemic state known for human trafficking.

Human trafficking is modern-day slavery, involving victims who are forced, defrauded or coerced into labor or sexual exploitation. Annually, about 600,000 to 800,000 people mostly women and children are trafficked across national borders, which does not count millions trafficked within their own countries.

In a few cases, physical force is used, and in other cases, false promises are made regarding job opportunities or marriages in foreign countries to entrap victims.

In general terms, human trafficking is a multi-dimensional threat which deprives people of their rights and freedom. Not only is it a global health risk, it also fuels the growth of organized crime.

Human trafficking I must say has a devastating impact on individual victims, who often suffer physical and emotional abuse, rape, threats against self and family, and even death. The impact of human trafficking however goes beyond individual victims; it undermines the safety and security of all nations it touches.

The phenomenon of human trafficking in Nigeria has become multi dimensional and multi faceted to the extent that anybody could fall a victim and no one is safe. Besides prostitution, marriage, and forced labour, some of these victims are used for rituals, begging and even for organ transplantation or money laundering. While most trafficking into the commercial sex trade involves young adult women, minors including some children under 16 are also exploited. For example, recent research from Armenia notes a high demand for girls from the age of 15 in some of the Gulf States (the most common destination countries for those trafficked from Central Asia); where after this age girls are considered adults. The majority of customers for child sex in every country are local men, but the presence of foreign tourists, businessmen, and even peacekeeping forces has been cited as a contributory factor.

Surprisingly, even the solemn Muslim pilgrimage has been turned to an avenue for trafficking, by some unscrupulous persons. Hussaina Ibrahim and Idris Aminu were both charged for trafficking from Kano to Saudi Arabia, organizing illegal foreign travels and debt bondage. Their victims were promised good jobs in Saudi Arabia, but were later introduced to prostitution. Hussaina was sentenced to three years while Idris who worked with a traveling agency was sentenced to two years for being an aid to a trafficker.

Nigeria isn't the only country haunted with problems of human trafficking, neither are the effects of such acts suffered by Nigerians alone. Statistics show that every year, out of one to two million trafficked victims who are mostly women and children, but increasingly men and boys as well, a great percentage is taken to Italy while the few others are taken to the United States, Saudi Arabia, Macedonia and India. The most shocking revelation however is that over 40 percent of these victims are under the age of consent.

In Nigeria today, particularly Edo state, human trafficking has become the order of the day it has become an organised crime which has Lawyers, herbalists, corrupt Immigration and police officers all involved in the process.

Sometimes you realise that these traffickers are well connected in embassies in various countries, and could get their victims into trouble, if along the way they refuse to cooperate.

While lots of people blame poverty or culture as a basis for human trafficking in Nigeria, NAPTIP says other causes of the outrageous rate of human trafficking in the country are ignorance, desperation, and the promotion and commercialization of sex by the European Union (EU).

Speaking on the first day of the workshop, the director investigation and monitoring (NAPTIP) Alh. Muhammad Babandede, said that various factors influence child trafficking in Nigeria and the West African Sub-region but the singular and most important excuse and contributory feature however, include poverty and desperation.

According to him, in all countries concerned a large proportion of the population live below the poverty line. However, poverty alone does not explain the prevalence of child trafficking in Nigeria. Most people heavily involved in human trafficking do not necessarily have the most social indicator for poverty, nor possess the worst cases of poverty.

Thus, it is right to say that inadequate educational opportunity, lack of vocational and economic opportunities for the youth in rural areas, institutional lapses, greed and peer group influence among other things amount to desperation and are contributory factors.

Alhaji Babandede added that most victims of human trafficking are lured into believing that a greener pasture awaits them where they will be taken to. Ignorant as most of them are, they eagerly jump to the offer without confiding in anyone. This according to him can be avoided through sensitisation and enlightenment workshops.

"Traffickers prey on the ignorance, self worth and vulnerability of victims. They often promise their victims employment as hair dressers or sales girls, while others are told great jobs in offices and exquisite accommodation, await them on arrival.

A typical and natural counterweight to this is information and education resource. The special role of the media in education, information, and mobilization of the citizenry for development, strategically places them as a strong ally of the Agency."

The first trafficker who was jailed is 51 year old lady. She had procured some girls from Uromi in Edo state with a promise of securing jobs for them in Spain. She took them to Spain and introduced them into prostitution. However she was caught and sentenced to a 36 months jail term which she has served.

These days human trafficking in Nigeria has become an organised crime, Lawyers, herbalists, bankers, corrupt Immigration and police officers are all involved in the process.

"Trafficking in persons is often aided by official corruption in countries of origin, transit and destination, thereby threatening the rule of law; It is unfortunate that law enforcement agents in whom the populace place their trust do not make things easier. Sometimes, law enforcement officers become part of the syndicate."

A few years ago in Bosnia, Human Rights Watch found evidences of visa and immigration officials visiting brothels for free sexual services, in exchange for ignoring the doctored documents produced by traffickers to facilitate transport through the country. While some law enforcement agencies are major participants in the act of human trafficking, a great number of others aren't. In December 2003 for example, NAPTIP in conjunction with the Nigerian Immigration Service and UNICEF Nigeria repatriated a total number of 169 children who were engaged in exploitative activities in Nigeria back to the Republic of Benin.

On the 9th of March, 2005 police in Lagos stopped a refrigerated truck containing 64 children. The children were from Edati Local Government in Niger, Ebonyi, Edo States and Edu Local Govt. in Kwara State. They were apparently being taken to Lagos to work as house helps. Through the collaborative efforts of stake holders such as UNICEF, the French Embassy, Local NGO's and the government of the two affected states, NAPTIP successfully rehabilitated the children and reunited them with their families. The children were trained in vocational skills along with their parents while some others were enrolled in schools.

From its inception up till March 31st 2007, nine hundred and sixty-two (962) victims have passed through the Agency. One hundred and eighteen (118) of them have been rehabilitated, while five hundred and thirty-nine (539) victims are awaiting rehabilitation. Seven hundred and ten (710) of them are female victims and two hundred and fifty-two (252) of them are male victims. The age range of the 55% of the victims is between eighteen to twenty-eight years, 35% of them are between 1 day and seventeen years. The remaining 10% of them are above the age of twenty-eight years.

"We are happy to say that nineteen (19) out of the one hundred and eighteen (118) victims under rehabilitation, have been enrolled in various schools across the country. In addition, the statistics at the disposal of the agency reveal that 45% of the victims are infected with one form of sickness or the other. Presently, nine of them tested HIV positive while two of them suffer from psychiatric cases. In addition, 5% of the female victims were pregnant and some delivered their babies under the care of NAPITIP. As at December 2006, seven babies are under the care of NAPITIP."

Also speaking at the workshop, Head media and communication, (NAPITIP), Mr. Arinze Orakwue, spoke basically from the European Union (EU) point of view. According to Orakwue, the EU is a major promoter of human trafficking, mainly because in their countries commercial sex has been legalized, and since most girls who are trafficked to Europe are introduced to prostitution, it is only natural that they see prostitution as a normal means of lively hood.

"It is disgusting to think that those who indulge in commercial sex in these countries pay tax to the government. It has been made a normal business and the most annoying thing is that these girls who sleep with an average of 10 men in a day, mostly do not use the money for their personal use, rather they give it to their traffickers until they are able to buy their freedom."

Another painful thing according to Orakwue is that by the time these victims succeed in paying for their freedom, most of their traffickers end up selling them out to the authorities over there. They are picked up without any of their belongings or even a dime and deported to their countries.

"These victims are being used from the beginning to the end, once they are deported; their traffickers often end up automatically inheriting everything that belonged to them."

He adds that these days, even the boys are being used to promote commercial sex. Most of them are paid for playing a great role as pimps. An increased understanding of trafficking has exposed the underbelly of the sex industry: and the brutality and viciousness of many pimps and brothel owners.

However, in relation to child pornography and child prostitution which is fast becoming rampant, research has shown that these forms of sexual abuse are more widespread than previously thought. They are not the preserve of 'paedophiles' but may be linked to both sexual abuse in the family and to prostitute and pornography use more generally. Research has also shown an emergence of sex tourism routes within Europe, with a number of cities emerging as places where male and female minors are exploited. A recent report from Italy links sex tourism and trafficking through 'sex cruises' between the mainland and Sardinia and Elba. Most victims often find themselves in these cities and even if some of them attempt to run away they end up being caught or even killed by their traffickers.

Often, people complain that the victims do not press charges when they find out they have in fact fallen victim to human trafficking, but Orakwue explains why the victims should not be blamed for refusing to press charges.

"The victim can in no way press charges without identification or proper and valid documents which they do not have; more so, these traffickers are well connected, they work with the corrupt immigration and sometimes the police, all they need do is make a phone call."

Research has shown that Non governmental organisations (NGO's) have played a crucial role in promoting the issue of sexual exploitation and in developing innovative responses. The NGO sector has focused on direct support for children, young people and Human beings in general. With Barnardos in the UK developing innovative work enabling girls to exit prostitution, Save the Children Norway continuing efforts against child pornography, a range of NGOs in the Balkans establishing shelters for victims of trafficking and NAPITIP in Nigeria.

Jane Osagie, Edo state coordinator of the International reproductive rights research action group said that sometimes parents of these victims are mainly to be blamed. According to her, despite all enlightenment campaigns, most of these parents force or pressurise their children to go abroad, they even encourage them to be trafficked.

She added that in some situations these parents give their children the impression that the NGO's that campaign against human trafficking, do not want to see them become something better in the future.

"We are not saying they should not travel, but if they have to they should do it legally; sometimes in the process of being trafficked, some of these kids die; parents should preserve their children so they would become worthy in this life."

Osagie added that parents must be enlightened that money isn't everything, and poverty isn't lunacy.

"We should not have value for money from just anywhere, rather than engage in trafficking or use our children to make money, let us learn to work hard and become something in future."

Osagie also appealed to the government to embark on infrastructural development to ensure that all citizens live a comfortable live.

"If our social amenities are properly looked into and everyone is comfortable, no one would think of leaving the country talk more of being trafficked."

She appealed to the victims to try to cooperate with Law enforcement agencies so that trafficking in persons will be combated.

"Our greatest challenges are the victims; some of them feel that their dreams have been shattered because they were rescued: and since they have been programmed by their traffickers to lie some of them never give the information you want to know."

For NAPTIP this is also one big challenge they often face but this does not stop them from doing their job effectively. They say:

The child is our first priority Not the needs of the family Not the child's story Not the evidence Not the needs of the court Not the needs of the police

In 2001 Nigeria was categorized in tier 2 of the Trafficking in Persons Country List, compiled by the United States government and the Transparency International. This tier lists states that do not meet minimum standards of combating human trafficking but are recognized to be making efforts to do so. Other African countries in this category include Cote d'Ivoire, Cameroon and Uganda.

There is no doubt that NAPTIP and other child trafficking agencies are doing a great job, but they can do better with the cooperation and dedication of law enforcement agencies and the Nigerian populace in general.

The trip to Edo State was sponsored by NAPTIP.

LOAD-DATE: November 19, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

144 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

November 16, 2007 Friday

OPENING REMARKS AT BIDDER'S CONFERENCE

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 1211 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

MARK LAGON: Good afternoon. Welcome to the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (G/TIP) first annual Bidder's Conference. We plan to make this an annual event. In looking around this room I see many familiar faces who have long partnered with G/TIP on one of the great issues of our day--the fight to abolish human trafficking. Many of you are key allies both in the policy arena, specifically of late on the reauthorization of Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), as well as invaluable partners on the ground. You reflect the diversity of the movement that coalesced around this issue?service providers and human rights NGOs, faith-based and feminist organizations, left and right on the political spectrum. Some of you have long been in the trenches, while others are newer to the fight. We appreciate each of you and applaud your efforts. The success of our own work hinges on close collaboration with the NGO community.

As many of you already know the TIP office, which I have the privilege of leading, has four primary functions: writing the annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which is the U.S. Government's principal diplomatic tool used to engage foreign governments; increasing public awareness; working diplomatically with foreign governments to encourage progress in combating trafficking; and of course, managing anti-trafficking funds. These four functions compliment each other--it is critical to note for the purposes of our discussion today that the annual report and the management of anti-trafficking funds are inextricably linked.

Before beginning a discussion of funding levels and priorities, let's briefly discuss the scope of the problem--that which drives the projects you implement and the programs we fund. Around the world there has been a real paradigm shift in awareness about human trafficking, and a sensitivity that victims are just that--victims, not criminals or illegal aliens. There is a growing refusal to accept enslavement as an inevitable product of poverty or human viciousness. It is not just poverty and desperation that make human trafficking possible, but also the extreme greed and sadism of the exploiters and the catalyst of corruption.

The U.S. Government (USG) estimates that approximately 800,000 people are trafficked internationally each year; millions are enslaved in their own countries. People are coerced into bonded labor, exploited in domestic servitude, and enslaved in agricultural work and in factories. Victims of sex trafficking and slave labor include foreign nationals and U.S. citizens, women and men, and children and adults. Human trafficking is a jargon term. Trafficking as a word makes some think it is chiefly about moving people across borders. It is NOT. Trafficking chiefly involves extreme exploitation and control, both physical and psychological. A few weeks ago I met a 24 year old woman from Nepal who worked as a domestic servant in Kuwait. She'd been beaten and had numerous bite marks all over her arms and back form a sadistic woman who felt impunity to treat her as NO human should be treated. She was, simply, a slave in her employer's house. This is inhuman, and it must be abolished.

Seated here in the comfort of the U.S. State Department we must be ever mindful of the individual faces of human trafficking--lest we forget that policy decisions and funding priorities have real life implications. As we've learned more about this form of modern-day slavery, the U.S.--both government and civil society--has quickly moved into global leadership. We advocate for tougher prosecution of criminals, greater support for victims, and stronger warning messages to prevent innocent men, women and children from being lured into exploitation schemes. In the last five years, over 100 countries have passed new laws or amended existing law to toughen penalties for human trafficking. But much remains to be done.

The annual Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, which is released in June, examines what countries are doing on three fronts--protection, prosecution, and prevention. The report ranks 151 countries and territories. Extensive analysis based on criteria laid out by Congress in the original TVPA goes into the assignment of countries into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List and Tier 3. The report is an authoritative assessment of global trends in human trafficking and it serves to draw the world's attention to the existence of modern-day slavery. One of the trends discerned in field reporting for the 2006 and 2007 Trafficking in Persons Reports is the use of debt as a tool of coercion in both forced labor and sex trafficking. We also noted in the annual report a lack of progress on rule of law which can be traced to official corruption and complicity in the exploitation, on the one hand, and indifference on the other. Desperate migrant laborers are vulnerable to force, fraud and coercion--omnipresent tactics used by traffickers in cases of labor slavery--in a climate of official indifference where this crime is, typically, not criminalized, but considered a civil, regulatory offense.

Importantly from a programming perspective, the report not only identifies trends, but it represents a guide for how U.S. Government foreign assistance should be prioritized to assist governments to respond more effectively--to address those substantive trends and countries of particular concern. Our leadership on human trafficking is not purely rhetorical or even diplomatic as important as both may be. The USG has spent over $449 million dollars for international anti-TIP programs since FY 2001. In FY 2006 alone we obligated approximately $74 million to fund 54 programs in about 70 countries. G/TIP's funds are centrally managed which allow for a tailored response to a smaller number of recently designated priority countries identified in the TIP Report. G/TIP funds are used primarily, although not exclusively to assist Tier 3 and Tier 2 Watch List countries, with a specific focus on deficiencies identified in the annual TIP report and subsequent interim reports. Six countries have been on the Tier 2 Watch List for three or more consecutive years. Several countries struggle to combat trafficking with limited resources and, while they meet the minimum requirements for the TIP Report assessment, they would benefit from assistance and additional expertise in this difficult fight.

Our funding decisions are particularly informed by (1) the severity and scope of the trafficking problem in a particular country, (2) the country's lack of financial resources and (3) the political will on the part of the country's national and local governments. We seek to fund projects in the short term, generally 18 to 36 months, which create an environment conducive to systemic change. Today's conference will allow you to hear from and engage with the dedicated program staff that work in G/TIP. Their passion for this issue and commitment to this cause is matched only by your own. At the heart of U.S. Government efforts to end human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity--a desire not only to rescue people, but restore their dignity. You are our partners in this endeavor.

LOAD-DATE: December 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

145 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 31, 2007

CHRC Briefing: Trafficking in China

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTSLENGTH: 392 words

Congressional Human Rights Caucus

Briefing:

Trafficking in China

Wednesday, October 31, 2007

2:30-4:00 p.m.

Room: 2255 Rayburn

With the 2008 Olympics growing closer, the People's Republic of China and its abysmal human rights record remain under international scrutiny. Among the most serious and pressing human rights issues in China is that of trafficking of women and children. Recently, the State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report placed China on the Tier 2 Watch list for the third year in a row because of Beijing's failure to address trafficking that results in involuntary servitude and to provide comprehensive services to trafficking victims.

The Chinese government does not fully comply with minimum standards to address trafficking; however, it has taken steps towards combating the situation, such as developing a National Plan of Action on Anti-trafficking and creating a joint panel of 21 different ministries to coordinate anti-trafficking efforts and to increase cooperation with neighboring countries. China remains a major source, transit point and destination country for trafficked persons. The majority of trafficking in China is internal, and targets women and children for forced sexual and labor purposes. The International Labor Organization estimates that 10,000 to 20,000 persons are trafficked internally each year, 90% of whom are women and children trafficked for sexual exploitation. As China's one child-policies have contributed to an ever widening gender gap, some experts predict that the male-female imbalance in certain areas may have already contributed to the trafficking of girls and women as "brides."

To discuss these important issues, we welcome as expert witnesses:

Panel One:

Ambassador Mark P. Lagon, Director, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, State Department

Panel Two:

Rebiya Kadeer, President, Uyghur American Association

T. Kumar, Advocacy Director, Asia and Pacific, Amnesty International USA

Tom Malinowski, Washington Advocacy Director, Human Rights Watch

We look forward to seeing you at this important briefing. If you have any questions, please contact Sarah Burns (Rep. Lantos) at 202-225-3531 or Hillary Hosford (Rep. Wolf) at 202-225-5136. For media inquiries, please call Lynne Weil at 202-225-5021.

Sincerely,

TOM LANTOS, M.C. FRANK R. WOLF, M.C.

Co-Chair, CHRC Co-Chair, CHCR

LOAD-DATE: December 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2007 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

146 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 30, 2007

CHRC Briefing: Trafficking in China

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 392 words

Congressional Human Rights Caucus

Briefing: Trafficking in China

Wednesday, October 31, 2007

2:30-4:00 p.m.

Room: 2255 Rayburn

With the 2008 Olympics growing closer, the People's Republic of China and its abysmal human rights record remain under international scrutiny. Among the most serious and pressing human rights issues in China is that of trafficking of women and children. Recently, the State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report placed China on the Tier 2 Watch list for the third year in a row because of Beijing's failure to address trafficking that results in involuntary servitude and to provide comprehensive services to trafficking victims.

The Chinese government does not fully comply with minimum standards to address trafficking; however, it has taken steps towards combating the situation, such as developing a National Plan of Action on Anti-trafficking and creating a joint panel of 21 different ministries to coordinate anti-trafficking efforts and to increase cooperation with neighboring countries. China remains a major source, transit point and destination country for trafficked persons. The majority of trafficking in China is internal, and targets women and children for forced sexual and labor purposes. The International Labor Organization estimates that 10,000 to 20,000 persons are trafficked internally each year, 90% of whom are women and children trafficked for sexual exploitation. As China's one child-policies have contributed to an ever widening gender gap, some experts predict that the male-female imbalance in certain areas may have already contributed to the trafficking of girls and women as "brides."

To discuss these important issues, we welcome as expert witnesses:

Panel One:

Ambassador Mark P. Lagon, Director, Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, State Department

Panel Two:

Rebiya Kadeer, President, Uyghur American Association

T. Kumar, Advocacy Director, Asia and Pacific, Amnesty International USA

Tom Malinowski, Washington Advocacy Director, Human Rights Watch

We look forward to seeing you at this important briefing. If you have any questions, please contact Sarah Burns (Rep. Lantos) at 202-225-3531 or Hillary Hosford (Rep. Wolf) at 202-225-5136. For media inquiries, please call Lynne Weil at 202-225-5021.

Sincerely,

TOM LANTOS, M.C. FRANK R. WOLF, M.C.

Co-Chair, CHRC Co-Chair, CHCR

LOAD-DATE: December 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2007 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

147 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

October 26, 2007

Ambassador Lagon Discusses How To Combat Human Trafficking; USINFO Webchat transcript, October 18

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 6357 words

Ambassador Mark P. Lagon, director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons (TIP), discussed strategies to help fight modern-day slavery around the world in an October 18 USINFO Webchat.

Following is the transcript:

(begin transcript)

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Bureau of International Information Programs, USINFO Webchat Transcript, ,

The Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons: Protecting Victims, Prosecuting Traffickers

Guest: Ambassador Mark Lagon, Date: October 18, 2007, Time: 2:00 p.m. EDT (1800 GMT)

Webchat Moderator: Welcome! We will begin shortly. We do see your questions coming in. Thank you.

Learn more about the work of "G/TIP" at: www.state.gov/g/tip

The 2007 Trafficking Report is available at: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007/>

Ambassador Lagon's biography is available at: <http://www.state.gov/r/pa/ei/biog/84924.htm>

Ambassador Mark Lagon: I direct the State Department's office to monitor and combat trafficking in persons.

The U.S. government estimates about 800,000 people are trafficked internationally across borders each year, and millions more are victims of human trafficking within the borders of countries. Every day, all over the world people are coerced into bonded labor, bought and sold to prostitution, exploited to domestic servitude, sweat shops, factories, and unlawfully recruited to be child soldiers.

Estimates vary widely, but we believe 80% of those trafficked are females. Up to half are children, minors.

There's obese degradation and violation that occurs when someone is bought and sold into sex traffic and labor, but grave global public health implications as well. Trafficking and the spread of global HIV AIDS are linked. People in prostitution have a high incidence of AIDS. For example, HIV AIDS prevalence among people studied from Nepal and prosecuted in India was 38% of those trafficked. The rate of those who had HIV AIDS exceeded 60% among those prostituted at a young age, under 15. Think of that, the exploitation, violence and add on to that a horrible public health risk.

Sex trafficking, sexual servitude, brokered messenger, child sex tourism, largely effect women and children as the chief victims. Human trafficking exists everywhere, in the United States as well.

We are trying to do our best to have a victim-centered approach. They are being treated like criminals, illegal aliens. We need to find them, help with rehabilitation, and help them into lives to be productive in society. It's a bleak picture in some respects, but there's reason for hope over the last several years, in part because the United States has been encouraging other countries, creating laws to target trafficking, and strengthening laws.

My secretary, Secretary Rice, (--inaudible) the fight to end human trafficking, to have a partner in the United States. We want to work with all other nations in the world to fight this problem we have here at home.

It's good for us to have this conversation today. As it happens the President of the United States has come out with an annual determination about the countries we rate as the most serious cases of human trafficking in the world. Some of them are urged to take greater steps by receiving economic sanctions. We also made assessments about improvements that occurred in some countries. I encourage you to look at the website of our office, www.state.gov/G/tip, and I look forward to taking your questions now that we can have this dialogue.

Question [Rajerisoa Voahanginirina]: To Ambassador Lagon: good afternoon Sir, I am Ms Rajerisoa Voahanginirina: I am wondering if it is possible to know the causes/origins of human trafficking. I am not sure if technological development have something to do with the spread of human trafficking? Thanks a lot.

Answer [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: One of the participants has asked a good question about the cause and origins of human trafficking, wondering whether technological development has led to the spread of human trafficking.

You know, one might think of human trafficking as one of the worst forms of globalization, because people are turned into commodities, bought and sold. But it's not the necessary product of globalization. It's right to say poverty helps create human trafficking, but it's not poverty alone. It's not the poverty that drives people in desperate situations to either sex trafficking or slave labor as fates. It's usually poverty plus criminals; criminals who would recruit those vulnerable people, who look for a better life, and get them caught in work situations whether sexual servitude or as construction workers, maids. That's a necessary factor too. Also, not just poverty, it is corruption. Without police, judges, immigration officials who help the traffickers do their evil you wouldn't have this problem being as substantial as it is.

Q [IRC Cairo]: How we can combat trafficking in women in the Middle East?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: You know, I have recently traveled to both India and to four countries in the Gulf, Oman, Bahrain, United Arab Emirate and Kuwait. India, a lot of those trafficked into the Gulf, come from South Asia and India. There's a problem of a mindset when women, migrants are not seen as having full rights. I was delighted to hear the Ministry of Manpower and Labor of Oman say he considered himself not laboring for the citizens of Oman, but the (--inaudible).

I met with a number of maids, domestic workers in Kuwait, saw appalling examples of how maids from Nepal, and from Indonesia, elsewhere, were made to work nearly around the clock for seven-day as a week, beaten, raped, I even met a woman who I understood had bite marks all over her body because her employer thought that it was okay, there was impunity for treating someone that way.

The solution, in the Middle East and every where, law that's treat human trafficking as a serious crime with punishments serious for the exploiter, and enforcing those laws, then some steps to try and change mindsets, where women and children are considered less than human.

Q [Hefler]: "To Ambassador Lagon: good morning Sir. I am Hefler a library patron in Antananarivo Madagascar: Do you really believe that it is possible to suppress human trafficking? So far what Thomas Hobbes said "man is a wolf for other man" seems to be valid. It is inseparable with man's character to abuse others. I would say that a universal morality code will help to fight that trafficking but is it possible? If education is considered to be the efficient solution many nations have already tried to do so, and it is often those who are knowledgeable about it that break the law."

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: One of our participants, basically asks about the problem of evil, whether in a situation when man is a wolf for another man, you can't change their behavior, whether in fact we'll be able to do anything fundamentally to fight human trafficking. I welcome this question from a library patron in Madagascar.

We do need to start with laws that identify that human traffic is a specific problem, and that holds the exploiter to account. Whether it's the recruiter, maybe a shark, metaphor of shark, someone who tries to get someone to come work in a field that sounds like it's going to be a better life for them, but it turns out to be one of the most gross forms of exploitation, whether it's in sexual servitude or in agricultural work or as domestic servant. We need to hold those people to account with strong laws, and those laws have to be thoroughly enforced by police who look for the problem and go after those responsible. So there is a possibility through deterring the worst form of exploitation, through serious punishments, not just a small fine for a labor infraction, but something serious.

I will give you an example. I traveled not so long ago to Thailand. I met with Burmese who are come, to look for better work, ended up recruited to work in a factory, processing shrimp in the seafood industry. The factory turned out to be, in fact, a work camp, a labor camp where she was confined within 15-foot walls. She tried to escape, was caught, beaten in front of her fellow workers, had her head of hair shaved off. This kind of problem didn't lead to the factory being permanently closed, and has not yet led to the punishment of those responsible. There has to be a serious punishment, then we have the hope of deterring this kind of immoral behavior.

Q [Hefler]: Are you working with the United Nations and other countries especially the developing countries where we find a lot of human trafficking? What actions have you done so far to combat human trafficking and how do you assess the results? I am curious to have guidance on the different on going techniques/methods to combat human trafficking? Thanks a lot.

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: Our same participant asks another question, whether we are working with the United Nations, other countries, developed countries especially, where we find a lot of trafficking.

The United States puts out an annual report on human trafficking around the world. We offer an assessment. The most important thing is the United States work in partnership with other countries, not judging, but in fact offering a helping hand. Where we see a significant problem in human trafficking. Where we see a will on the part of governments and society to make a difference, and to work on better prosecuting those responsible, protecting victims, and preventing the problem in the first place through public awareness. We are willing to fund programs that help train law enforcement, create victim shelters, help integrating with society.

The UN, I must say, is following the United States' lead. The United States passed legislation seven years ago to fight human trafficking, creating the office I now head; we have since then been trying to raise public awareness internationally about the program. The UN is trying to start a public initiative to fight trafficking, which we hope will add a multi-lateral effort to fight trafficking on the ground.

That effort of the UN will be most useful if we not only have conferences to raise awareness about the problem, but in fact have practical ways, the way the UN does best, to share training with law enforcement, to identify the problem, be able to spot victims, and assist countries in being able to give the kind of protection to victims of human trafficking that there is.

Moderator: The 2007 Trafficking Report is available at: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007/>

Q [USMI Rome]: From Sr. Eugenia Bonetti and a conference of women religious addressing the issue in Rome -- what is the United States suggesting be done to control the trafficking that takes place on the internet? And what thoughts do you have about the role of women religious (nuns) in the fight against trafficking in persons. And what thoughts do you have about addressing demand. Thank you for the support of our conference in Rome.

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: We have a question from Sister Eugenia Bonetti at a conference addressing the issue in Rome. What's the United State's suggestion to control the trafficking taking place on the Internet. What thoughts do you have for the role of women who are in religious orders?

These are two really good questions that I welcome. On the one hand, it's important to know that sex trafficking doesn't just occur in brothels. In fact, the Internet is a device used by traffickers to put people up for sale, actually not on the auction block, but to be rented, really, for use, for sexual exploitation over and over again.

It's one of the reasons we are working in partnership with the Microsoft company, to try and use their technology to assist law enforcement to be able to go after the traffickers who use the Internet, because in fact, it is a necessary product of the existence of the sex industry on the Internet, that we need to do our best to fight it. It doesn't have to be the result of the information age and technology, that people are relegated to sexual exploitation. It's a very good thing the Microsoft company is putting its money where its mouth is to assist law enforcement in various places around the world.

Q [USMI Rome]: From the Rome conference again: As religious women working directly with prostituted/trafficked people, we see little attention or focus on demand from sex buyers being addressed by governments. What specifically does your office recommend to address the growing demand?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: The other question asked by the participant in Rome, the role nuns and religious orders can play.

I have seen, myself, in Bombay, wonderful examples of nuns running a shelter that gives the greatest support to young girls who are either Indian citizens or from neighboring South Asian states. Girls who had been caught in the web of child prostitution, I have seen them in school, I've seen them in their residences, the love given by those nuns is remarkable. They've done a good job receiving support from others besides the United States government, in the business community and elsewhere. Faith-based organizations have played a tremendous role in preventing human trafficking, a reason we will organize a conference this spring, in 2008, to share lessons, best practices, about how faith-based organizations have done a great deal to combat human trafficking, chiefly by helping victims.

Q [USMI Rome]: And what thoughts do you have about addressing demand. Thank you for the support of our conference in Rome.

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: We have another question from the same participants in the Rome conference on human trafficking. They ask why there's so little attention or focus on the demand from sex buyers being addressed by governments, what specifically would our office do with regard to demand.

The United States feels strongly that the demand for commercial sexual exploitation is the driver that we have to address in dealing with sex trafficking. If there were not demand for the purchase of women and girls, boys for that matter, for commercial sexual exploitation there would be no sex trafficking. Legal prostitution is not the answer to the problem. For regulation, mitigation, it is in fact part of problem. We have to address amendments.

One reason the Congress asked us to look in our next annual report on human trafficking at steps being taken by governments to reduce the demand for sex trafficking. I will say demand is important for all kinds of trafficking. In that part of human trafficking that's slave labor we should also look for the demand for products that may be produced by slave labor. We need to create incentive for those who would allow supply chains, to make sure they clean that up, not just for humanitarian interests, but self-interest.

Q [Mamy Raelison]: What kind of program aiming at restoring a human dignity to those who suffered from human trafficking is now under way? And how do you think of involving health care professionals (medical doctors, nurses, social workers, security forces--)? It seems obvious that those who have a specialty or a special competency in dealing with psychological disorders are among the much needed human resources.

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: We have a question from a participant, has to do with restoring human dignity to those who have suffered from human trafficking, asking in particular how to involve healthcare professionals, like medical doctors, nurses, social workers, security forces.

Let me tell you an example of what we do in the United States. One of my roles in addition to working on the international efforts to reduce this modern-day slavery, I chair an agency, domestic agencies, as well as international in the United States government. Recently I went to a meeting at a medium sized city, Nashville, Tennessee, and I saw how my colleagues in its health ministry were rolling out an effort to cooperate with local healthcare providers, faith-based and humanitarian groups. It was a campaign to rescue, restore victims of human trafficking, whether sex traffic or migrant workers abused. The whole campaign was designed to teach and train those who work in emergency rooms, social workers and others to look for the signs of people that might not just be in a difficult situation, but in fact be in those extreme circumstances of exploitation and control, to look beneath the surface.

That's the kind of effort that I try and share some experience with in the United States, with other countries, because our main goal in a victim-centered approach is to rescue those victims of human trafficking and to go forward, and try to rehabilitate them, and reintegrate them into society, either in the country where they are working, or in their home country, so they can become full and whole human beings again, to restore their dignity, because human trafficking through the control and violence it involves is something that robs basic human dignity from people.

Q [Solofo]: Dear Sir, Hi! my name is Solofo, from Madagascar. I am very interested in this subject, it means that the US government makes values the Human Right Thank you in advance for allowing me to take part in this topic. Would you tell me some reasons why some people make it?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: One of our questioners, Solofo from Madagascar, asks why some people get caught in human trafficking. Let me describe the general pattern we find over and over again to be the case.

You will find that people who are in an economic situation that's pretty desperate in a country, they're looking for a better life, and a recruiter working for an employment agency will offer them some sort of better existence. They will say "I will get you to another country with decent work, decent hours, and decent conditions. You need to give me a large fee to get you there and to place you in that job."

That fee puts the victim in debt, so that when they arrive in the country and they find out the work is not so wonderful, and they might be in enforced prostitution or in a situation of involuntary servitude, they can't leave because they are so heavily in debt. In fact the debt is often designed to never be repaid. It's compounded by the fact they are afraid to go to the police because they were led to believe by employers they will be treated like criminals, they're going to get detained. In fact, they may well be said to have broken the terms of their employment and hence deported back to their home country.

That is how people get caught. They often think that they're doing something that's going to lead to a better life. That's why the young woman I met, who was recruited in Burma, and went to Thailand, thought she would have a better life and found herself in the hell she was beaten for trying to run away from a slave labor factory.

Now, our questioner [Solofo] comes from Madagascar, and I should say something about the situation in Madagascar.

In our own tier system of rankings of countries, which is Tier 1, Tier 2, the Tier-2 Watch List and Tier 3, Madagascar is tier 2. It has some situation of commercial sexual exploitation, and the exploitation of domestic labor working in the mining sector. As for its own law, it's not an adequate law for dealing with human trafficking working on a comprehensive law. There's been some progress on prosecutions, convictions, in the last year for the first time for the human traffickers. As far as protecting victims goes in Madagascar, there has been some rescue of victims and education for people about the problem, particularly note worthy has been an outstanding public awareness campaign about the problem.

Q [Solofo]: Would you tell us where is the most country in which traffic is increased?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: One questioner, one participant in our discussion here asked this question: Would you tell us what's the country where traffic has increased the most.

Well, I guess the best thing to focus on is where the epicenter of human trafficking is, and that's in India, not just because of the size of population, the problem that exists. India is a very impressive exemplar of democracy and development. It's a valued partner of the United States. We're developing a strong alliance with India. And yet there remains a significant problem of human trafficking in India. Let me tell you a little about what I found in a visit to India in September.

There are three kinds of human trafficking one sees in India. One sees sex trafficking, particularly disturbing, I saw victims of child prostitution in Bombay. We see child labor, and you see bonded labor. As far as sex trafficking and child labor goes, the government of India is taking significant steps, working with non-government organizations to try to find victims and help them. As far as prosecutions of those responsible for sex trafficking and child labor, there hasn't been as strong effort, particularly as cases have not put forward investigations to prosecutions for actual convictions in the slow-moving courts in it India.

There are fast-track courts in India for things like fighting narcotics and counter-terrorism and national security threats. I don't see why there couldn't be fast track courts for human trafficking. The scale of the problem in India is caused by the third kind of trafficking, bonded labor. While a law was passed in 1976 making bonded labor illegal, particularly with the legacy of the lowest castes, the so-called untouchables being caught in per pet perpetual forced labor. There remain millions of people in India who continue in brick kilns, stalls, to work in bonded labor, and that's where the largest problem exists and there continues to be some denial about the extent of the problem, an unwillingness to urge state and local authorities to take steps necessary to deal with that.

Q [HANS]: Which types of projects, coming from NGOs, with what limits in amount and duration, would GTIP approve?

We have a question from Hans, a participant regarding Argentina. In particular, there was a question about what types of projects coming from NGOs would be supported by the United States government to fight human trafficking? What's the deadline for presenting projects for funding through our office that I head, and who do the proposals get presented to?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: We solicit proposals from NGOs to be involved in all sorts of aspects of human trafficking; training law enforcement, building shelters, helping victims, rehabilitation, and public awareness. The way to look for how to apply for that grant money is to look at the website of my office, www.state.gov/G/tip.

Or secondly, you can look at the overall website of the U.S. government on its grant solicitations, www.grants.gov. Also, in the country that you are in you can look at the website of the U.S. embassy, and the solicitation of grants related to fight human trafficking will be there. We will put out the solicitation within the next few weeks for the next fiscal year in which we will make those kinds of grants. The United States, just in the last fiscal year has made, devoted some $74 million to projects around the world to support the fight against modern-day slavery.

I should say a word about Argentina since the questioner is from Argentina. Argentina received a tier 2 watch list rating in the last annual report. In fact, one of our questioners has asked whether Argentina is tending towards a tier three rating next year, the lowest rating in the annual report. We are troubled by the tier 2 watch list ranking, but I think there's cause to think Argentina doesn't find itself on a trend to slide downward, if it works with the international community. We see a pattern of moderate levels of sex trafficking, both as a source country for internal trafficking, and as a destination country of those trafficked into Argentina.

There's also some examples of forced labor, where Argentina is a destination country for people from other countries, such as Bolivia and Peru. The need to pass a comprehensive law identifying human trafficking as a specific problem.

Prosecutions are important, not just having a strong law. Our hope is that they will -- there will be more evidence of prosecution and convictions. Those should also include efforts in law enforcement to deal with those officials who are complicit in trafficking as well.

Q [Noor]: What is the situation in Algeria as concerns trafficking of persons in 2007?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: Algeria is on Tier Three, I should say, this year, the lowest category. It was last year on the Tier 2 Watch List.

It's the scene of transit of sub-Saharan Africans. The anti-trafficking law is inadequate in the country because it doesn't prohibit all forms of human trafficking. Prosecutions have been anemic in Algeria. We need to work with our Algerian counterparts to help them develop formal mechanisms to criminalize all forms of trafficking. On protection of victims there is a great need in Algeria for formal identification, formal mechanisms for finding those victims of trafficking. As I've said earlier, victims of trafficking don't come forward, they are afraid of being treated as aliens, criminals, dirty. Today there haven't been public awareness campaigns. [Algeria] is one of those governments that the president's determination about the lowest ranking countries addresses today.

Youth Crime Watch Of South Africa: Sir, My name is Samuel from South Africa, I am working for youth Crime Watch of south Africa, what we have notice about human trafficking is most of the victims are unemployed and lack of skills, what is US government doing to help Africa countries to create job, also I want to what kind of funding that NGOs in crime preventing can apply for from your office.

Q: One of our questioners today, a participant in the web chat, is from South Africa. This questioner asks: Should there be means of getting people to acquire skills, so that they can be self-supporting?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: It's important to look at how we can help people not be vulnerable to trafficking, and then if they are trafficked, to help them. Again, I said that poverty is a cause of human trafficking, but with it, it's necessary to have criminal intent to coerce, to fool, to control victims of trafficking. And also with poverty, corruption becomes an important variable in trapping people in slave situations. There are immigration officials who cooperate with traffickers, with police and judges who are part of the problem by being bribed.

When we have a situation of poverty there is some vulnerability that people, desperate, look for a better situation. The United States supported the millennium challenge corporation initiative, which in addition to our existing foreign assistance which we are sustaining, we have added a new program, which identifies those countries that have been governing justly, reforming economically, investing in their people through education, social programs and healthcare programs. We are trying to create an incentive for those governments who put in place governance and policies of sustainable market-based growth. That helps fight a context in which people might be trafficked.

We also really think it's important that when you find a victim of human trafficking you not only give the social care and the psychological counseling they need, but help equip them have lives that are worthwhile. This is why we really admire the group Hagar particularly, in Cambodia. (inaudible) The Hagar program, which the United States supports with its funding, is designed to support self-sufficiency, they can lead productive lives whether they stay in the country where they are found as victims of trafficking or repatriated to their original country.

Q [Webchat Participant]: Dear sir, in State Department's yearly report is assigned "tier" level. Can you please explain what this means? And for so-called low tier, what actions US will take?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: One of the questions that we received from a chat participant is, "Is the State Department's yearly report assigning tiers by a clear means, and what actions will the United States take if a government has a low rating. Our annual report is based on assessment of the situation of human trafficking, all countries in the world, where we can find incidence of a clear number of trafficking cases from March of one year through February of the next year. About three months later, in June, our annual report comes out. It has four tier rankings. Let me tell you basically what those four tier rankings mean.

Tier 1 countries are countries that have a problem with human trafficking but are taking significant steps, that the government has shown significant commitment to fighting trafficking.

Tier 2 countries have a significant problem with human trafficking, and hasn't successfully dealt with or mitigated, but there's a strong effort by the governments in a tier 2 country to address the problem.

Tier 2 watch list countries are countries that are in danger of sliding in the direction of not addressing human trafficking. They are governments that have a serious problem with human trafficking, but have not demonstrated a great deal of will in dealing with it.

And ultimately tier 3 countries, the lowest category, are where there's a serious problem of human trafficking and the government has very little will to deal with it. Tier 2 watch list countries are in danger of sliding into the lowest category, hence the name watch list.

The presidential determination coming out just today [October 18, 2007], about countries on tier 3, determines if any of the 16 countries that were on tier 3 in the report that came out in June deserve to be reassessed upward after intensive diplomacy and reexamination. And whether any of these countries under the trafficking victims protection act (-- inaudible) deserve economic sanctions. In all of these cases, the United States tries to assess the situation of whether a country addresses prosecutions of those who are responsible for human trafficking, protection of victims, and preventions through public awareness.

We call these the three P's. Prosecution, Protection, Prevention. In all cases of the report the United States tries to offer recommendations about how we might work together to strengthen our efforts in all three Ps. In the report you will find, if you look it up on the web or get a hard copy of the report, you will find a listing for the United States that comes before all the other countries that we assess, and we look at the records of the United States in fighting human trafficking on all the same three Ps. Prosecution, protection and prevention.

The United States doesn't have a perfect record. We are trying to improve our own efforts to fight human trafficking. In fact, our own attorney general, the head of our ministry of justice as it were, puts out an annual report about our efforts at home because we feel we owe it to ourselves and the world to assess our own efforts at the same time as we assess others.

Q [USMI Rome]: Poverty and corruption have been identified as root causes of trafficking in developing countries. What is the United States doing to assist developing countries in fighting corruption?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: We have another question from a participant in Rome. The question is, "Poverty and corruption are identified as root causes of trafficking, in developing countries. What's the United States doing to assist developing countries in fighting corruption?"

I have been talking a great deal in my short tenure about the connection between good governance and fighting human trafficking. Not only is it important to hold traffickers to account by serious punishments as a matter of justice, and to treat women, workers, migrants, minorities, people in prostitution, as being every much as deserving of rights as anybody else. But we need to fight corruption. We are involved in training programs around the world to let police know that there are certain standards, not only do they need to look for victims of human trafficking, but indeed, they can't be part of the problem by supplementing their income, as it's generously worded by some, by receiving bribes from the traffickers. If they are part of the problem they are in fact seriously morally reprehensible.

But our Bureau of International Narcotic and Law Enforcement affairs is involved in training programs and indeed in efforts, funding the UN's office of drug and crime to fight corruption. It's one of the reasons why we were so happy at the successful negotiation of the international convention on corruption, which the United States ratified and became a part a few months ago.

Q [Salazar]: What do you think about the TIP situation in Mexico?

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: Salazar, one of our participants, asked about the situation in Mexico.

Earlier in my tenure I visited Mexico City and other parts of Mexico, a substantial interest to the United States as a neighbor of ours. For four consecutive years Mexico has been in the tier 2 watch list. The situation for human trafficking is as follows: Mainly there's an internal flow of victims of child sexual exploitation. There are some people who come from Mexico to the United States to exploit child labor in the United States. It's also a destination for some who are under desperate economic situations in Central America to look for a better life in Mexico and find themselves caught in slave labor and sexual labor situations.

There's also a very interesting problem of child sex tourism, predators from the United States, Canada and Europe and elsewhere, come to vacation resort spots to take advantage of children in prostitution. This is one reason we highlight the work of Lydia Cacho, one of our heroes on fighting human trafficking, cited in our 2007 trafficking in persons report.

Lydia runs a shelter in Cancun where women, girls who have been victimized by sex tourists, predators, who come, look to take advantage of those who are weak and desperate. That shelter is incredibly impressive; not only helps those trafficking victims, but some of these women in prostitution are young mothers. It educates them. Lydia dared to speak out about the situation, and suggested corrupt officials were part of the problem, that they looked the other way, supported a situation of promoting child sex tourism as a business. She was arrested, roughed up by police, and she took her case to the Supreme Court of Mexico, saying that she was improperly treated, brutalized by the police. Why? To shut her up. She won her case at the Supreme Court.

She's a hero as a journalist who calls attention to the problem of child sex tourism. The United States has tried to take responsibility for those who go to Cancun, Costa Rica, Cambodia, or wherever who want to take advantage of children as child sex tourists. We now hold people responsible for their criminal acts off U.S. soil so when they come back to U.S. soil they will be thoroughly held to account. But Americans aren't the only problem. Canadians, Europeans, Latin Americas, Asians around the world are child sex tourists. The most vulnerable people you can see are children in prostitution. Unfortunately, this is a problem in Mexico.

Q [Solofo]: why are you interested in this subject?

Thanks a lot for answering my questions!

your sincerely

A [Ambassador Mark Lagon]: One of our participants asked how I got interested in the subject, and I wanted to tell you a little about my story, but also how the United States sees its role.

I worked as a staff person in our legislature at the Senate Foreign Relations committee. I played a small part in the development of the legislation in the United States to fight human trafficking, and the legislation that created the office I now head. I am lucky enough in serving on some roles at the State Department on human rights and United Nations affairs to be considered for this job. The office I played a small part in creating I get to head in combating human trafficking. The United States is very eager to not only fight the problem as one of the great moral callings of our day, because human dignity is robbed from people in human trafficking. It's really proper to think of it as a modern-day form of slavery, given the kind of control, exploitation it involves. We are not just interested in the moral cause. We are interested in practical solutions. We really want to work with governments on developing laws that fight human trafficking, on developing ways to find the victims, to look below the surface, just as we are trying to do at home, on finding those who may be grossly exploited but afraid to come forward because they think they will be treated as criminals, as illegal aliens, a classic case of blaming the victim.

The United States sees itself as a partner of other countries. We not only offer a sermon about what our suggestions are for improving the records in other countries for dealing with human trafficking, but we try to offer suggestions, we try to offer some examples of what we've done, to try to bring together people to share examples, why we plan to bring together a faith-based organization this spring to share best practices for using funding to bring together people from throughout Latin America, to talk to each other about ways to help prevent people from being trafficked when they are migrants.

We want to be a partner, and that's how we see our role. I am delighted you have shown the interest in joining this conversation today. We welcome you, checking in with our website. Thanks for spending the time you did. I am sorry I couldn't answer all your questions, but I made an effort to answer questions from all over the world. Thank you very much.

Webchat Moderator: We wish to thank Ambassador Mark Lagon for joining us today.

A full transcript of today's chat will be available at our USINFO Webchat Station:
<http://usinfo.state.gov/usinfo/Products/Webchats.html>.

(end transcript)

(Distributed by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: October 26, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2007 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

148 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

October 24, 2007 Wednesday 4:20 AM EST

ANTI-TRAFFICKING COMMISSION LAUNCHES WORK IN NEW OFFICES

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 312 wordsDATELINE: KABUL, Afghanistan

The U.S. Agency for International Development issued the following mission press release:

Antoaneta Vassileva, Executive Secretary of the National Anti-trafficking Commission (left), Boris Velchev, Prosecutor General, and Daniel Valtchev, Deputy Prime Minister (right) address journalists. On October 23, the National Commission for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings celebrated the opening of its new office on Dimitrov Boulevard with a press conference and a ribbon-cutting ceremony. The event was part of the ten-day initiative "Human Traffic: Time for Action" connected to the European Day for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings. The premises of the National Commission were renovated with the assistance of USAID and the International Organization for Migration (IOM). The opening was attended by Deputy Prime Minister and Chairman of the National Commission for Combating Trafficking in Human Beings Daniel Valtchev, Prosecutor General Boris Velchev, U.S. Ambassador John Beyrle, Executive Secretary of the National Commission Antoaneta Vassileva and IOM Chief of Mission Ilyana Derilova.

In addition to funding renovation and furnishing of the Commission's new office space in the amount of 96,000 leva (approximately $70,000), USAID and IOM assisted the National Commission in developing its action plan for 2007, which the Council of Ministers adopted in September. They will also support the Commission in its implementation of a public awareness campaign, development of a communications strategy, and in the establishment of local anti-trafficking commissions. The U.S. State Department annual trafficking in persons report currently identifies Bulgaria as a Tier 2 country, meaning that the Government of Bulgaria does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so.

LOAD-DATE: November 25, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

149 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 18, 2007

Lantos statement on human traffickingSECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTSLENGTH: 832 words

October 18, 2007

Verbatim, as delivered

Opening statement by Chairman Lantos at hearing, International Trafficking in Persons: Taking Action to Eliminate Modern Day Slavery

According to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, human trafficking, the subject of our hearing today, is the world's fastest-growing international organized crime.

It is also one of the most profitable, generating between 12 and 17 billion dollars per year. There are only two other illicit businesses, the trade in drugs and the trade in weapons, which are more lucrative.

The European Union has designated today, October 18, as "Anti-Trafficking Day," and I commend our friends in the EU for their exemplary efforts to advance the cause of human rights. This step reflects the international consensus on the need to end this tragic abuse.

Every year, according to the International Labor Organization, traffickers move between 700,000 and 2 million women and children across international boundaries, mainly for the purpose of serving the sex trade.

But it doesn't stop there: An almost equal number of men, women and children are trafficked each year for the purpose of forced labor in slave-like working conditions. In our own country, forced laborers have turned up most often in agriculture, domestic service, sweatshops and in restaurants and hotels.

But what I have been giving you here are just numbers. To get a true sense of the personal calamity that results from human trafficking -- and how huge a problem it is -- one needs to look no further than the major newspapers on virtually every continent.

Newswatch of Nigeria recently documented that children in that country are being trafficked to work on plantation farms just as they were 200 years ago. In a chilling reminder of the horrors of the slave trade, Newswatch reports that Nigerian children are being trafficked by boats to other countries and when pursued by law enforcement, thrown overboard just to destroy the evidence.

Today we will hear from a witness who will tell us of her own experiences right here in America with another form of modern-day slavery.

For the past seven years, under the leadership of our colleague, Mr. Smith of New Jersey, this committee has worked tirelessly to combat human trafficking. During that time, we have seen a substantial growth in international awareness and in international cooperation. We have also seen commendable efforts in this area on the part of our own Department of State, the United Nations and some countries around the globe.

Unfortunately, it seems that we are not keeping up with the problem.

In this year's Trafficking-in-Persons Report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice shows a significant increase in the number of countries that are failing to make any effort at all to combat human trafficking. There are now 16 countries in this category, including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, as well as Equatorial Guinea, all of them pressing for better relations with the United States.

Now to explain what this categorization means, in the Trafficking-in-Persons Report, nations are rated on the basis of their efforts to combat trafficking. The highest rating -- Tier 1 -- goes to countries that fully comply with the best international standards, while the lowest rating -- Tier 3 -- goes to those countries that do not comply and who are making no effort to do so.

The President is more than a month late in issuing his determinations as to what countries are in the various tiers. While I will withhold judgment until I see the President's judgment, I am very much concerned that the Administration will waive sanctions or move countries out of Tier 3 without any real commitments by those countries to make progress in this area. Such decisions would make it clear that we are not prepared to apply the same standards uniformly.

We cannot restore our moral leadership around the world, which has been so battered in recent years, if we are not willing to deal frankly with friendly countries.

Later today I will be introducing legislation with Mr. Smith and Mr. Conyers designed to address some of the problems spelled out in the 2007 Trafficking-in-Persons Report. The key items in our new legislation will be the following:

We will require a comprehensive analysis of trafficking data to help us understand better where victims are actually going and how to free them.

We will provide more help for countries to inspect locations where forced labor occurs, to register vulnerable populations and to provide more protection to foreign workers.

We will ensure that US assistance programs are both transparent and effective.

We will urge the Administration to work with our friends to reach agreements between labor exporters and labor importers so that vulnerable workers have more, rather than less protection,

And finally we will address the tragic subject of child soldiers.

I earnestly hope that all my colleagues will join me in supporting this important legislation.

LOAD-DATE: December 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

150 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

October 18, 2007

Opening statement by Chairman Lantos at hearing, International Trafficking in Persons: Taking Action to Eliminate Modern Day Slavery

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTSLENGTH: 832 words

October 18, 2007

Verbatim, as delivered

Opening statement by Chairman Lantos at hearing, International Trafficking in Persons: Taking Action to Eliminate Modern Day Slavery

According to the United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime, human trafficking, the subject of our hearing today, is the world's fastest-growing international organized crime.

It is also one of the most profitable, generating between 12 and 17 billion dollars per year. There are only two other illicit businesses, the trade in drugs and the trade in weapons, which are more lucrative.

The European Union has designated today, October 18, as "Anti-Trafficking Day," and I commend our friends in the EU for their exemplary efforts to advance the cause of human rights. This step reflects the international consensus on the need to end this tragic abuse.

Every year, according to the International Labor Organization, traffickers move between 700,000 and 2 million women and children across international boundaries, mainly for the purpose of serving the sex trade.

But it doesn't stop there: An almost equal number of men, women and children are trafficked each year for the purpose of forced labor in slave-like working conditions. In our own country, forced laborers have turned up most often in agriculture, domestic service, sweatshops and in restaurants and hotels.

But what I have been giving you here are just numbers. To get a true sense of the personal calamity that results from human trafficking -- and how huge a problem it is -- one needs to look no further than the major newspapers on virtually every continent.

Newswatch of Nigeria recently documented that children in that country are being trafficked to work on plantation farms just as they were 200 years ago. In a chilling reminder of the horrors of the slave trade, Newswatch reports that Nigerian children are being trafficked by boats to other countries and when pursued by law enforcement, thrown overboard just to destroy the evidence.

Today we will hear from a witness who will tell us of her own experiences right here in America with another form of modern-day slavery.

For the past seven years, under the leadership of our colleague, Mr. Smith of New Jersey, this committee has worked tirelessly to combat human trafficking. During that time, we have seen a substantial growth in international awareness and in international cooperation. We have also seen commendable efforts in this area on the part of our own Department of State, the United Nations and some countries around the globe.

Unfortunately, it seems that we are not keeping up with the problem.

In this year's Trafficking-in-Persons Report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice shows a significant increase in the number of countries that are failing to make any effort at all to combat human trafficking. There are now 16 countries in this category, including Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar and the United Arab Emirates, as well as Equatorial Guinea, all of them pressing for better relations with the United States.

Now to explain what this categorization means, in the Trafficking-in-Persons Report, nations are rated on the basis of their efforts to combat trafficking. The highest rating -- Tier 1 -- goes to countries that fully comply with the best international standards, while the lowest rating -- Tier 3 -- goes to those countries that do not comply and who are making no effort to do so.

The President is more than a month late in issuing his determinations as to what countries are in the various tiers. While I will withhold judgment until I see the President's judgment, I am very much concerned that the Administration will waive sanctions or move countries out of Tier 3 without any real commitments by those countries to make progress in this area. Such decisions would make it clear that we are not prepared to apply the same standards uniformly.

We cannot restore our moral leadership around the world, which has been so battered in recent years, if we are not willing to deal frankly with friendly countries.

Later today I will be introducing legislation with Mr. Smith and Mr. Conyers designed to address some of the problems spelled out in the 2007 Trafficking-in-Persons Report. The key items in our new legislation will be the following:

We will require a comprehensive analysis of trafficking data to help us understand better where victims are actually going and how to free them.

We will provide more help for countries to inspect locations where forced labor occurs, to register vulnerable populations and to provide more protection to foreign workers.

We will ensure that US assistance programs are both transparent and effective.

We will urge the Administration to work with our friends to reach agreements between labor exporters and labor importers so that vulnerable workers have more, rather than less protection,

And finally we will address the tragic subject of child soldiers.

I earnestly hope that all my colleagues will join me in supporting this important legislation.

LOAD-DATE: December 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

151 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

October 18, 2007 ThursdayPRESIDENTIAL DETERMINATION WITH RESPECT TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS' EFFORTS REGARDING TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS*BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 7104 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

Memorandum for the Secretary of State

SUBJECT: Presidential Determination with Respect to Foreign Governments' Efforts Regarding Trafficking in Persons

Consistent with section 110 of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 (Division A of Public Law 106?386), as amended, (the "Act"), I hereby:

Make the determination provided in section 110(d)(1)(A)(i) of the Act, with respect to Burma, Syria, and Venezuela not to provide certain funding for those countries' governments for Fiscal Year 2008, until such government complies with the minimum standards or makes significant efforts to bring itself into compliance, as may be determined by the Secretary of State in a report to the Congress pursuant to section 110(b) of the Act;

Make the determination provided in section 110(d)(1)(A)(ii) of the Act, with respect to Cuba, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), and Iran not to provide certain funding for those countries' governments for Fiscal Year 2008, until such government complies with the minimum standards or makes significant efforts to bring itself into compliance, as may be determined by the Secretary of State in a report to the Congress pursuant to section 110(b) of the Act;

Make the determination provided in section 110(d)(3) of the Act, concerning the determination of the Secretary of State with respect to Equatorial Guinea and Kuwait.

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Algeria, that provision to Algeria of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Bahrain, that provision to Bahrain of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to DPRK, that funding for educational and cultural exchange programs described in section 110(d)(1)(A)(ii) of the Act that are aimed at improving U.S.-DPRK relations would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Iran, that funding for educational and cultural exchange programs described in section 110(d)(1)(A)(ii) of the Act that include educators and municipal leaders would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Malaysia, that provision to Malaysia of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Oman, that provision to Oman of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Qatar, that provision to Qatar of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Saudi Arabia, that provision to Saudi Arabia of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Sudan, that provision to Sudan of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Syria, for all programs, projects, or activities of assistance for victims of trafficking in persons or to combat such trafficking, that provision to Syria of the assistance described in section 110(d)(1)(A)(i) of the Act for such programs, projects, or activities would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Uzbekistan, that provision to Uzbekistan of all programs, projects, or activities of assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, with respect to Venezuela, for all programs, projects, or activities of assistance for victims of trafficking in persons or to combat such trafficking, or for strengthening democracy or good governance, or for public diplomacy, that provision to Venezuela of the assistance described in sections 110(d)(1)(A)(i) and 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act for such programs, projects, or activities would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States;

Determine, consistent with section 110(d)(4) of the Act, that assistance to Venezuela described in section 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act that:

(1) is a regional program, project, or activity under which the total benefit to Venezuela does not exceed 10 percent of the total value of such program, project, or activity; or

(2) has as its primary objective the addressing of basic human needs, as defined by the Department of the Treasury with respect to other, existing legislative mandates concerning U.S. participation in the multilateral development banks; or

(3) is complementary to or has similar policy objectives to programs being implemented bilaterally by the United States Government; or

(4) has as its primary objective the improvement of the country's legal system, including in areas that impact the country's ability to investigate and prosecute trafficking cases or otherwise improve implementation of a country's anti-trafficking policy, regulations, or legislation; or

(5) is engaging a government, international organization, or civil society organization, and that seeks as its primary objective(s) to: (a) increase efforts to investigate and prosecute trafficking in persons crimes; (b) increase protection for victims of trafficking through better screening, identification, rescue/removal, aftercare (shelter, counseling) training and reintegration; or (c) expand prevention efforts through education and awareness campaigns highlighting the dangers of trafficking or training and economic empowerment of populations clearly at risk of falling victim to trafficking would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

The certification required by section 110(e) of the Act is provided herewith.

You are hereby authorized and directed to submit this determination to the Congress, and to publish it in the Federal Register.

GEORGE W. BUSH

MEMORANDUM OF JUSTIFICATION CONSISTENT WITH THE TRAFFICKING VICTIMS PROTECTION ACT OF 2000, REGARDING DETERMINATIONS WITH RESPECT TO "TIER 3" COUNTRIES

The President has made determinations regarding the sixteen countries placed on Tier 3 of the State Department's 2007 annual Report on Trafficking in Persons. The President has determined to sanction Burma, Cuba, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK), Iran, Syria, and Venezuela. The United States will not provide funding for participation by officials or employees of the governments of Cuba, the DPRK, or Iran in educational and cultural exchange programs until such government complies with the Act's minimum standards to combat trafficking or makes significant efforts to do so. The United States will not provide certain non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance to the governments of Burma, Syria, or Venezuela until such government complies with the Act's minimum standards to combat trafficking or makes significant efforts to do so. Furthermore, the President determined, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, that provision of certain assistance to the governments of the DPRK, Iran, Syria, and Venezuela would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States. The President also determined, consistent with the Act's waiver authority, that provision of all bilateral and multilateral assistance to Algeria, Bahrain, Malaysia, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, and Uzbekistan that otherwise would have been cut off would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

The determinations also indicate the Secretary of State's subsequent compliance determinations regarding Equatorial Guinea and Kuwait. It is significant that two of the sixteen Tier 3 countries took actions that averted the need for the President to make a determination regarding sanctions and waivers. Information highlighted in the Trafficking in Persons report and the possibility of sanctions, in conjunction with our diplomatic efforts, encouraged these countries' governments to take important measures against trafficking.

Section 110(d)(1)(B) of the Act interferes with the President's authority to direct foreign affairs. We, therefore, interpret it as precatory. Nonetheless, it is the policy of the United States that, consistent with the provisions of the Act, the U.S. Executive Director of each multilateral development bank, as defined in the Act, and of the International Monetary Fund will vote against, and use the Executive Director's best efforts to deny any loan or other utilization of the funds of the respective institution to the governments of Burma, Cuba, DPRK, Iran, Syria, and Venezuela (with specific exceptions for Venezuela) for Fiscal Year 2008, until such a government complies with the minimum standards or makes significant efforts to bring itself into compliance, as may be determined by the Secretary of State in a report to the Congress pursuant to section 110(b) of the Act.

Explanations of the President's determinations regarding each of the 16 countries follow.

Equatorial Guinea

On the basis of positive actions undertaken by the Government of Equatorial Guinea since March 2007, the Secretary of State has determined that the Government of Equatorial Guinea does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. This is the standard for placement on Tier 2 of the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The Secretary of State has placed Equatorial Guinea on the Special Watch List because the determination that the Government of Equatorial Guinea is making significant efforts is based, in part, on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

In June 2007, the Government of Equatorial Guinea was presented with an action plan by the State Department that outlined steps to combat trafficking. Since that time, it has accomplished each of the items in the Department's action plan or made commitments to take additional future steps over the next year, thus demonstrating "significant efforts." These efforts include:

Prosecution

The government has pledged to train police to identify and arrest traffickers and rescue trafficking victims in the coming year. Authorities began to inspect public establishments to enforce laws against forced child labor and commercial sexual exploitation. The government penalized market sellers for child labor exploitation by confiscating their goods. The Ministry of National Security distributed a circular to all police stations to heighten awareness of trafficking.

Protection

The government entered into discussions with nongovernmental organizations about partnerships to provide care to trafficking victims. The Ministry of National Security distributed a circular to all police stations advising officers on appropriate responses to trafficking victims. The government renewed pledges to construct victim shelters and to conduct a nationwide census to identify foreign children living in Equatorial Guinea without their parents.

Prevention

The government posted anti-trafficking billboards in Malabo and Bata. It informed the public through newspaper announcements and radio and television broadcasts that authorities had begun to inspect public establishments to enforce laws against forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation.

Kuwait

On the basis of positive actions undertaken by the Government of Kuwait since March 2007, the Secretary of State has determined that the Government of Kuwait does not yet fully comply with the minimum standards in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) for the elimination of trafficking, but is making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. This is the standard for placement on Tier 2 of the State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report.

The Secretary of State has placed Kuwait on the Special Watch List because the determination that the Government of Kuwait is making significant efforts is based, in part, on commitments by the country to take additional future steps over the next year.

In June 2007, the Government of Kuwait was presented with an action plan by the State Department that outlined steps to combat trafficking. Since that time, it has accomplished each of the items in the Department's action plan or made commitments to take additional future steps over the next year, thus demonstrating "significant efforts." These efforts include:

Prosecution

The government has pledged to enact already fully drafted anti-trafficking legislation. The government has pledged to provide evidence of increased prosecutions, convictions and sentences.

Protection

The government in September 2007 opened a shelter for trafficking victims and pledged to continue developing a fully operational shelter freely accessible to trafficking victims.

Prevention

The government pledged to provide technical training to law enforcement, attorneys, and judges on investigating and prosecution trafficking cases and victim identification.

Algeria

The Government of Algeria does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Algeria, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Algeria has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of trafficking of men, women, and children both within and through Algeria. The government did not prosecute any individuals for trafficking offenses, and did not train law enforcement or judicial officials on anti-trafficking measures. The government does not offer protective services to victims and did not institute a victim identification procedure to prevent the punishment or summary deportation of trafficking victims. The Government of Algeria also has not developed a public awareness campaign or other trafficking prevention programs. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Algeria, however, is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Algeria in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative, and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions : Approximately $700,000 in International Military Education and Training funding would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Development assistance of approximately $1.165 million would have also been subject to sanction. Sanctioning this aid would have removed a United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Algeria.

Bahrain

The Government of Bahrain does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Bahrain, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Bahrain has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude and commercial sexual exploitation in which many foreign domestic workers and women are found in Bahrain. The government offers protective services to victims through a shelter; it has recently lifted some of the restrictions on access to this shelter. Nonetheless, the government has not instituted a victim identification procedure to prevent the punishment or summary deportation of trafficking victims. The Government of Bahrain's record of prosecuting trafficking offenses remains poor. The Government of Bahrain also has not developed a public awareness campaign or other trafficking prevention programs. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Bahrain is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Bahrain in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions : A projected two billion dollars in foreign military sales to Bahrain would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Development assistance of $1.1 million would have also been subject to sanction. Sanctioning this aid and MEPI programs would have removed a United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Bahrain.

Burma

The Government of Burma does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Burma.

Justification : The Burmese military remains directly involved in forced labor and there are reports that some children have been involuntarily conscripted into the Burmese Army for the purpose of forced labor. Although the Burmese Government has taken increased steps to combat trafficking for sexual exploitation, the significant state-sanctioned use of internal forced labor, especially by the military, continues.

Impact of Sanctions : The United States does not provide direct assistance to the Government of Burma. In fiscal year 2007, the Government of Burma received $1 million in U.S. assistance through the United Nations World Health and Food and Agriculture Organizations for avian influenza preparedness and response. The United States Government provides humanitarian assistance along the Thai-Burma border through various nongovernmental organizations, supports democracy activities both inside and outside the country, and supports the provision of services to those with or at-risk of HIV/AIDS. The United States also has supported a nongovernmental organization working in Burma to assist victims of trafficking repatriated from Thailand.

Existing sanctions on Burma include a ban on new investment, bilateral assistance, and arms sales, and imposition of travel restrictions against senior Burmese officials and their immediate relatives. Executive Order 13310, issued in part in implementation of the Burmese Freedom and Democracy Act of 2003, imposes additional measures including a ban on imports of Burmese products, a ban on the exportation of financial services to Burma, and a freeze on the assets of four entities -- the State Peace and Development Council, the Myanmar Foreign Trade Bank, the Myanmar Investment and Commercial Bank, and the Myanmar Economic Bank -- as well as the assets of individuals determined to be senior officials of the Burmese regime, the State Peace and Development Council, or the Union Solidarity and Development Association. The import ban was renewed in 2004, 2005, 2006, and 2007.

Cuba

The Government of Cuba does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Cuba.

Justification : The Government of Cuba continues to dismiss as politically motivated criticism of its failure to address trafficking. Cuba's state-sponsored tourism industry tacitly promotes the prostitution of children and is a draw for foreign sex tourists. The government has avoided developing a strategy to address the problem, and has no discernable anti-trafficking law enforcement, victim protection, or prevention policies. Moreover, there was no observed progress in punishing traffickers during the last year.

Impact of Sanctions : The Government of Cuba is already subject to an extensive economic embargo tied to Cuba's poor record on, among other things, democracy, human rights and economic reform. No Cuban government officials or employees participate in current or planned United States Government-funded educational or cultural exchange programs. The United States Government does not offer economic assistance to the Government of Cuba and will not allow any significant new investment in Cuba by U.S. companies until democratic and economic reforms are instituted. While the embargo-related sanctions will remain in place until there are fundamental political and economic reforms in Cuba, sanctioning Cuba for activities related to trafficking in persons expresses clear U.S. disapproval of the Cuban Government's acceptance, if not endorsement, of such activities. The United States Government supports non-governmental entities under Section 109 of the LIBERTAD Act of 1996, and sanctions against Cuba do not apply to activities under that section.

Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK)

The Government of the DPRK does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction the DPRK. The President has also determined that provision of funding for educational and cultural exchange programs that are aimed at improving U.S.-DPRK relations would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of the DPRK is making no effort to address trafficking in persons. The government does not recognize trafficking as a problem and imposes forced labor conditions and other forms of severe punishment on its prisoners, including North Koreans forcibly returned from China. Further, conditions in the DPRK drive many North Koreans to seek a way out of the country, putting them at risk of becoming trafficking victims. Women who enter northern China from the DPRK may be sold as brides and trafficked for purposes of sexual exploitation. Although other U.S. measures against North Korea are in place, the President's determination indicates the strong U.S. disapproval of the DPRK Government's failure to address trafficking in persons.

Impact of Sanctions : The imposition of partial sanctions will further the national interest of the United States by allowing educational and cultural exchange programs that are aimed at improving U.S.-DPRK relations.

Iran

The Government of Iran does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Iran. The President has also determined that provision of funding for educational and cultural exchange programs that include educators and municipal leaders would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Iran continues to dismiss criticism of its inadequate anti-trafficking efforts while continuing to punish -- often severely, including beatings, imprisonment, and execution -- victims of trafficking. Specifically, children who have been trafficked in Iran's illegal commercial sex trade have been punished as adulterers by Iran's Islamic courts; some have been executed. The government has avoided developing a comprehensive strategy to address Iran's human trafficking problem.

A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as it will allow certain types of individuals who are influential in Iranian society -- educators and municipal leaders -- to learn about and be exposed to the United States and its people.

Impact of Sanctions : The Government of Iran is already subject to economic sanctions due to, among other things, its support for international terrorism. The United States Government does not provide economic assistance to the Government of Iran. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for educational and cultural programs that involve the participation of individuals who in some cases may be affiliated with the government.

Malaysia

The Government of Malaysia does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Malaysia, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Malaysia has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problems of trafficking of foreign nationals to its country for sexual and labor exploitation. The government has not improved its poor anti-trafficking law enforcement record or shown an effort to identify and protect victims of trafficking for sexual exploitation and forced labor. It did not fulfill a long-standing pledge to open a much-needed shelter for foreign victims of trafficking or to fund nongovernmental organizations to provide victim protection services. Although the government drafted, passed, and enacted an anti-trafficking law in July 2007, it does not appear to offer adequate victim protections and there are no discernable plans for its implementation. The government continues to incarcerate and summarily deport foreign victims, and the new law will not curb this practice. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Malaysia is in the national interest because it will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions : Approximately $24 million in counter-terrorism assistance; $35 million in Foreign Military Sales; $920,000 in International Military Education and Training funds; up to $1 million in Peacekeeping Operations funds under the Global Peace Operations Initiative (GPOI); and up to $1 million in Foreign Military Financing as part of the East Asia and the Pacific Bureau's regional maritime program would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of allowing for the uninterrupted continuation of important military-to-military security cooperation programs and to allow for military sales in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror.

Oman

The Government of Oman does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Oman, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Oman has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude in which many foreign domestic workers and laborers are found in Oman. The government has not demonstrated a commitment to punishing trafficking offenses; Oman rarely prosecutes trafficking offenses despite laws that could be used to do so. The government also has not instituted victim identification procedures capable of preventing the punishment or deportation of trafficking victims and currently offers no protection services to identified victims. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Oman is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Oman in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions : Over $10.1 million in Foreign Military Financing; $23 million in projected foreign military sales; and $1.5 million in International Military Education and Training funding to Oman would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Sanctioning MEPI programs would have removed a key United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Oman.

Qatar

The Government of Qatar does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Qatar, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Qatar has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude in which many foreign domestic workers are found in Qatar. The government offers protective services to victims through a shelter. Nonetheless, the government has not instituted a victim identification procedure to prevent the punishment of trafficking victims, and victims are believed to be among those detained indefinitely in deportation centers. Qatar continues to provide training to government officials through seminars and conferences, and has committed to paying for comprehensive law enforcement training over the next year. However, the Government of Qatar's record of prosecuting trafficking offenses remains poor; the government did not report any prosecutions of those suspected of trafficking crimes. Qatar also has not developed a public awareness campaign or other trafficking prevention programs. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Qatar is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Qatar in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions : Approximately $15,000 in International Military Education and Training funds would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Sanctioning MEPI programs would have removed a key United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Qatar.

Saudi Arabia

The Government of Saudi Arabia does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive all sanctions against Saudi Arabia, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Saudi Arabia has not taken sufficient steps to address the significant problem of involuntary servitude in which many foreign domestic workers and laborers are found in Saudi Arabia, but has committed to work with the U.S. Government on this problem through a constructive dialogue. The government offers only a small, if growing, number of services for these victims of trafficking -- who are among millions of South and Southeast Asian workers brought to the Kingdom -- and prosecutes few of those suspected of trafficking crimes. The government has ample resources to address Saudi Arabia's trafficking problems, but has only recently begun to show an interest in tackling this serious human rights issue. The granting of a full waiver of sanctions against Saudi Arabia is in the national interest because it will allow us to continue democracy programs in Saudi Arabia in support of the President's Freedom Agenda through the Middle East Partnership Initiative (MEPI), and will permit continued security cooperation to effectively prosecute the Global War on Terror.

Impact of Sanctions : Twenty billion dollars in projected foreign military sales to Saudi Arabia and $15,000 in International Military Education and Training funding would have been restricted by sanctions under the Act. A full waiver has been granted in the national interest of providing these military sales in order to advance goals of the Global War on Terror and U.S. commercial interests. Sanctioning MEPI programs would have removed a key United States Government tool in promoting democratic reform and human rights in Saudi Arabia.

Sudan

The Government of Sudan does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive sanctions against Sudan, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : Since March 2007, the Government of Sudan has made no progress in rescuing and reintegrating victims of trafficking into their communities of origin, resulting in thousands of people continuing to remain in prolonged situations of forced labor and sexual exploitation. It also made no effort to address the trafficking of women for domestic servitude within and through the country. The government, however, made limited progress in demobilizing and reintegrating children associated with armed groups, assisting in the reunification of 24 children with their families in May.

A full waiver of sanctions is in the U.S. national interest as it will allow the funding of programs to, among other things, enhance security within the country and carry out additional reconstruction projects in Southern Sudan.

Impact of Sanctions : Comprehensive sanctions against Sudan are already in place, including those imposed under the International Emergency Economic Powers Act, those related to its designation as a state sponsor of terrorism, and several other sanctions. Applying additional sanctions would have precluded an estimated $41.8 million in assistance to bolster security within the country and further the reconstruction of Southern Sudan.

The end of the 21-year civil war in Sudan, as marked by the signing of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) by the Government of Sudan and the Sudan People's Liberation Army on January 9, 2005, signaled a new era for Sudan. The United States is working with the parties to implement the peace agreement and bring about democratic transformation in Sudan. Now that the Sudanese government and the Sudan Liberation Movement/Army have signed the Darfur Peace Agreement (DPA), we have the opportunity to make lasting contributions to resolve the crisis in Darfur. Under the CPA, we intend to implement a wide variety of programs to restore effective governance and allow economic growth in the South and other conflict areas. These would likely include, but not be limited to, programs aimed at restoring a functioning judicial system and other elements necessary for the return to the rule of law and security, a functioning legislature, elements of a market economy, mitigating conflict, and ensuring security. Efforts in Darfur are even more vital now that the DPA has been signed because we must develop programs similar to those in the South, such as the development of democracy and a functional civil society. Bilateral programs and projects in both of these areas, in conjunction with other countries and international institutions, are currently underway. The President's action will allow these important efforts to continue as appropriate.

Syria

The Government of Syria does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Syria. The President has also determined that provision of certain bilateral assistance for anti-trafficking activities in Syria would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Syria has not made significant efforts to address its trafficking in persons problem since the release of the June Report. The government made no efforts to develop an anti-trafficking policy, increase identification of trafficking victims or prosecutions of traffickers, or raise public awareness of the issue of trafficking. Although the government began drafting a comprehensive anti-trafficking law, Syria reported no law enforcement efforts to punish trafficking offenses this year. In addition, the government did not offer protection services to victims of trafficking, and appears to have arrested or prosecuted some victims for prostitution or immigration violations.

A partial waiver of sanctions is in the national interest by precluding most forms of assistance but allowing funding for anti-trafficking programs.

Impact of Sanctions : The Government of Syria is already subject to economic sanctions due to, among other things, its support for international terrorism. The partial waiver will allow the provision of funding for anti-trafficking programs.

Uzbekistan

The Government of Uzbekistan does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to waive sanctions against Uzbekistan, consistent with the provisions of the Act, in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Uzbekistan has yet to focus serious attention or devote significant resources to its substantial trafficking problem. The government failed to amend its criminal code that currently ensures nearly all convicted traffickers receive amnesty and thus serve no time in prison. Furthermore, the government did not adopt comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation, did not approve a national plan of action on trafficking, provided minimal assistance to the country's two trafficking shelters, and the interagency anti-trafficking working group continues to lack legal status. The Government of Uzbekistan has yet to act to address these deficiencies and make these significant efforts. The government's inaction indicates a severe lack of commitment to seriously address trafficking in persons.

A full waiver of sanctions is in the national interest as it will allow the funding of programs in Uzbekistan to, among other things, combat trafficking in persons, address HIV/AIDS and other disease prevention by strengthening laboratory systems, enhance avian influenza preparedness, promote democracy, improve border security, enhance counternarcotics efforts, and support agricultural sector productivity by land and water management.

Impact of Sanctions : Sanctions would have precluded an estimated $8.5 million in assistance to the government of Uzbekistan.

Venezuela

The Government of Venezuela does not fully comply with the Act's minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, and is not making significant efforts to bring itself into compliance. The President has determined to sanction Venezuela. The President has also determined that provision of certain bilateral and multilateral assistance designed to strengthen anti-trafficking, democracy, good governance, and public diplomacy programs in Venezuela would promote the purposes of the Act or is otherwise in the national interest of the United States.

Justification : The Government of Venezuela has not yet dedicated serious attention or significant resources to confronting a growing human trafficking problem in the region. During the past year, the Government carried out no discernable anti-trafficking law enforcement activities or efforts to protect and shelter trafficking victims. Political events in the country have contributed to this lack of action, and the provision of limited assistance, including to strengthen the democratic process in Venezuela will serve to promote stable and legitimate leadership that will, it is hoped, make significant efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

Impact of Sanctions : The imposition of partial sanctions will further the national interest of the United States by precluding most forms of assistance, but allowing certain other assistance. A partial waiver allows important U.S. assistance programs in Venezuela to continue at a critical time for Venezuelan democracy. Specifically, the United States Agency for International Development will continue programs that support civil society, political party building, national dialogue and public diplomacy in Venezuela. These programs are implemented by Development Alternatives, Inc., the International Republican Institute and the National Democratic Institute, among others, and are open to all political parties in Venezuela, including the pro-government Fifth Republican Movement.

Venezuela is already subject to a number of legal restrictions that preclude most forms of assistance to the Government of Venezuela.

LOAD-DATE: January 25, 2008

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

152 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

October 18, 2007 Thursday 1:12 AM ESTREP. ROS-LEHTINEN ISSUES STATEMENT ON 'INTERNATIONAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS: TAKING ACTION TO ELIMINATE MODERN DAY SLAVERY'*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 853 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

Republicans on the House Foreign Affairs Committee issued the following opening statement from a committee hearing:

Opening Remarks of Ranking Member Ros-Lehtinen at Hearing,

"International Trafficking in Persons: Taking Action to Eliminate Modern Day Slavery":

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for convening today's hearing on this critically important issue.

Modern-day trafficking in persons is a heinous crime against human dignity, and a key source of income for international criminal enterprises.

Somewhere around eight-hundred-thousand people are trafficked across international borders every year. Of that number, it is estimated that 80 percent are women, and half are children.

These figures do not include the millions of people who are trafficked within countries, and the mere numbers do not convey the horrors and human tragedies that lay behind them.

In Iran, children are trafficked into sexual slavery, and forced into involuntary servitude as beggars and day laborers.

Iranian girls are trafficked into Pakistan and numerous other countries where they are sexually exploited.

In Syria, women trafficked from South and Southeast Asia are forced to work as domestic servants, and women from Eastern Europe and Iraq are forced into prostitution.

In our Hemisphere, Cuba has been shamefully promoted as a destination for sexual tourism that exploits large numbers of Cuban girls and boys, some as young as 12.

The Government of Venezuela has not made any anti-trafficking law enforcement efforts in the past year, even though women and children trafficked from numerous countries are exploited for sex and forced labor within Venezuela.

As noted in House Concurrent Resolution 234, recently introduced by Mr. Royce and which I am proud to have co-sponsored, up to 90 percent of North Korean refugee women fall prey to traffickers in China who sell the refugees into sexual slavery.

In Burma, the failed and abusive policies of the ruling military junta are substantially responsible for that country's heartbreaking trafficking problems, which have subjected countless Burmese to forced labor and prostitution.

I am proud of the leading role that the House and this Committee, and especially our Chairman, have played in moving the fight against human trafficking from a "non-issue" to a priority of the United States Government.

I especially want to commend the leadership of my good friend from New Jersey, Mr. Smith, the author of the original Trafficking Victims Protection Act, which became law years ago.

I was pleased to cosponsor the Trafficking Victims Reauthorization Act introduced by Mr. Smith this past January.

Mr. Chairman, I understand that you are drafting a new reauthorization bill and I look forward to working with you and all our colleagues in the days ahead to achieve a measure that enjoys broad bipartisan support.

Thankfully, there have been small signs of progress, as more countries adopt anti-trafficking legislation and make genuine efforts to prosecute and convict traffickers.

But the problems remain widespread.

The number of countries listed in Tier 3, the most problematic category in the State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, has increased since last year - from 12 to 16.

I have questions about the wisdom of the so-called Tier 2 "Watch List," which was not part of the original statutory framework.

Although being placed on the "Watch List" is supposed to be a warning to problem countries that they are about to slip to Tier 3, it is hard to take those warnings seriously when countries like China, and Russia sit on the "Watch List" year after year after year, without further consequences.

The Watch List must not become a way of avoiding difficult decisions.

In addition, as pointed out in recent GAO reports, there is room for improvement in the coordination and monitoring of U.S.-funded anti-trafficking efforts abroad.

So, I look forward to hearing from the expert witnesses before us today.

I regret that the Administration was not invited to participate at today's hearing, which would have enriched our discussion.

As with the human rights reports hearing in March of this year, I believe we would only benefit from following the longstanding precedent of having the Administration roll-out the Congressionally-mandated annual report before engaging the expertise of private witnesses.

Turning to our private panel, I want to note how fortunate I am to have in my own district an institution so fundamentally committed to the fight against human trafficking.

The St. Thomas University School of Law and its Human Rights Institute have been active both on the policy side - as a motivating force behind the 2005 "Miami Declaration of Principles on Human Trafficking" - and on the personal side, providing services to victims of trafficking in South Florida.

I am honored to join the Chairman in welcoming the President of the University and Chairman of its Human Rights Institute, Monsignor Franklyn Casale, to the Committee today.

I thank all of the witnesses for being here, and look forward to your testimony.

LOAD-DATE: December 31, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

153 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring South Asia - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

October 11, 2007 Thursday

Bangladesh Home Ministry makes effort to bring back women trafficked abroad

LENGTH: 722 words

Text of report by Shawkat Osman Rochi headlined "Home Ministry's initiative to rescue trafficked women: most of them forced into prostitution" published by Bangladeshi newspaper The Daily Star website on 11 October

Organized gangs are forcing most of the women trafficked out of Bangladesh into prostitution in different countries. The trafficked women are being involved in the inhuman jobs in the Philippines, Japan, UAE, Jordan, and many other countries. Many women from Bangladesh are arrested by police in these countries and are now in prison. Trafficked women from Bangladesh have found place in Kolkata Presidency Jail and in government and private shelter houses in different countries. The Bangladesh Home Ministry has received this sort of sensational information. A powerful quarter is using various tactics to traffic women out of Bangladesh by land, sea and air. This quarter traffics women mainly by alluring them with the promise of fat-salaried jobs abroad.

The Home Ministry has taken the initiative to rescue and bring back the trafficked women. It, however, does not have complete information about how many are working as sex-workers, and how many are in prison. The ministry has decided to send "search letters" to the concerned countries to verify the identification before going for the rescue of the trafficked women. The letters will be sent to the Bangladesh embassies in those countries through the Foreign Affairs Ministry.

Investigations revealed that women and children are trafficked out more during winter - from January to March - every year when the sea and rivers remain relatively calm. The organized trafficking gangs find the river and sea routes are safer for women and child trafficking compared to land and air routes. During this period of the year, the traffickers try to smuggle out more women and children using engine boats and ships. The Home Ministry is also concerned over this issue. The Coast Guard and the Rapid Action Battalion [RAB] have been asked to be on "red alert" to check human trafficking through the river and sea routes. The intelligence unit of the RAB is providing total assistance to the Coast Guard in this regard.

According to the statistics of the Home Ministry, the number of women and child trafficking is now less than before. In August last year, 11 cases were filed for trafficking 11 women and children, 10 of whom were rescued. Investigations of 12 cases, including some filed earlier, have been completed in the meantime, and three of the cases were disposed off. The human traffickers, involved in those cases, were arrested. It is being alleged that though field-level traffickers are being arrested, the main people behind these incidents remain safe. The United States in the meantime has appreciated Bangladesh for its success in checking women and child trafficking. According to the US report on human trafficking [TIP report], Bangladesh has been moved from tier-3 to tier-2 in this field. For being in tier-3, Bangladesh remained in the US watch-list for a long time. Bangladesh was included in the tier-2 group as recognition for fulfilling six conditions set by the United States to check women and child trafficking. The measures taken by the Bangladesh Government in checking women and child trafficking were praised in the TIP report of the US Department of State. Prior to this, the US on 14 June, 2004 gave Bangladesh an ultimatum to check women and child trafficking. If Bangladesh failed, conditions like possible imposition of economic and other sanctions were mentioned in the ultimatum. In the meantime, to check women and child trafficking, an inter-ministerial committee headed by the home secretary has been formed, an inter-ministerial committee led by joint secretary (political) of the Home Ministry has been set up to monitor progress of the trafficking cases, and a monitoring cell has been established at the police headquarters. Besides, district committees led by the deputy commissioners have been formed in all districts of the country. Special checking has been initiated at the international border posts and airports to check women and child trafficking. A national policy has been formulated for massive campaign and creating awareness to check the trafficking.

Source: The Daily Star website, Dhaka, in English 11 Oct 07

LOAD-DATE: October 11, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2007 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

154 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Nation (Thailand)

October 1, 2007 Monday

New law on trafficking

BYLINE: The NationLENGTH: 953 words

It's no secret Thailand is a notorious hub of human trafficking. A new proposed law aims to combat the problem, but sceptical social workers fear it may have a limited impact if corruption and dark influences behind the human trade are not effectively dealt with.

After hanging in limbo for almost one year while the country has been ruled by a military-installed government, a draft law to allow prosecution of all forms of human trafficking and provide greater protection and compensation to the victims of trafficking here is now being considered by the National Legislative Assembly.

The bill, when passed, will be Thailand's first comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation. It will outlaw all forms of trafficking and also provide protection to male victims of trafficking.

The bill was drafted in response to calls made by the United Nations and other international organisations for help to suppress human trafficking.

Suwaree Jaiharn, of the Ministry of Social Development and Social Security's Bureau of Anti-Trafficking in Women and Children, said the National Assembly was supposed to pass the draft very soon.

She hoped enactment of the law would send a clear message to the international community that Thailand was sincere in trying to combat all forms of human trafficking, not only sexual exploitation.

While the country already has laws passed in 1997 - the Prevention and Suppression of Trafficking in Women and Children Act - to provide penalties for sex trafficking, international groups have said this was not enough. The "old" law did not combat labour trafficking and did not provide protection for male victims, most of whom are trafficked into forced labour.

Currently, when children and women victims of trafficking are rescued by Thai authorities they are simply transferred to one of seven shelters for trafficking victims run by Thai government. But most boys or male victims are deported as illegal migrants.

While recognising that Thailand has provided impressive protection to foreign victims of sex trafficking found here, the United States' Trafficking in Persons Report this year has kept Thailand on its trafficking watchlist's Tier 2 level. This means the country is making significant efforts to address the problem but does not yet fully comply with minimum standards. Not having a law to combat trafficking for labour exploitation was stated as a main reason Thailand was put on the US government's Tier 2 list.

Year after year Thailand is named as a source, transit and destination country for men, women and children trafficked for the purpose of sexual exploitation and forced labour.

Each year Thai women and girls are trafficked to Australia, Bahrain, Japan, Malaysia, South Africa, European countries, Canada and the US for sexual exploitation. Meanwhile women, including those from Russia and Uzbekistan, are trafficked for commercial sexual exploitation here. Some foreign women transit across the southern border to Malaysia for the same purpose.

At the same time, men, women, aged people and children from Burma, Cambodia and Vietnam are trafficked into Thailand for forced labour and to work as beggars.

The Cambodian government recently revealed statistics that showed about 10,000 Cambodians - mostly women and children - are smuggled into Thailand each year and forced to work as beggars. But each coin dropped into a cup held by a pitiful child or parent on our sidewalks doesn't always go to improve their life, as givers might expect. Often, it goes to pockets of crime syndicates that forced them to beg in the Land of Smiles.

The conscience of Thais has enabled street begging to become a lucrative human trafficking business, as beggars can earn up to Bt800-1,000 a day.

According to Suwaree, from the Anti-Trafficking Bureau, another business - aside from the sex industry - is forcing trafficked children to sell candy, flowers, and tissue paper at night time.

There is also trafficking of Thais within the country. Eaklak Loomchomkhae, head of the Centre for Missing Persons and Anti-trafficking, an non-government group set up to help search for missing people, said many Thai men were trafficked into commercial fishing operations beyond Thai waters. And that some fishing boats only come ashore every five years.

"Given that some have to work hard on board, nobody wants to do that work. So the boat owners have to try every means to recruit labourers and a popular way to do that is trafficking," he said.

Eaklak said regional bus terminals were places where crime syndicates trafficked Thai men into the fishing industry. He said many men and male teenagers had been drugged unconscious while waiting for buses at terminals - then woke up to find themselves on a fishing boat in the middle of an ocean.

"They have no way to escape, and must work in a boat until the time it goes ashore."

Eaklak said that over the past four years his centre had helped rescue 19 men trafficked to work on fishing boats.

He believed the number of men trafficked to work on fishing boats must be in the thousands. That estimate, he said, was based on the number of fishing boats operating beyond Thai waters - more than 1,000 - and the fact each has about 30-40 workers.

Eaklak said trafficking within Thailand to exploit workers existed not because there was no law against it, but because corrupt influential figures were involved in trafficking. He said the country already had a law to control labour on fishing boats, however its implementation was crippled by corrupt state officials, who allowed these operations to exist.

He demanded the government not only prosecute human traffickers, but protect the victims - and stop the corruption behind the trafficking.

Pennapa Hongthong

The Nation

LOAD-DATE: October 1, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

155 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

September 14, 2007 Friday

2007 NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON HUMAN TRAFFICKINGBYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 985 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Good Morning. I'm Ambassador Mark Lagon, Director of the State Department's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, or, the "TIP" office. I'm so sorry that I can't be with you today. This week, I'm in the Persian Gulf visiting several countries assessed in our annual TIP Report as not being strong enough in the global fight to end sex trafficking and slave labor.

One of my primary functions as Ambassador-at-Large on Human Trafficking is to urge other governments to work in concert with the United States to end modern-day slavery. The office I lead compiles the world's most authoritative assessment of trends in human trafficking. The annual Trafficking in Persons Report famously ranks countries into tiers, Tier 1 being the most committed countries, doing the most; Tier 3, not at all.

We spearhead diplomacy to gain better cooperation with foreign governments to fight TIP. We manage anti-trafficking funds: In Fiscal Year 2006 the U.S. Government spent about $74 million to fund 154 projects in about 70 countries. And we try to increase public awareness of this grotesque crime against human rights, global health, and international security through our Report and otherwise.

I have another legally-mandated role here at home: I chair the Senior Policy Operating Group, or SPOG, which coordinates the inter-agency work we are all doing to fight trafficking: at the Department of Justice, Labor, Defense, USAID, together, some 10 departments and agencies.

In our diplomatic efforts with foreign governments, we can't just deliver lectures; we must show that the U.S. is working on this problem too. I always talk about how, here at home, we're grappling with issues of victim identification, rescue, police training, judicial sensitivity, the myriad elements of this complex phenomenon.

So, your essential work tackling human trafficking connects directly with the U.S. Government's mission around the world. Slavery exists everywhere in the world. It exists in the United States. As leaders in the global effort to end human trafficking, the United States must show through deeds, not just words, how committed we are to this fight.

In the Persian Gulf, where I have spent the last week, one of the major challenges is to prevent the victimization of immigrants who work as domestics. What we do at home to prevent the abuse of domestic workers is important as we push other governments. Like helping Rose from Cameroon. She was promised education in the U.S. and a babysitting job, but instead she was locked in her sponsor's home and forced to work day and night.

[Video segment from Free the Slaves film, Dreams Die Hard, begins]

NARRATOR: Rose was just 14 when she was tricked into leaving her family in Africa. Another Cameroonian family offered her an American education and a babysitting job.

ROSE ODINE: When I got here, it actually didn't happen the way I was told.

NARRATOR: She worked punishing hours. She was beaten. She was never paid, and she never went to school.

LOUIS ENTONGWE: She began to tell me these things on the phone. I was so stunned. I mean, it was such an outrageous story.

ROSE ODINE: I tried to make sure that everything is right so I won't get yell [sic] or get beaten up.

NARRATOR: Beaten and alone, Rose had nowhere to turn.

ROSE ODINE: I would sit all by myself and just think about things I could do with my sisters. And how we used to play together. And I would just, just cry cause I missed them. And I would just cry hoping that one day, I would get to see them again.

I used to live right in there. And I ran away from here.

NARRATOR: One cold day, two and a half years after she arrived, Rose just couldn't take it anymore.

ROSE ODINE: It was like my blood pressure was rising and my head was like pumping inside. So I had no shoes on, no jacket, I didn't think of anything.

NARRATOR: Rose opened the door and began to run. She stopping running in this parking lot.

[Video segment ends]

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Rose escaped to a parking lot with nothing. She couldn't help herself beyond that brave act. A concerned citizen, then law enforcement, social service providers, victim witness advocates, and others had to step in to help restore her dignity and rights.

Because the essential core of our legislation is the "victim-centered approach," and we are, in real time, creating models that can be emulated abroad. The models we create for other countries include certain fundamentals:

The notion that passing a comprehensive law is not enough because implementation and enforcement are mission critical. The principle of accountability, holding exploiters to account as a basic tenet of governing justly, pursuing: investigations, prosecutions, convictions, serious sentences commensurate with the severity of the crime.

Viewing victims as victims, not criminals, illegal aliens, or disposable people; and the T-Visa certainly demonstrates U.S. dedication to this principle. Promoting task forces that bring together different government, law enforcement and civil society actors. Promoting Government-NGO collaboration as embodied by the HHS "Rescue and Restore program."

The Trafficking Victim's Protection Act has always been about foreign national and U.S. citizen victims. The drafters of this brilliant law understood that the United States is not immune from human trafficking. Victims of sex trafficking and slave labor are women and men, children and adults, foreign nationals and U.S. citizens. Our recognition of this reality strengthens the U.S. voice abroad, and increases my ability to accomplish our international anti-trafficking agenda.

Thank you for doing everything you can to rescue victims, restore them to safety, and jail the criminals who are enslaving our sisters, brothers, and children. Thank you, for advancing this cause around the world as you lead by example.

LOAD-DATE: October 19, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

156 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

August 19, 2007 Sunday

Nigeria; Trafficked Persons - How Promises of Gold, Silver End in Subjugation

BYLINE: This DayLENGTH: 2442 words

They are expected to journey into Eldorado where they will not lack. But if the trip into this fantasy island does not consume them, they end up enduring harsher lifestyles, away from the promises of milk and honey. Authorities on the trafficking of persons maintain that head or tail, the victims are losers. Godwin Haruna, who encountered them recently, writes

The scenario usually painted before unsuspecting victims are tantalising enough. Good employment where they would earn hard currency with which they would turn around the fortunes of their families back home. Good living standards where power is constant and taps run. Limitless opportunities to further their education, should they decide to go to school and such other fanciful tales that bears no relationship with reality. Welcome to the unpleasant world of trafficked persons in Nigeria.

Trafficking has many manifestations in the country, but the most practiced variants are in the form of prostitution, forced labour, marriage, for begging, for rituals and for organ transplantation or laundering. By the time the victims realise the futility of the promises made to them at recruitment, it would have been too late for them to rediscover themselves. They would have lost everything including, but not limited to their self-esteem, possessions and even their lives. The evils of this obnoxious trade are manifold and it has the potential of distorting a country's culture if left unchecked.

Perhaps, that explains why the Nigerian government established an agency a few years ago - The National Agency for Prohibition of Traffic in Persons (NAPTIP) - solely dedicated to checkmating trafficking in human persons. The agency has not rested on its oars in its efforts to reduce the incidence of human trafficking both within and outside the country. As part of this strategy, NAPTIP collaborated with the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) recently to organise a sensitization seminar for media practitioners in Benin, Edo State.

Speaking on the occasion through Alhaji Mohammed Babandede, director of investigation of the agency, Mrs. Carol Ndaguba, executive secretary, noted that Nigeria has been dubbed as a source, transit and destination country. She said before NAPTIP, the country was placed at Tier 2 watch list in the annual world trafficking in persons report by the United States Department of State. She added that the situation has considerably improved

According to Ndaguba: "Traffickers prey on the ignorance, self worth and vulnerability of victims. A typical and natural counterweight to this is information and education resource, a special endowment of the Fourth Estate of the Realm. The special role of the media in education, information, and mobilization of the citizenry for development, strategically places them as a strong ally of the Agency".

She said trafficking is a global problem, which ranks third to drugs and arms trafficking. "In the West African Sub-region and Nigeria, trafficking in persons has already become a pervasive crime. The crime preys primarily on the woman and children who are believed to be the most vulnerable group. It is equally established that men are trafficked particularly into forced labour and for body organ laundering but the emphasis placed on women and children is informed by the awareness that the group constitute the predominant target for traffickers", she said.

She stated that the phenomenon of human trafficking in Nigeria has become multi dimensional, multi sectional and multi faceted to the extent that anybody could fall a victim and no one is safe.

She said the singular and most important excuse and contributory feature that encourage trafficking is poverty and desperation. However, she quickly added that poverty alone does not explain the prevalence of child trafficking in Nigeria since most people involved in human trafficking do not necessarily have the most social indicator for poverty nor possess the worst cases of poverty.

The executive secretary stated that research carried out by NAPTIP in conjunction with UNICEF in 2004, showed that child trafficking was found to be very endemic in several states especially Akwa Ibom, Ebonyi, Imo, Kaduna and Cross River States. Since then, many more states are becoming endemic in the phenomenon of child trafficking.

She said the issue had been addressed by government by domesticating the protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons especially women and children, which culminated in The Trafficking in Persons (Prohibition) Law Enforcement and Administration Act of 2003.

According to her, in December 2003, NAPTIP in conjunction with the Nigerian Immigration Service and UNICEF Nigeria repatriated a total number of 169 children who were engaged in exploitative activities in Nigeria back to the Republic of Benin.

Also in 2005, police in Lagos stopped a refrigerated truck containing 64 children. The children were from Edati Local Government in Niger, Ebonyi, Edo States and Edu Local Govt. in Kwara State. They were apparently being taken to Lagos to work as house helps.

According to her, from inception up till March 31 this year, 962 victims have passed through the Agency. 118 of them have been rehabilitated, while 539 victims are awaiting rehabilitation. 710 of them are female victims while 252 are males.

"The Agency has a documentary programme on the story of victims of human trafficking. It is a real life experience of trafficked victims, their trauma, and psychological depression and how they were eventually rescued by NAPTIP and given a new lease of life. We have radio jingles in English and local languages, newspaper adverts, bill boards in strategic locations, posters, fliers, newsletters, car stickers, etc to inform people about the menace of child trafficking and we have been recording remarkable success in this regard", Ndaguba stated.

She said against the background of a cumbersome criminal trial, the drive to bring traffickers to justice has been very steadfast and unrelenting. She stated that to be able to secure a conviction, the Agency must prove its cases beyond reasonable doubts. "One of the major problems we face is getting the trafficked children to testify against their traffickers who are sometimes close relatives and their benefactors. Despite the tedious and long legal process we face in court, the Agency has succeeded in securing the conviction of 12 traffickers who are currently serving different jail terms in various prisons across the country. We also have over 50 cases undergoing trial in different High Courts", she stated.

She commended the various tiers of government, which created the enabling legal frameworks and environment in their respective states that would enable children in their states to enjoy a higher quality of life through the passing of the Child Rights Act (CRA).

According to her, the objective of the CRA is to restore the dignity and rights of the Nigerian Child. She said any state government that does not accept to pass the CRA may be inadvertently encouraging conditions and factors that promote child abuse, child labour and child trafficking in Nigeria.

"The tragedy of child trafficking is compounded by the fact that they are powerless, voiceless, and ignorant of the rights incapable of selling effective assistance from law enforcement institution", she added.

The preventive measures she suggested include, making education compulsory and accessible to all juveniles, government poverty alleviation schemes must be accessible to women and youths in the villages and operators of the scheme should design products that address and meet the peculiar demands of women in the hinterland.

She said in the amended Act, a specific provision was also enacted against owners of brothels who keep in their brothels young girls of fewer than 18 years. The penalty for offenders is severe sentences of 14 years.

She said NAPTIP would begin to pursue a programme of action to review the laws setting up Motherless Babies homes in a short while and other homes, in order to reduce the gory and horrendous tales of baby trafficking, sales, abductions and ritual killings that go on in the name of adoption in Nigeria.

Also speaking in a presentation, Babandede described various crime models as those organised within the country, international and trans-national organised crimes. He said the mission of fighting crime is to prevent and control it, rescue the victim, arrest and prosecute suspect, dismantle/disrupt organised criminal groups and seize their assets.

Babandede disclosed that the approach of the Agency is using the 'Golden Rule' in its investigation and prosecution. It states: "Within the limits of the law, to seize everything that may constitute evidence - if in doubt, seize it, it can always be given back later but if left behind first time, it may not still be there by the time its evidential significance has been realised".

He said detectives are continually being trained in financial investigations, criminal prosecution and confiscation.

He revealed that one of their greatest challenges is the challenge posed by the victim of trafficking, who would not testify against his principal for fear of the secret oaths usually administered to them.

"When you disrupt traffickers' activities before exploitation - you are an enemy, when you rescue at the 'verge of freedom' - you are a spoiler, when victim is in danger - you have to change style or even discontinue. The victim is your priority - especially a child", he added.

He said they follow strictly the doctrine of the child since he is the first priority. "Not the needs of the family. Not the child's "story". Not the evidence. Not the needs of the courts. Not the needs of the police, child protection, attorney's, etc. The child is our first priority", Babandede stated.

He said victims, especially for labour purposes have parental consent and in such situations, they counsel the parents. Although this, he said becomes difficult if victims had signed contracts or swore to oaths of secrecy. He said they had raided a shrine at some point in order to demystify the pressures and fears they put on victims.

The director of investigation stated that if the case being investigated is external trafficking help should come from there. He said criminals cross borders with ease but law enforcement cannot do that to investigate. He said globalization has brought more opportunity to crime than policing! He added that national sovereignty was a challenge to effective use of Interpol, MLA, Multilateral & Bilateral opportunities. However, he advised the sharing of intelligence, conduct of joint and simultaneous investigation.

According to him: "The logic is simple: so long as trans-national criminal organisations capitalise on global processes to structure their operations in ways that limit the effectiveness of initiatives by any single nation, the response needs to be extensive in scope, multinational in form and, to the extent possible, global in reach.

"To relinquish some of the formalities of sovereignty means to restore the rule of law, taking into account existing realities, in order to 'nullify the advantages that criminals derive from operating across borders and to reduce, circumvent or transcend the frictions that hamper international law enforcement".

Babandede's panacea to effective policing and investigation is going 'glocal" which he said is interactive globalisation, acting in ways that are "indigenous-yet-globally-aware". He concluded that commitment and honesty is the key to an investigator's success - a challenge we must all address. He added that since trafficking in persons is a major human right violation, they try to integrate human rights in their investigation and that partnering with the West has challenged them to be modern and proactive.

Also speaking, Mr. Obi Agusiobo of the legal department of the agency noted that Nigerian statutes have always contained provisions dealing with trafficking in persons offences though those provisions were lamely enforced and prosecuted.

"Trafficking in persons globally has assumed a new dimension which is radically different from the brute approach of slave dealers. It has changed to a subtle but equally dangerous method of organised recruitment that is less visible. It is against this background, that the United Nations adopted an International Convention against Transnational Organised Crime and its protocol to prevent, suppress and punish trafficking in persons especially women and children to deal with the sophistication of the traffickers", he stated.

Agusiobo explained the Act extensively and the penalties outlined for persons engaged in human trafficking. He said the Act established for NAP TIP a Victims of Trafficking Trust Fund, where all proceeds of the sale of assets and properties of traffickers are paid into.

Also speaking in an interview, Mrs. Funke Abiodun, head of the Benin zonal office of NAPTIP said the incidence of trafficking has reduced considerably since the Agency came on board. "Before people used to go abroad blatantly, but now you hard find one until you see a deportee or when stopped at the border post. This means that they are aware of the existence of the agency and the criminality of their action", she said.

Abiodun said the scenario before the potential victims is that they want to go and better their lot because of the poverty in the country, so that is what has constantly driven them. He said the next phase would be to sensitise the pastors who appear to encourage some of them through their preaching.

She said 290 have passed through the centre and 72 have been reintegrated, euphemism for sending to schools or learning a vocation. He advised parents to cut their coat according to their cloth in order to get their priorities right.

In an interview, Ms. Jane Osagie, Edo State coordinator of an NGO said trafficking in girls debases womanhood and must be discouraged. She praised the government for enacting the laws on trafficking and added that there should be enforced. Osagie also contended that the government should put together better infrastructures and providing the enabling environment for businesses to thrive. She stated that the same attention that was devoted to issues of HIV/AIDS should be given to trafficking in persons.

Mr. Arinze Orakwue, head of media and communication of the Agency counseled journalists to constantly beam their searchlight on the ignoble trade in order to stop it. He said even with paucity of funds, the Agency has done so much in the last few years to reduce trafficking in persons in the country.

LOAD-DATE: August 20, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

157 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Hindustan Times

August 3, 2007 Friday 3:04 PM EST

India to strengthen human trafficking laws: Patil

BYLINE: Report from the Asian News International brought to you by the Hindustan Times

LENGTH: 400 words

DATELINE: New Delhi

New Delhi, Aug. 3 -- Home Minister Shivraj Patil on Friday said that the human trafficking problem in country is no bigger than it is in other nations, and added that the government is seriously thinking about tackling the problem by giving more teeth to existing laws.

Admitting that the issue did exist in India, Patil said the problem required thoughtful tackling.

"Yes, there is a problem of this kind in India. There is no denying (this fact). But to think that it is bigger than what it is in other countries is not correct. If you take into consideration the number of human beings in India and compare with the cases that are taking place, even if one case is taking place that should not be acceptable. And yet if you look at this problem from a correct perspective, we will be able to form a correct opinion," Patil said in his address at a National Consultation on Preventing and Combating Human Trafficking in New Delhi.

According to the US State Department, South Asia accounts for second highest number of victims of trafficking. India was among 32 countries on US' Watch List, 2006 of countries involved in human trafficking.

"We come across many difficulties, many problems, and that is why it becomes necessary for us to examine the existing laws and find out how the amendments have to be made and introduced in the existing statutes. This process should continue and the Government of India will definitely be able to tackle this issue in this manner," he said.

Travel rackets thrives in India, mainly in the states of Punjab, Maharashtra, Andhra Pradesh and Bihar, where human smuggling has been described as an organized crime.

The travel agents thrives on the clamour of desperate Indians to go abroad for lifestyles they know can never afford in the villages and small towns back home.

Hundreds of thousands of women and girls in India are kidnapped, sold, coerced or trafficked for sex in a highly organised, yet illicit trade which is the world's third most lucrative after arms and drugs.

Almost 6,000 cases of trafficking were registered in 2005, but activists say the real number is much higher and on the rise.

According to the International Labour Organisation, 2.45 million people worldwide are exploited and treated like slaves every year, and another 1.2 million people are trafficked.

Published by HT Media Ltd. with permission from Asian News International.

For any query with respect to this article or any other content requirement, please contact Editor at htsyndication@hindustantimes.com

LOAD-DATE: August 3, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

158 of 445 DOCUMENTS

International Enforcement Law Reporter

August 2007

U.S. Releases 2007 Human Trafficking ReportA. U.S. Releases 2007 Human Trafficking Report

BYLINE: Jed Borod n1

n1 Jed Borod is the Assistant Editor of the International Enforcement Law Reporter.

SECTION: HUMAN TRAFFICKINGVI. HUMAN TRAFFICKING; Vol. 23, No. 8

LENGTH: 861 words

On June 12, 2007, the U.S. Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons released the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report (TIP Report), designed to rank members of the international community on compliance with a set of anti-human trafficking standards. This year's report made a number of notable changes to the rankings, including the addition of a number of Middle Eastern countries to and the removal of Laos, Belize, and Zimbabwe from the Tier 3 "worst offenders" list. n2 As in years past, many listed countries immediately challenged the report, attacking its methodology, relevance, and political bias.

n2 Nora Boustany, Allies Cited for Human Trafficking, Washington Post, June 13, 2007. Countries are ranked from Tier 1, the best, to Tier 3, the worst. For background on past reports, including a discussion of the TIP methodology, see Jed Borod, U.S. Releases Sixth Annual Human Trafficking Report, Targeted Countries Dispute Findings, 22 Int'l Enforcement L. Rep. 321 (August 2006).

Speaking at the release of the report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said that "human traffickers prey on the most vulnerable members of society" but noted that she has "noticed a greater desire by [U.S.] partners to fight this crime and protect its victims." n3 Ambassador Mark Lagon, Senior Advisor on Trafficking in Persons, called U.S. anti-trafficking efforts "a commitment to human dignity," and estimated that 800,000 people are trafficked internationally each year. n4 Lagon also singled out countries in the Middle East, including Saudi Arabia, saying that "it's especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East that aren't lacking adequate resources to make significant progress are on Tier 3." n5 n3 Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, Remarks at the Release of the Seventh Annual Trafficking in Persons Report (June 12, 2007).

n4 Ambassador Mark P. Lagon, Remarks at the Release of the Seventh Annual Trafficking in Persons Report (June 12, 2007).

n5 Id.

A range of countries including China and Malta criticized the report. A spokesman for the Maltese government expressed "strong objections to the contents of the report, particularly to the fact that the arrival of illegal immigrants is being confused with the trafficking of persons for prostitution purposes," and claimed that "repeated efforts to explain the Maltese situation to the State Department were ignored." n6 The Chinese government reacted angrily to the report's criticism of the country's handling of North Korean refugees, arguing that "illegal trespassers came to China for economic reasons, and ? were not victims." n7 The TIP report also noted widespread use of forced labor in China, including children and disabled slave workers. n8 n6 Rosanne Zammit, Malta objects to US report on human trafficking, Times of Malta, June 18, 2007.

n7 China questions US human trafficking report, Xinhua/China Daily, June 19, 2007.

n8 Gordon Fairclough, Slave-Labor Charges Could Leave Black Eye for China, Wall Street Journal, June 19, 2007.

A coalition of Irish non-governmental organizations took the opposite tact, arguing that the report failed to adequately account for human trafficking in Ireland and as a result was "littered with inaccuracies." n9 Many listed countries, including Kenya and the United Arab Emirates, pledged to improve their anti-trafficking efforts. n10 n9 NGOs challenge US Govt report on human trafficking, Belfast Telegraph, June 18, 2007.

n10 Dylan Bowman, Professional review of UAE trafficking, ArabianBusiness, June 18, 2007.

Charges of political bias continue to dog the report. The Tier 3 list includes Cuba, Iran, and North Korea, countries with whom the U.S. has increasingly hostile diplomatic relations. n11 China and India, two countries with whom the U.S. has worked to improve ties, remained in the intermediate Tier 2 watch list. The categorization of India allegedly prompted discontent in Congress and within the Department of State. Rep. Christopher Smith (R-N.J.) claimed that the report was "too soft on China and India," while a source in the State Department told CNN that India's ranking led to "heated debate between Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte." n12 n11 Boustany, supra.

n12 Boustany, supra. See also India escapes U.S. list of worst human traffickers, CNN, June 19, 2007. According to unnamed NGOs cited in CNN's report, India may have "as many as 65 million forced laborers."

The 2007 TIP Report shows the U.S.'s strong commitment to anti-trafficking efforts, which the Bush administration has prioritized. However, the report has fallen victim to a number of common criticisms leveled on unilateral U.S. efforts in the field, particularly accusations that it is not objective or reflects U.S. political biases. With the continuing controversy over U.S. human rights policy in other arenas, particularly the war on terror, the TIP Report may not enjoy the impact it would otherwise have.

LOAD-DATE: July 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Copyright 2007 International Enforcement Law Reporter

159 of 445 DOCUMENTS

South China Morning Post

July 27, 2007 Friday

Voiceless victims

BYLINE: The brick kiln scandal has highlighted how poverty and ignorance support human trafficking, writes Liz Gooch

SECTION: FEATURES; Behind the News; Pg. 14

LENGTH: 1612 words

Sitting in a police station in a small rural town in Ecuador, Mark and Jan Rodgers waited patiently to interview the local police chief.

The husband and wife team, American academics who specialised in human trafficking, had come to investigate how the dangerous combination of widespread poverty and a lack of awareness had created a fertile hunting ground for traffickers.

As they waited, three families came in one by one to report their daughters missing. Each story was disturbingly similar: the girls, all middle-school students, had not returned home from school. The police casually dismissed the families, suggesting the girls were teenage runaways.

"That was in one afternoon alone," Professor Mark Rodgers said. "We were flipping out, like, come on, wake up!"

They may have worked in trafficking hot spots such as Latvia and Romania, but the lack of awareness or indifference to one of the world's most profitable illegal activities continues to dismay the Rodgers.

Trading in humans is one of the world's oldest businesses, dating back to ancient times. Frequently referred to as modern-day slavery, human trafficking may officially be illegal in most parts of the world but the practice of buying and selling people for sexual or labour exploitation is thriving.

The CIA estimates that between 600,000 and 800,000 people, mostly women and children, are trafficked across national borders every year. That figure does not include the millions trafficked within their home countries, such as the slaves recently found working in atrocious conditions in brick kilns in Shanxi province. The discovery of the kiln slaves, some of them children, has revealed the dark underbelly of forced labour on the mainland, where dire poverty leaves rural villagers vulnerable to abuse.

No country seems immune from the scourge of human trafficking, whether its citizens are innocent victims or consumers unknowingly providing the demand for the trade.

About three-quarters of victims were forced into commercial sex work and there was a growing trend for traffickers to target children, said Professor Rodgers, dean of the Graduate School of Social Work at Dominican University in Illinois, who was in Hong Kong last week to outline the problem at the International Consortium for Social Development at Polytechnic University. "What we are seeing worldwide is a younger and younger group of girls and boys coming into this trade," he said.

Professor Rodgers said interviews with men who paid for sex revealed there was a perception that they would be protected from getting HIV if they used younger girls. "This is fuelling the desire to have 12-, 13-, 14-year-olds," he said.

Professor Rodgers, who had run public awareness programmes in several countries with his wife Jan, a clinical assistant professor at Dominican University, found recruiters in Latvia often waited at airports and train and bus stations, ready to pounce on girls from rural areas coming to the city in search of work. Often their pursuit of a better life ended in sexual servitude in countries such as Germany, Spain, Britain, Norway and the US. Even if the girls and their captors were found, it was often the victims who bore the brunt of the law.

"When they caught traffickers in Latvia they sometimes sentenced them to 30 days in jail. They didn't think it was a serious crime," Professor Rodgers said.

The mainland is recognised as a major player in international human trafficking. Unicef, the children's rights body, predicts that if current trends continue, China may soon become Asia's trafficking hub; the US State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons report, released last month, puts the mainland on the Tier Two watch list for the third consecutive year, indicating it deserves special scrutiny.

While the mainland had increased efforts to prevent trafficking, the report found it had failed to improve victim protection services or address trafficking for involuntary servitude. It found women were often lured through false promises of legitimate employment only to be forced into sex work in Taiwan, Thailand, Malaysia and Japan.

Women and children were trafficked into the mainland from Mongolia, Myanmar, North Korea, Russia and Vietnam for forced labour, marriage and prostitution.

The report includes the story of "Haniel", a North Korean woman who was a victim of forced marriage: "I was sold to be the wife of a 47-year-old Chinese man ... My husband would hit me and say: 'Do you have any idea how much I paid for you?' I am not the only North Korean woman in this area. As I was talking to some of the others, we came to realise we have been sold into this kind of marriage."

Despite the many countries linked to China's trafficking industry, the report concluded domestic trafficking remained the most significant problem, with at least 10,000 victims annually. Beijing is expected to finalise its National Plan of Action against Trafficking by the end of the year.

While the men and children enslaved in Shanxi's brick kilns dominated recent headlines, rural women remained most at risk, said Lulu Zhang, a research student at Beijing's Renmin University, who also spoke at the Hong Kong conference.

Ms Zhang, who worked for Unicef for three years, said poor education and few job opportunities meant rural women were the most vulnerable. The mainland's patchy development, which led to an enormous economic gap between rural and urban areas, made poor villages a target for traffickers.

"Most women are trafficked from poor and undeveloped districts to developed coastal areas and the plains region. Because of economic development in the coastal regions, more women are trafficked to these districts," Ms Zhang said.

While many women were sold as wives to men in the wealthier districts in the 1990s, she said this trend had declined in recent years. "Trafficking for labour and sexual exploitation is increasing," she said.

Law enforcement efforts were often directed at fighting organised crime, but Ms Zhang said women were nearly always trafficked through social networks, by relatives and acquaintances.

The Rodgers said educating all involved, from police, judges and prosecutors to social workers, teachers and psychologists was essential.

"Without co-operation in the groups, the traffickers are 20 years ahead of us," Professor Rodgers said.

When the couple ran the public awareness programme in Latvia, they found it had the greatest impact on judges. "They said 'we thought this was just a girl who was a prostitute. We didn't realise she was forced into this'," he said.

Attitudes are gradually changing. The Latvian government has developed a national action plan, convictions have soared, and a trafficker was recently sentenced to more than 20 years in jail.

The Rodgers, now on a study tour of Beijing, Xian and Guilin, would like to bring their education programme to Hong Kong and the mainland. Professor Rodgers said the mainland's gender imbalance, created by the traditional preference for boys, could lead to greater demand for women.

When the couple were in Ecuador, Professor Jan Rodgers was shocked to hear of teachers recruiting students and traffickers staking out libraries, ready to swoop after parents dropped off their children.

She recalled working with a group of 14-year-old girls in Ecuador, who had either escaped or been released by their captors after falling pregnant. "They claimed they had been trafficked as early as 11. They'd been in the sex industry for three years already," she said.

In order to rescue victims, authorities needed to target places where traffickers would allow the women to go, such as hospital emergency rooms, hairdressers and beauty salons.

Professor Jan Rodgers said countries often focused on rescuing victims but effort was also needed to reintegrate them back into society. Victims were often repeatedly traumatised by numerous interviews and were at risk of developing post-traumatic stress disorder and long-term depression.

"They could be serving 20 to 30 men per day. In India, we heard it's even higher, it could be 30 or 40 ... what will these women be like if they escape?", Professor Rodgers said.

Professor Jan Rodgers urged governments to devote more money to helping victims recover and said they needed at least six months of treatment, including counselling, medical treatment, housing and job training.

The US State Department report said the mainland's protection services remained temporary and failed to adequately address victims' needs. It cites Yunnan province as an example of where victims of commercial sexual exploitation were not offered psychological assistance and were generally sent home after a few days.

While human trafficking was not a new phenomenon, the cost of buying a slave had fallen dramatically, said David Androff, a doctoral student at the University of California, Berkeley, who presented his research at the conference.

Mr Androff said investigations by abolitionist groups who had tried to buy slaves from coffee plantations in West Africa had revealed they could be bought for as little as $30US. Some records showed people sold in America's south during the slave trade would have cost the equivalent of $1US,000.

"Slaves are a lot cheaper today and I think that reflects the population boom, looking at it from a supply and demand perspective," he said.

Mr Androff said the factors influencing who was more likely to be forced into slavery had also changed. "I think race and ethnicity may play less of a role than they did in the past. It looks as if economic vulnerability is a major factor."

LOAD-DATE: July 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Credit: Illustration: Terry Pontikos

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

160 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Congressional Documents and Publications

July 24, 2007

Helsinki Commissioners Call on President to Impose Sanctions on Governments Failing to Combat Human Trafficking

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTSLENGTH: 845 words

July 24, 2007

Send Letter Expressing Concern Over China and India's Exclusion From List of Offending Countries

(Washington, DC) Congressman Alcee L. Hastings (D-FL), Chairman of the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe (U.S. Helsinki Commission) and Co-Chairman Senator Benjamin L. Cardin (D-MD), along with Helsinki Commissioners Representatives Robert Aderholt (R-AL), G.K. Butterfield (D-NC), Louise McIntosh Slaughter (D-NY), and Hilda Solis (D-CA) sent the following letter to President George W. Bush urging him to impose sanctions upon governments who fail to adopt adequate measures to combat human trafficking. More specifically, the letter expresses concern over the exclusion of India and China from the Tier Three list of offending countries, although it is widely acknowledged that they are among the most egregious violators of human anti-trafficking conventions. In this respect, the Commissioners also noted the need for improvements among various OSCE member states, including the Russian Federation and Ukraine.

The Commissioners point out in their letter to the President that if the aim of the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TPVA) of 2000 is to prevent human trafficking, protect victims of human trafficking, and to punish traffickers, it must not employ different standards for designating countries that fail to take adequate steps to combat human trafficking. Such a course will lead to a lack of confidence and integrity in anti-trafficking efforts.

The Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 requires that the State Department report annually to Congress on the status of foreign governments' efforts to combat the trafficking of human persons. The report is intended to raise awareness globally of this issue in hopes that the international community will take the necessary actions possible to counter all forms of human trafficking. The report rates 164 countries in all and covers the period from April 2006 to March 2007. Currently, the report is under review by the President with a final decision on sanctions expected in September. For more information, please visit www.state.gov. (Please find below a copy of the letter)

July 24, 2007

The President

The White House

Washington, DC 20500

Dear Mr. President:

We write to urge you to fully exercise the authority granted under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA) of 2000 to impose sanctions upon governments that fail to adopt adequate measures to combat human trafficking. In doing so, we also urge you to apply sanctions under TVPA through a credible and transparent process.

In this respect, we wish to express our concern regarding the exclusion of India and China from the Tier Three list of offending countries, although it is widely acknowledged that they are among the most egregious violators of human anti-trafficking conventions. It has come to our attention that India and China were not included among countries that have failed to implement significant anti-trafficking measures out of concern that their inclusion may adversely affect bilateral relations with these countries.

India has languished on the Tier Two Watch List since the 2004 report despite receiving some of the largest amounts of U.S. anti-trafficking assistance. Similarly, China has been on Tier Two Watch List since the 2005 report. The Tier Two Watch List carries no strong penalties for government inaction, making it counterproductive to allow countries to remain on the Watch List indefinitely.

We are also mindful that several OSCE participating States, including the Russian Federation, have repeatedly appeared on the Tier Two Watch List and deserve additional attention and engagement with the aim of strengthening their laws, policies and practices to combat human trafficking. Additionally, we note that Ukraine, a major source, transit, and destination country has been added this year in the absence of demonstrable progress in strengthening anti-trafficking efforts.

If the aims of the TVPA to prevent human trafficking, protect victims of human trafficking, and punish traffickers are to be optimally realized, we cannot employ different standards for designating countries that fail to take adequate steps to combat human trafficking. Such a course will lead to a lack of confidence and integrity in our anti-trafficking efforts.

We hope that you will give this issue the attention it requires in order to ensure that U.S. efforts to combat human trafficking are carried out in a comprehensive and impartial manner.

###

The Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe, also known as the Helsinki Commission, is a U.S. Government agency that monitors progress in the implementation of the provisions of the 1975 Helsinki Accords. The Commission consists of nine members from the United States Senate, nine from the House of Representatives, and one member each from the Departments of State, Defense and Commerce.

Lale M. Mamaux

Communications Director

Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe

(U.S. Helsinki Commission)

234 Ford House Office Building

Washington, DC 20515

LOAD-DATE: December 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

161 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

July 20, 2007 Friday 10:05 PM TSTGOVERNMENT TO STEP UP AID FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING VICTIMS*BYLINE: Flor WangLENGTH: 203 wordsDATELINE: Taipei, July 20

In order to display Taiwan's efforts to curb cross-border human trafficking, the Cabinet has passed a three-year program and earmarked $390NT million in budget to step up aid for such victims, Executive Yuan officials said Friday.

According to the officials, the National Immigration Agency under the Ministry of the Interior and the Council of Labor Affairs will be in charge of implementing the program.

Some $200NT million of the funds will be used to set up 18 communities to extend humanitarian care and legal assistance for foreign victims, while the rest of the money will be allocated for anti-trafficking educational programs and repatriation operations, they explained.

The Executive Yuan approved a human trafficking prevention program in November last year in the hope of integrating the resources of various government agencies to crack down on international human traffickers.

Premier Chang Chun-hsiung has reiterated the government's goal of further improving Taiwan's performance in this regard after Taiwan was upgraded in the U.S. 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report released in June, in which Taiwan was removed from the nations on the "Tier 2 Watch List" and placed instead on the list of "Tier 2" nations.

LOAD-DATE: July 20, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

162 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

July 19, 2007 Thursday

REGIONAL COOPERATION NEEDED TO CHECK HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 483 words

KUCHING, July 19 (Bernama) - Close regional multi-agencies cooperation and cross-border networking are needed to combat human trafficking, which has proven to be a difficult task for most countries.

United States (US) Department of Justice International Criminal Investigative Training Assistance Programme, Deputy Senior Law Enforcement Advisor Robert C Barlow said even with law enforcement, such efforts could not promise to be obstacle-free in tackling the problems.

"It is very difficult to tackle human trafficking due to the nature of the crime. However, it is not impossible. Countries need to establish and develop relationship, cooperation, and networking among the multi-agencies and non-governmental organization (NGOs) to stop human trafficking in the region.

"Good investigation techniques with effective multi-national approaches are very important too... Certainly it (tackling human trafficking) will go on for years," he told reporters here today.

Later, he attended a seminar on "Improving Operational Cross-Border Cooperation between Indonesia and Malaysia in Tackling Human Being Trafficking", organized by the French Embassy, American Embassy and United National Office on Drugs and Crime.

Barlow, a retired police commander, said human trafficking between Malaysia and Indonesia was a serious problem as three out of 10 Indonesians entering the country were exploited.

"Generally, about 700,000 to 800,000 people trafficked to Malaysia are run by well-organized and multi-national crime gangs which move to countries where the law enforcement is weak.

"It is a very serious problem in Malaysia and Indonesia as it generates more revenue than narcotic sales," he said.

Barlow said in many cases, traffickers, through employment agencies, recruited girls and women from regions where there was high unemployment and the people were generally poor under false pretenses.

"Victims from poor background are lured with false promises of high paying jobs and better life, but then they were forced into prostitution upon their arrival in the country.

"They were charged exorbitant fees leading to debt bondage. This is the start of their exploitation. They may have returned to their respective countries physically, sexually or psychologically abused," he said.

Barlow said only a small number of Malaysian women and girls were trafficked for sexual purposes and the number was very small in comparison to the number of foreign nationals coming into the country.

Barlow described the Malaysian government's move in tabling the Anti-Trafficking in Persons 2007 Bill as a huge step in combating the human trafficking problems.

Malaysia was placed on Tier 2 of the Watch List of the United States Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report last year, as it failed to make significant efforts to bring itself into compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: July 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Pertubuhan Berita Nasional Malaysia
All Rights Reserved

163 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BusinessWorld

July 18, 2007 Wednesday

Model ordinance for local governments to curb rampant human trafficking

BYLINE: Darwin T. Wee

SECTION: Pg. S1/11

LENGTH: 661 words

Zamboanga City - The Inter-Agency Council Against Trafficking (IACAT) led by the Justice department is crafting a local law that will serve as "model ordinance" for local government units to curb human trafficking.

Trafficking is the recruitment, transport and transfer of persons with or without their consent or knowledge within or across national borders by means of threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, including abduction, fraud, deception and abuse of power.

Deana P. Perez, senior state prosecutor of the Justice department and head of the IACAT secretariat, said the model ordinance will strengthen and empower Republic Act 9208 or the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act of 2003.

The model ordinance, to be released in August, is part of the council's action plan against trafficking that covers the years 2004 to 2010.

"There is a need to get the participation of the local government units to help us prevent the emergence of human trafficking activity in most part of the country," Ms. Perez told BusinessWorld.

Under the law, the council, which is composed of various government agencies and nongovernmental organizations, was created with the primary task of coordinating, monitoring and overseeing the implementation of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Act.

"Our responsibility is to mobilize communities into action to prevent and suppress trafficking in persons at the community level, and these include the encouragement to formulate local issuances/ordinances and policies on trafficking; and mobilize and strengthen committees, councils at the local level," she said.

Justice department records showed that 248 human trafficking-related complaints had been filed from 2003 to 2006.

Of these, only eight convictions were reported since the law took effect on 2003.

The most recent conviction here was on March 27, wherein the local court sentenced a trafficker to life imprisonment with a fine of P6 million.

The recent conviction was the second time around in Zamboanga City, said city prosecutor Ricardo C. Cabaron. The first conviction happened on 2005, after three persons were proven to be involved in trafficking a Filipino woman in Sabah, Malaysia.

Ms. Perez said local legislators can either adopt the entire model ordinance or amend some of its provisions.

"The bottom line here is to push our local lawmakers down from municipalities, cities and provinces to have their own version of the national law and be aware of their responsibilities in curbing modern-day slavery."

Based on their monitoring, only Quezon City has a local version of the human trafficking act. Mindanao reportedly has the highest cases of human trafficking in the three groups of islands with more than 50% of the total cases, said Visayan Forum Foundation, Inc. a nongovernmental organization that has been working on this concern in the last 15 years.

Arthur E. Necesito, head of the foundation's Mindanao bureau said 1,449 trafficked victims were recorded by the Department of Social Welfare and Development from 2003 to 2006, of which 40% were minors and more than 50% were women and children.

The United States' Department of State has placed the Philippines under a Tier 2 placement - a ranking based on efforts to combat trafficking - after it failed to comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking.

A Tier 3 ranking will mean financial sanctions for the blacklisted nation, according to a representative of the Asia Foundation, one of the leading funding agencies in the country that supports anti-human trafficking drive.

"If we will not continue to perform well, especially the 'lull' movement of conviction, the Philippines will be likely to get the score of Tier 3," said Gio Garcia, coordinator of the Visayan Forum Foundation.

The Philippines is one of the signatories of various international treaties and pacts with regards to anti-human trafficking, Ms. Perez said, and having low performance will be subjected to sanctions stated on the agreement.

LOAD-DATE: July 17, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

164 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

July 12, 2007 Thursday 2:24 AM ESTREP. SMITH ISSUES STATEMENT ON IMPACT OF AFRICAN GROWTH AND OPPORTUNITY ACT ON GROWTH, POVERTY REDUCTION IN AFRICA*BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 934 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The House Foreign Affairs Committee issued the following statement from a subcommittee hearing:

Subcommittee on Africa and Global Health

"Beyond Oil and Gas: Africa Growth and Opportunity Act's Benefits to Africa"

Statement by Rep. Christopher H. Smith

Thank you Mr. Chairman, for holding this hearing on the African Growth and Opportunity Act. This law provides duty-free and quota-free access to the U.S. market for certain goods from designated countries in Sub-Saharan Africa. It was based on the Congressional finding that it is in the mutual interest of the United States and the countries of sub-Saharan Africa to promote stable and sustainable economic growth and development on the Continent. The criteria for beneficiary countries include evidence of progress toward a market-based economy, rule of law, economic policies to reduce poverty and promote economic growth, a system to combat corruption and bribery, and protection of internationally recognized worker and human rights.

The recent report from the U.S. Trade Representative to Congress contains some impressive information about AGOA's impact. Since it was enacted in 2000, trade between the United States and Sub-Saharan Africa has increased 143 percent, and AGOA has played an important role in this increase. In 2006, over 98 percent of U.S. imports from AGOA-eligible countries entered the United States duty-free. U.S. imports from AGOA countries totaled $44.2 billion in 2006, which was an increase of 16 percent over the previous year.

It is disappointing, however, that most of this increase in 2006 was due to oil, and non-oil trade increased by only 7 percent after having declined a precipitous 16 percent in 2005. Non-oil AGOA trade constituted only $3.2 billion of the total. These latter statistics indicate a need for greater attention to the non-oil potential on the Continent. We will hear testimony today about the need to expand U.S. trade with Sub-Sahara Africa beyond oil, textiles and apparel, and I will be interested in and supportive of ideas that will further this objective.

You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that the Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations that I chaired held a hearing on a five-year assessment of the Act in October 2005, which included two witnesses who we will be hearing from again today: Ms. Florizelle Liser and Mr. Steve Hayes. One of the issues that I raised at that hearing was the protection of labor and other human rights in AGOA-eligible countries. Ms. Liser testified at the time that AGOA was having a positive impact on worker and human rights, and she provided examples of reforms that had been undertaken by beneficiary countries which included the prevention of child trafficking and addressed the worst forms of child labor.

It is important that this issue be examined, particularly in light of the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report that was released by the State Department last month. It contains a "Tier 2 Watch List" of countries that have a serious trafficking problem and that do not fully comply with minimum standards to eliminate trafficking. These countries will be the subject of particular scrutiny by the State Department's Trafficking Office during the coming year to ascertain whether they are making sufficient efforts to bring themselves into compliance with those standards.

It is disturbing that eight countries on the Tier 2 Watch List are AGOA beneficiaries, and that each of these countries are cited in the TIP report for child and/or forced labor concerns. Sexual exploitation, particularly of children, as cited in some of these reports would also be relevant in the AGOA context as gross violations of international human rights standards. In addition to the other human rights assessments that are legislatively mandated as part of the AGOA eligibility process, one would expect the tier placement for trafficking in persons to be a critical consideration. I hope Ms. Liser will address what kind of collaboration takes place between the US Trade Representative and the State Department Trafficking in Persons office on this issue.

While questions may be raised concerning the relation between AGOA and improvement in human rights, it does seem that the Act together with the Millennium Challenge Account is providing an impetus for other advances. The World Bank is reporting that corruption in Africa is declining, stating that even some of the poorest countries have made "significant progress" in improving governance and fighting corruption over the past decade. This trend is certainly attributable to a significant extent to the eligibility requirements for both of these U.S. initiatives.

AGOA and the MCA are also addressing infrastructure and technical capacity that are essential for long-term development, but which are arguably not receiving sufficient emphasis from other assistance sources. As I indicated earlier and in our recent hearing on the MCA, Congress needs to look at ways to improve and strengthen these benefits in both pieces of legislation.

And finally, one should not minimize the good will and positive bi-lateral relationships in Africa that are being reinforced through AGOA and the MCA, together with the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief. This latter consideration, though intangible, is critical if the United States is to maintain and strengthen its presence in this region of the world that is becoming increasingly important for our own national security and global peace and prosperity.

Thank you again, Mr. Chairman, and I yield back.

Contact:

LOAD-DATE: July 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

165 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Middle East - Political
 Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

July 10, 2007 Tuesday

Saudi rights official criticizes US report on human trafficking

LENGTH: 1277 words

Text of report by London-based newspaper Al-Sharq al-Awsat website on 8 July

[Report by Huda al-Salih: "Human Rights Commission [HRC] Says US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report Includes Mistakes, Lacks Objectivity; HRC Head Al-Sudayri: Saudi Law Bans Trafficking in Persons on Basis of Ethics and Religion"]

Saudi Arabia has denied the accusations included in a report that was issued by the US State Department on Saudi efforts to combat trafficking in persons. The US State Department placed Saudi Arabia on the bottom Tier 3 list.

In the first official government response to the US State Department's Seventh Annual Trafficking in Persons Report, Turki al-Sudayri, chairman of the Saudi [government-run] Human Rights Commission [HRC], stressed that "the report, which seeks to diagnose violations of the law on trafficking in persons, includes several mistakes, in addition to erroneous ideas and conceptions."

Saudi Arabia is listed as Tier 3 (the bottom of the list) in the Seventh US report for the third year in a row and is accused of "failing to meet the minimum US standards for the elimination of trafficking" and of "failing to make significant efforts to improve its record in this regard." The report places Saudi Arabia on the bottom tier together with the states of the world that have the worst record in terms of their efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons, trafficking for commercial sexual exploitation, and the slave trade.

Al-Sudayri explained that "the Trafficking in Persons Report overlooks Saudi efforts to combat trafficking in persons, particularly now that Saudi Arabia has formed a permanent committee that includes within its membership the HRC as well as other ministries to study international reports and all the information they provide, to verify such information, and to shed light on any mistakes if they exist." He said that "the aforementioned report also ignores the Saudi cabinet's approval of the two UN protocols against trafficking in persons and transnational organized crime, in addition to Saudi Arabia's willingness to issue regulations against human trafficking." He added: "This is not to mention the special annex to the new Labour Law that regulates domestic labour and that was prepared by the Ministry of Labour."

The HRC chairman noted that "the permanent committee's recommendation to draw up a comprehensive national plan to confront and deal with the phenomenon of trafficking in persons has been approved by the HRC, in accordance with Article 1 of the HRC bylaw. This is in addition to the intensification of the awareness campaigns to raise awareness of the phenomenon of trafficking in persons - these campaigns have been launched by the Ministry of Culture and Information; the Ministry for Islamic Affairs, Endowment, Da'wah [preaching], and Guidance; the HRC; and other parties." He called on the international parties that prepare human rights reports "to cooperate with local sides before issuing and drawing up such reports, because of the important role that local parties may play in clarifying some delicate and sensitive aspects, thus giving these reports objectivity and accuracy."

In his response on behalf of the Saudi Human Rights Commission to the US Trafficking in Persons Report, Al-Sudayri said that "the standards mentioned in the Trafficking Victims Protection Act [TVPA] cannot be met without appreciating the differences between regions, peoples, and cultures; this is an issue that was approved and bolstered by UN rules and regulations."

The chairman of the government-run Human Rights Commission said that "in commenting on the Seventh Trafficking in Persons Report, some media and human rights bodies around the world have noted that the report is influenced by an individual view, is generalized to a certain extent, and presents preconceived judgments." He added that "many parts of the report rely on preconceived ideas that lack accuracy, particularly given that the report does not mention any specific incidents or cases to which one can refer and which one can verify to determine any defects that may exist in terms of prosecution, protection, or procedures."

In an accurate clarification of the confusion raised in the US Seventh Trafficking in Persons Report, on the basis of which a number of Arabian Gulf states - including Bahrain, Saudi Arabia, Qatar, and Oman - are facing the threat of sanctions, particularly the cancellation of US aid, for "involuntary servitude and commercial sexual exploitation," Al-Sudayri stressed that "the report denies the existence of a Saudi legal framework that bans trafficking in persons, thus ignoring international agreements and pacts that are considered part of the kingdom's laws and legislations in accordance with the kingdom's basic law." He added that "locally approved laws ban human trafficking, whether in workers or children from both genders, based on solid ethical and religious bases. This is in addition to the fact that approved Saudi laws and regulations incriminate traffickers in persons." Concerning protecting expatriate workers, preventing their exploitation, securing their rights, and ensuring their safety from harm, Al-Sudayri said: "We are operating under the [new] Labour Law, which prohibits trading in visas by putting in place rules and regulations that set conditions for granting visas to any citizen or business owner and regulate the process of granting licenses to private recruitment offices." He added that the "new Labour Law protects the rights of expatriate workers and does not differentiate between Saudi and expatriate workers in terms of rights and duties."

The HRC criticized the Seventh Trafficking in Persons Report because "it does not take into consideration the nature of the groups of people entering Saudi Arabia." The HRC issued a report in which it classified arrivals into several categories, including those who enter the country for tourist or business purposes. The report says that "these people come to Saudi Arabia of their own free will. The second group includes pilgrims and those who come to perform the small pilgrimage. These people are granted entry visas to perform these rituals. However, some of them remain in Saudi Arabia until they are traced and deported to their countries by the Saudi authorities, which in many cases pay their deportation costs. As for the third group, it includes expatriate workers who come to work in Saudi Arabia after signing contracts of their own free will. This category is a very big one and these people are granted official entry visas into Saudi Arabia. However, some workers enter the country by illegal means and might be victims of organized gangs in their countries that take advantage of their need to work abroad." The Saudi HRC report also says that "there remains a small group of people who illegally enter Saudi territory from neighbouring states or from the Horn of Africa."

Concerning the practices carried out by citizens against domestic workers, including physical or other kinds of abuse within the framework of trafficking in persons, the HRC pointed out that "the perpetrators of such acts are subject to punishment under Saudi law." As for the incidents that might take place between workers and their bosses, the HRC said that "labour committees exist in Saudi regions as well as homes belonging to the Ministry of Social Affairs that shelter domestic workers who are subjected to any kind of abuse until their cases are resolved. The official parties also give temporary licenses to those involved, until such cases are closed."

Source: Al-Sharq al-Awsat website, London, in Arabic 8 Jul 07

LOAD-DATE: July 10, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

166 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

July 10, 2007 Tuesday

SAUDI ARABIA REJECTS HUMAN TRAFFICKING REPORT

LENGTH: 496 words

DATELINE: DUBAI July 10

Saudi Arabia has dismissed accusations of human trafficking, describing the recent US State Department's Trafficking in Persons Report 2007 as "inconsistent," English daily Gulf News reported a human rights activist as saying.

Chairman of the official Saudi Human Rights Commission (HRC) Turki Bin Khalid Al Sudairy said that the US State Department report ignored the efforts being exerted by Saudi Arabia in combating human trafficking, particularly after the formation of a permanent official committee to study international reports and respond to them.

The US State Department report, released last month accused Saudi Arabia and a host of other countries, including Malaysia, of being among the worst countries in combating human trafficking.

The report placed Saudi Arabia, Malaysia and 14 other countries under the tier 3 ranking of countries that failed to meet minimum US standards on combating human trafficking or making significant efforts to improve their record.

Malaysia has also rebutted the listing, which it said was unjustified.

In a statement issued in Riyadh, Al Sudairy said that the report failed to take into account the Saudi Cabinet's approval of the United Nations protocols on human trafficking and transnational organised crime.

He pointed out that the HRC had adopted a comprehensive national plan to address cases of human trafficking, but did not elaborate.

He appealed to international organisations that prepare human rights reports to cooperate with local bodies before publishing these reports.

"Comments coming from all over the world described the US State Department seventh report on human trafficking as being influenced by personal viewpoints and included generalisations and stereotypes that lack accuracy," he was quoted as saying by the newspaper.

Al Sudairy said that Saudi Arabia banned human trafficking, whether the victims are workers or children of both sexes, and added that human trafficking is considered a crime in the kingdom.

Malaysian Prime Minister Datuk Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi had said that Malaysia had taken serious measures to curb human trafficking and the government had drafted a bill on human trafficking that would impose severe penalties on the perpetrators of the crime.

Foreign minister Datuk Seri Syed Hamid Albar, in describing the listing as unjustified, had said that no single country could act as an investigator, prosecutor and judge against another.

Countries placed under the third tier are subjected to possible sanctions, including the loss of U.S. aid and U.S. support for World Bank and International Monetary Fund loans.

Other countries placed under this tier are Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, Algeria, Equatorial Guinea, Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

The first tier includes countries which comply with the minimum US standards in respect of human trafficking while the second tier covers countries that make intensive efforts to comply with these standards.

LOAD-DATE: July 11, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Pertubuhan Berita Nasional Malaysia
All Rights Reserved

167 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

July 5, 2007 Thursday 7:43 PM TST

U.S. OFFICIAL ADDRESSES TAIWAN'S EFFORTS TO COMBAT HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: Chris Wang

LENGTH: 391 words

DATELINE: Taipei, July 5

The Taiwan government's efforts to combat human trafficking have been recognized and the U.S. welcomes the more proactive and concrete actions being taken in the coming year, a visiting U.S. State Department official said Thursday.

"Taiwan faces a multi-dimensional threat in the trafficking of persons, in part by virtue of its progress in creating a free and prosperous society. Once primarily a source of trafficked persons, Taiwan is now largely a destination," said Mark Taylor, Senior Coordinator for Trafficking in Persons.

Taiwan was classified as a "Tier 2" country in the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report released by the U.S. State Department in June 12, upgraded from a "Tier 2 Watch List" country in 2006.

The positive actions of the Taiwanese government were largely responsible for its removal from the watch list, Taylor said, noting that an inter-ministerial task force has been set up, and a comprehensive plan of action drafted and enacted. Revisions of Taiwan's laws, aimed at dealing effectively with all modern forms of slavery, are being drafted, passed by the Legislative Yuan, and implemented by Taiwanese authorities.

"This preliminary progress, however, needs to be accompanied by even greater efforts to protect exploited migrant laborers and foreign women who have come to Taiwan legally or illegally, as wives or workers, but who have ended up in slave-like conditions," said Taylor.

Debt that contract migrant workers owe to recruitment agencies or brokers is often overlooked, resulting in substantial debts that agencies or employers use as a tool to enforce what effectively amounts to involuntary servitude, Taylor noted.

Taylor encouraged the Taiwanese government to be proactive in identifying victims and traffickers, and offering victims clear legal and financial incentives to come forward and cooperate with law enforcement officials.

For Taiwan to move up to "Tier 1," Taylor said it should have more victims identified, more criminals prosecuted, and make improvements on the legislative front. Equally important will be providing victim with both governmental and non-government organization (NGO) services.

Taylor, who is on the last leg of his Asian visit, is scheduled to meet with officials from the Ministry of Interior, legislators and representatives of local NGOs before returning Washington July 7.

LOAD-DATE: July 5, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

168 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

July 5, 2007 Thursday 12:49 PM GMT

Cambodian women rescued from sexual slavery in Malaysia return home

BYLINE: By SOPHENG CHEANG, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 397 words

DATELINE: PHNOM PENH Cambodia

Three Cambodian women who escaped from sexual slavery in Malaysia last year were returned home this week, an aid group and officials said Thursday.

The three, ages 18 to 23, came back Tuesday after working as prostitutes for several years in Malaysia, said Somaly Mam, director of the nonprofit group Afesip. Its name is the French acronym for Acting for Women in Distressing Situations.

The case underlines the widespread problem of human trafficking in Southeast Asia, where economic desperation in poorer countries drives such exploitation. There are few mechanisms to protect them.

Cambodia was recently placed on a U.S. human trafficking watch list for the second consecutive year, "because it failed to show evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons, particularly in addressing reports of public officials' complicity in trafficking," according to the U.S. State Department's annual report on worldwide human trafficking.

The report describes Cambodia as "a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor."

It also calls Malaysia "a destination country, and to a lesser extent, a source and transit country for women and children trafficked for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation."

At least 51 Cambodian girls and women were rescued from brothels in Malaysia in 2005 to 2007, said You Ay, the country's Deputy Minister of Women's Affairs.

She gave no estimate of the total number of Cambodian sex workers in Malaysia, but said Cambodia's and Malaysia's governments are working together to try to rescue more.

Somaly Mam said one of the three returned women was tricked by her sister while she was in Cambodia into getting a job in Malaysia in 2006, but was later sold as a sex worker. Background information on the others was not immediately available.

All three are now at Afesip's center in Cambodia's capital, Phnom Penh, where they are receiving counseling, she said, adding that she believed three people in Malaysia had been arrested in the case.

Somaly Mam said Malaysian police rescued the three women from a brothel in November. She said one of them, who managed to escape from the brothel, phoned Afesip's Phnom Penh office to ask for help.

On the Net:

U.S. State Department report on human trafficking:

<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007/>

LOAD-DATE: July 5, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

169 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 30, 2007 Saturday

Maids in Singapore not spared ill treatment

BYLINE: Geoff Milne

LENGTH: 313 words

MR JOHN McBeth writes a good expose of the appalling treatment of Indonesian maids working overseas ('A problem that's cast aside'; ST, June 25). However, I wonder why Singapore completely escaped his attention.

Since I came to live in Singapore almost a year ago, I have been surprised and shocked at the number of reported instances of maids dying or suffering serious injury as a result of falling from windows, and cases of serious maid abuse, including beatings and starvation.

The Singapore Government is 'baffled' by the latest US Human Trafficking Report rating, which downgrades Singapore from Tier 1 to Tier 2. I am not.

One of the things singled out in the report is the treatment of domestic servants who are 'subjected to exploitation and unacceptable working conditions' in Singapore. The report states that a small number of foreign maids face seriously abusive labour conditions that amount to involuntary servitude. Well, a small number is too many for a country that claims to be 'First World'.

The Government may be putting some laws in place to try to improve this, but results are what count. All the legislation in the world would not necessarily prevent abuse. The punishment meted out to the perpetrators is minimal.

ST reported, after a recent incident of yet another maid falling from a window, that an employer who knowingly puts a maid in danger or lets a maid put herself in harm's way can be jailed for up to three months, fined up to $250, and be barred from hiring maids. Is that all the value we place on the life of a maid? No wonder there have been more than 100 workplace maid deaths over the past seven years.

While not suggesting that abuse is as widespread or extreme here as in Malaysia or Saudi Arabia (both on the bottom Tier 3 list of the Human Trafficking Report), surely it should not be ignored by Mr McBeth in an article in The Straits Times.

LOAD-DATE: June 29, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

170 of 445 DOCUMENTS

South China Morning Post

June 29, 2007 Friday

Matchmakers targeted in trafficking of women

BYLINE: Baradan Kuppusamy in Kuala Lumpur

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 8

LENGTH: 502 words

Human traffickers in Malaysia are using personal matchmaking companies as fronts for smuggling tens of thousands of women into prostitution and forced labour.

Last year an estimated 350,000 women were brought in as potential wives by matchmaking companies that have mushroomed across the country in recent years. But only 7,519 of these predominantly Chinese, Vietnamese and Filipina women actually married Malaysian men.

"What happened to the rest of the women?" opposition lawmaker Chong Eng asked in parliament. "Where they are now?"

The government admitted the vast majority of the women were probably victims of human trafficking and are either in the country or already trafficked abroad.

"Many matchmaking companies are really fronts for international human trafficking syndicates to bring in Asian women for purposes of exploitation," said Shahrizat Abdul Jalil, the minister for women, family and community development.

"The syndicates are sophisticated and are now setting up bogus matchmaking companies to bring the women from poverty-stricken backgrounds," she told parliament, in urging for a new law to oversee and control the activities of matchmaking companies.

However, human rights activists said the political will was lacking to act against trafficking in women even if a new law was passed.

"Nearly every rural town has matchmaking companies. Some are genuine while others are fronts for trafficking women," said Irene Fernandez, executive director of Tenaganita, a human rights NGO.

She said the women enter as tourists and are forced to work illegally as maids, "guest relations officers" in bars and restaurants, and as sex workers.

"Many are also 'shipped' out to other countries like Singapore, Japan and Europe to work in the entertainment industry," Ms Fernandez said. One matchmaking company calling itself Ever Love Enterprise, about 160km north of Kuala Lumpur, yesterday denied they were involved in trafficking women.

"Our success rate is only about 10 per cent. Most of the girls reject our clients because they are quite old," said Anthony Lim, who said he is an owner-manager.

A stinging report this month by the US State Department named Malaysia as a major transit centre for trafficked Asian women.

"Malaysia has the economic clout and the infrastructure to curb human trafficking but it is doing little," the report said, putting the country in its Tier Three of worst offenders, along with North Korea, Iran and Syria."

From January to May this year, 183,000 people entered the country as "tourists" using the 30-day arrival visa but immigration authorities said 60 per cent of them overstayed.

"We think many of these 'tourists' are trafficked women brought in by matchmaking companies and are now either working here or they have disappeared abroad," Ms Fernandez said. "They were never intended to be life partners for Malaysian men."

Mismatched

Ratio of women brought into Malaysia by matchmaking agencies who actually marry, according to government figures:
2%

LOAD-DATE: July 1, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 South China Morning Post Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

171 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 28, 2007 Thursday 10:26 AM GMTIndonesia must enforce new anti-trafficking law: activist*LENGTH: 328 wordsDATELINE: JAKARTA, June 28 2007

Indonesia must enforce a new law on human trafficking or risk falling back to the bottom of a US watchlist, a top activist warned Thursday.

Under the tough new law people traffickers face up to 15 years' imprisonment or life in jail if a death results.

Its passage saw Indonesia removed from a Tier 2 watchlist in an annual report by the US State Department earlier this month, which assesses efforts in 164 countries to combat trafficking.

"Indonesia was listed as Tier 3 (the lowest) in 2001, then was promoted the next year after the country made a national action plan, then it was relegated back to the Tier 2 watchlist last year," said Wahyu Susilo, one of nine people named in the report as a "hero" for their efforts to fight trafficking.

The report warned that despite the passage of the law, "the extent of Indonesia's non-compliance with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking remains considerable."

"If Indonesia fails to implement the law on the crime of human trafficking, it could slip back to the Tier 3 list," Susilo, who works for the Migrant Care organisation which helps migrant workers, told a panel discussion here.

Susilo said people trafficking was closely linked with corrupt government bodies. For instance, he said, most Indonesian migrant workers in the Middle East held fraudulent documents.

"There is a village in Sukabumi, West Java with a population of not more than 8,500 people -- but passports originating from that village reach about 15,000 per month," he told the discussion.

Robert Barlow, visiting from the US Department of Justice to run a police training programme, said it was difficult to get an exact number of victims, but around 30 percent of those leaving for work would fall prey to traffickers.

He said police needed to understand the nature of the crime and work for the trust of victims, who mostly go to charities now for protection.

"Many of them do not see a crime being committed in front of them," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 28, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

172 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 26, 2007 Tuesday

Panel joins anti-crime war

BYLINE: V. Vasudevan; Anis Ibrahim; R.S. Kamini

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 14

LENGTH: 404 words

A PARLIAMENTARY panel has joined the fight against the growing incidence of crime in urban areas.

It is trying to find a long-term solution with pro-active measures.

As a first step, the Parliamentary Human Rights Caucus is holding public hearings in Johor Baru, Petaling Jaya and Bukit Mertajam to collect feedback from the public.

The hearing in Johor Baru is scheduled for July 8, Petaling Jaya for July 11 and Bukit Mertajam for July 15.

The venues will be announced later.

The caucus' chairman, Datuk Seri Nazri Aziz, said everyone was welcomed to give their input at the hearing.

"The police are also welcome. We want to hear all sides of the story. Let's work together to find a solution to this problem," he said in the lobby of Parliament House yesterday.

He said Petaling Jaya was picked to gather information about the crime scene in the Klang Valley and Bukit Mertajam for Penang.

Nazri said the caucus was aware that the government had taken steps to arrest the rising incidence of crime in Johor, but it was not happy with the way the issue was being tackled.

Last week, Deputy Prime Minister Datuk Seri Najib Razak announced that the cabinet had decided that an additional 400 policemen would be deployed in Johor Baru as soon as possible.

The cabinet also decided to despatch 200 patrol cars to the state and set up three new police districts in Johor Baru.

"What is happening now is more reactive than pro-active. We want a permanent long-term solution. That is why we are holding these public hearings," Nazri said.

He urged the public to come forward and speak up.

The findings of the caucus will be forwarded to the police and the government.

The caucus is also seeking a meeting with the US ambassador to discuss his government's decision to downgrade Malaysia to tier three on its watch list for human trafficking.

"We want to find out what exactly is the problem and the reasons for the decision."

Nazri suggested that there may be other reasons for the American decision.

"While we have enacted legislation to fight human trafficking, it doesn't mean everything is resolved.

"The reality on the ground may be different," he added.

In its annual Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department gave Malaysia and 16 other nations Tier-3 status in its 236-page survey of global efforts to combat trafficking in people, who were allegedly sold into the sex trade, made to do manual labour or mistreated as domestic help.

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

GRAPHIC: Dewan Rakyat

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

173 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 22, 2007 Friday

CORNYN, FEINSTEIN RESOLUTION TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL DAY OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING AWARENESS PASSES SENATE

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 749 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by Texas Senator John Cornyn:

The U.S. Senate unanimously passed a bipartisan resolution on Friday introduced by U.S. Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to create an annual National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11.

The resolution is intended to focus attention on, and generate opposition to, a crime in which victims, primarily women and children, are trafficked into the United States by the thousands and coerced into lives of forced labor and sexual slavery.

"I believe most Americans would be shocked to learn that slavery continues to exist today not just in remote parts of the world, but hidden away in communities across America," said Sen. Cornyn, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "We must keep working to eradicate human trafficking by raising awareness and strengthening efforts to combat it both abroad and here at home."

The resolution states that: "Congress supports the goals and ideals of observing the National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11 of each year and all other efforts to raise awareness of and opposition to human trafficking."

"Eliminating the scourge of human trafficking and slavery from our midst remains one of the most fundamental human rights issues of our time," Sen. Cornyn said. "So we must continue efforts to protect the victims of human trafficking and slavery, to punish the evildoers, and to prevent other innocent human beings from ever having to suffer the same fate."

The International Labor Organization estimates there are more than 12 million people in forced labor, bonded labor, forced child labor and sexual servitude at any given time.

--Background on Sen. Cornyn's efforts to combat human trafficking--

Sen. Cornyn introduced the Stop Trafficking of Persons (STOP) Act, in the 108th Congress, to strengthen U.S. efforts to combat human trafficking. This legislation would: specify that governments engaging in human trafficking are not immune from prosecution within the U.S. court system; require the U.S. State Department to include in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report accounts of steps foreign governments are taking to combat the sex tourism industry; and ensure that nongovernmental organizations investigating human trafficking in foreign countries are not required by U.S. law to notify foreign governments or targets of investigative activities.

Sen. Cornyn helped pass the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 in the 108th Congress. This legislation would authorize appropriations to combat human trafficking, refined the criteria for judging whether countries meet standards for combating human trafficking, and created a new country "watch list." Since passage of this legislation, countries that, according to the Trafficking in Persons Report, do not cooperate in the fight against trafficking are subject to U.S. sanctions.

Sen. Cornyn introduced the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005, which built on the STOP Act by continuing to combat commercial sex trade activities by targeting the demand for this atrocity. This legislation would protect children from being exploited by these activities, prohibit the operation of sex tours, assist state and local enforcement of laws prohibiting commercial sexual activities, and reduce trafficking in persons.

Provisions in Sen. Cornyn's End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005 were passed, in part, in the reauthorization of the anti-sex trafficking legislation last year the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act.

The Senate unanimously passed a Cornyn-sponsored resolution in 2004 urging all states to adopt legislation that will ensure the full coordination of local, state and federal efforts to fight the scourge of human slavery and sex trafficking.

In 2005, Sen. Cornyn chaired a hearing titled, "Examining U.S. Efforts to Combat Human Trafficking and Slavery," in his capacity as then-chairman of the Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights subcommittee.

Sen. Cornyn serves on the Armed Services, Judiciary and Budget Committees. In addition, he is Vice Chairman of the Senate Republican Conference and the Senate Select Committee on Ethics. He serves as the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee's Immigration, Border Security and Refugees subcommittee and the Armed Services Committee's Airland subcommittee. He served previously as Texas Attorney General, Texas Supreme Court Justice, and Bexar County District Judge

LOAD-DATE: June 22, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

174 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 22, 2007 Friday 1:05 AM EST

SENATE PASSES SENS. CORNYN, FEINSTEIN RESOLUTION TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL DAY OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING AWARENESS

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 680 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The office of Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, issued the following press release:

The U.S. Senate unanimously passed a bipartisan resolution on Friday introduced by. Sens. John Cornyn (R-Texas) and Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) to create an annual National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11.

The resolution is intended to focus attention on, and generate opposition to, a crime in which victims, primarily women and children, are trafficked into the United States by the thousands and coerced into lives of forced labor and sexual slavery.

"I believe most Americans would be shocked to learn that slavery continues to exist today - not just in remote parts of the world, but hidden away in communities across America," said Sen. Cornyn, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "We must keep working to eradicate human trafficking by raising awareness and strengthening efforts to combat it both abroad and here at home."

The resolution states that: "Congress supports the goals and ideals of observing the National Day of Human Trafficking Awareness on January 11 of each year and all other efforts to raise awareness of and opposition to human trafficking."

"Eliminating the scourge of human trafficking and slavery from our midst remains one of the most fundamental human rights issues of our time," Sen. Cornyn said. "So we must continue efforts to protect the victims of human trafficking and slavery, to punish the evildoers, and to prevent other innocent human beings from ever having to suffer the same fate."

The International Labor Organization estimates there are more than 12 million people in forced labor, bonded labor, forced child labor and sexual servitude at any given time.

-Background on Sen. Cornyn's efforts to combat human trafficking-

* Sen. Cornyn introduced the Stop Trafficking of Persons (STOP) Act, in the 108th Congress, to strengthen U.S. efforts to combat human trafficking. This legislation would: specify that governments engaging in human trafficking are not immune from prosecution within the U.S. court system; require the U.S. State Department to include in its annual Trafficking in Persons Report accounts of steps foreign governments are taking to combat the sex tourism industry; and ensure that nongovernmental organizations investigating human trafficking in foreign countries are not required by U.S. law to notify foreign governments or targets of investigative activities.

* Sen. Cornyn helped pass the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2003 in the 108th Congress. This legislation would authorize appropriations to combat human trafficking, refined the criteria for judging whether countries meet standards for combating human trafficking, and created a new country "watch list." Since passage of this legislation, countries that, according to the Trafficking in Persons Report, do not cooperate in the fight against trafficking are subject to U.S. sanctions.

* Sen. Cornyn introduced the End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005, which built on the STOP Act by continuing to combat commercial sex trade activities by targeting the demand for this atrocity. This legislation would protect children from being exploited by these activities, prohibit the operation of sex tours, assist state and local enforcement of laws prohibiting commercial sexual activities, and reduce trafficking in persons.

* Provisions in Sen. Cornyn's End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act of 2005 were passed, in part, in the reauthorization of the anti-sex trafficking legislation last year - the Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act.

* The Senate unanimously passed a Cornyn-sponsored resolution in 2004 urging all states to adopt legislation that will ensure the full coordination of local, state and federal efforts to fight the scourge of human slavery and sex trafficking.

* In 2005, Sen. Cornyn chaired a hearing titled, "Examining U.S. Efforts to Combat Human Trafficking and Slavery," in his capacity as then-chairman of the Constitution, Civil Rights and Property Rights subcommittee.

LOAD-DATE: June 23, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

175 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 19, 2007 Tuesday

Chinese spokesman says US human trafficking report "unreasonable"

LENGTH: 400 words

Text of report by official Chinese news agency Xinhua (New China News Agency)

[By reporters Tan Jingjing and Ma Wenbo: "Foreign Ministry Spokesman: Criticism of the US State Department 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report on China 'Unreasonable'"]

Beijing, 19 Jun (Xinhua) - At a regular news conference on 19 June, Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang said that the Chinese Government has carried out fruitful cooperation with relevant countries and international organizations in cracking down on trafficking in persons and illegal immigration and the criticism of the US State Department 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report on China is "unreasonable." [mei you dao li]

A reporter asked: Recently, the US State Department issued the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report, which puts China on the Tier 2 Watch List as in the last two reports and criticizes China for its ways to handle illegal Korean immigrants. What is China's reaction to this?

Qin Gang said the Chinese Government has attached great importance to protecting the rights and interests of Chinese citizens and cracking down on acts of abducting and trafficking women and children. Through unremitting efforts, acts of abduction and human trafficking within China have gradually decreased and very great achievements have been made in the work to crack down on trafficking in persons. China has also actively participated in international law-enforcement cooperation and has carried out fruitful cooperation with relevant countries and international organizations in cracking down on trafficking in persons and illegal immigration. We hope the US Government can look at this fact objectively and impartially.

Qin Gang said that as we all know, the reason for Koreans to illegally enter China is an economic one and they are not the so-called "refugees." The Chinese Government has always handled relevant issues according to its domestic law, the international law and the humanitarian principle and the international community has universally spoken positively of it. The US Government's criticism on China is unreasonable.

Trafficking in persons and illegal immigration are common issues facing the whole world and they need the joint efforts of the international community. China will continue to make efforts to strengthen international cooperation in this area.

Source: Xinhua news agency domestic service, Beijing, in Chinese 1035 gmt 19 Jun 07

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

176 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 19, 2007 Tuesday

KIT SIANG URGES GOVT TO RATIFY UN PROTOCOL ON HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 294 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 19

Opposition leader Lim Kit Siang has called on the government to ratify and adopt the United Nations' 2000 Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children.

The protocol also supplements the UN Convention against Transnational Organised Crime.

"We have not ratified it and I think it is time that we ratify it and be prepared to be held up to international scrutiny," Lim told Bernama here today.

He said human trafficking was presently confined to sexual slavery and forced labour.

The government, he said, also needed to prove that the US Trafficking in Persons Report 2007, which had put Malaysia in the Tier 3 ranking, was unfounded if there was no basis to the report.

Lim felt that the government must come clean on the matter and explain in Parliament with all the facts.

Last year Malaysia was placed in Tier 2.

Published by the US State Department last week, the report had lumped Malaysia with countries such as Myanmar, Cuba, North Korea, Iran, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar and Sudan.

Tier 3 classifies countries whose governments do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so in the human trafficking issues.

The report called on Malaysia to demonstrate stronger political will against forced labour and sex trafficking.

But last week Prime Minister Datuk Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi refuted the claim that Malaysia was not doing enough to curb the problem.

Malaysia passed a bill on human trafficking last month that would impose severe penalties on perpetrators of the crime.

Meanwhile, Lim also disclosed that the Parliamentary Human Rights Caucus would meet on Monday to discuss, among others, the Tier 3 ranking on the human trafficking issue as well as crime in Johor.

LOAD-DATE: June 20, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

177 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 19, 2007 Tuesday 8:00 AM EST

China questions U.S. human trafficking report

SECTION: DOMESTIC NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 281 wordsDATELINE: BEIJING

China on Tuesday urged the United States to have an objective and fair assessment of its anti-trafficking efforts and refused U.S. criticism on the country's treatment of illegal trespassers from the Democratic People's Republic of Korea (DPRK).

"The U.S. accusation (of China on its treatment of North Korean illegal migrants) is groundless," said Chinese Foreign Ministry spokesman Qin Gang at a regular press conference.

The U.S. State Department last week issued an annual "Trafficking in Persons Report", listing China in Tier 2 Watch list for the third year and criticizing it on treatment of DPRK illegal trespassers.

Qin said it is known to all that the DPRK illegal trespassers came to China for economic reasons, and they were not "victims".

The Chinese government has all along treated such illegal migrants in accordance with the domestic and international laws and humanitarian principles, which has been widely appreciated by the international community, he said.

Qin added that the Chinese government has paid much attention to protecting its citizens' rights and cracking down on women and children trafficking, and has made great progress in this regard through unremitting efforts.

China has also participated in international cooperation on fighting human trafficking and illegal migration, and made remarkable achievements, he said.

"We hope the U.S. government would have an objective and fair review of all this," he said.

The spokesman noted that human trafficking and illegal migration are common problems facing the whole world, and China will continue to participate in international cooperation in this area.

LOAD-DATE: June 19, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Xinhua News Agency

178 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Jiji Press Ticker Service

June 18, 2007 Monday 3:45 PM JST

U.S. Anti-Human Trafficking Director to Visit Japan in July

LENGTH: 281 wordsDATELINE: Washington, June 18

Mark Lagon, director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons at the U.S. State Department, said in a recent interview with Jiji Press that he will visit Japan for three days from July 1 to discuss anti-human trafficking measures.

Lagon is slated to meet with senior officials of the Japanese government, including from the Foreign and Justice Ministries, to talk about plans to work together to improve Japan's record on human trafficking.

The U.S. State Department recently released its 2007 report on human trafficking and forced labor.

In the report, the department placed Japan on Tier 2, the second highest of four levels of compliance with minimum standards for efforts to combat human trafficking, due partly to prostitution involving women from China and South-east Asian countries.

During his stay in Japan, Lagon is expected to call on Japan to strengthen its efforts for improvement on such issues.

Even though Japan's Justice Ministry say that the number of foreign human trafficking victims has decreased, Lagon said, "We really do not believe there are fewer victims of human trafficking in Japan" and suggested that there might be "less vigorous attempts to find them."

In the interview, Lagon also expressed strong concerns over human trafficking involving North Koreans. He said, "What's really troubling is those North Korean who fled a horrendous life in North Korea and (are) caught in trafficking."

He added that North Korean seeking refuge in China are "treated as subhuman" there.

"Now for the Olympics, Beijing Olympics are an occasion for the world to look at the human rights record of China and they should look too at the problem of human trafficking."

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

179 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 18, 2007 Monday

Washington wants to be feared, not loved

BYLINE: Deva Mohd Ridzam

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 26

LENGTH: 1115 words

THE relegation of Malaysia to Tier 3 of the TiP list by the United States is unjustified and uncalled for, especially in light on the passage of the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill recently, writes DEVA MOHD RIDZAM.

For Washington to completely disregard the many changes that have taken and continue to take place in Malaysia is both surprising and strange.

Relegating Malaysia to Tier 3 in the State Department's Annual Report on Trafficking in Persons (TiP in American parlance) is not only absurd but also a cheap shot.

The US listing amounts to labelling both Malaysians and their government as guilty of human trafficking. This is unjustified and uncalled for. Malaysians recognise that TiP is a soft transnational crime that affects societies. They also know that it is an insidious and complex problem due to the nexus between TiP and other forms of transnational crime.

Malaysians further realise the danger of neglecting this problem since it would impact on our national security, unity and social harmony as much as on our international image and prestige. This explains why our parliament last month passed the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill.

Unlike George W. Bush's America, Malaysia believes in the rule of law both at home and abroad. How else can a country be deemed responsible if it does otherwise. We need the legal sanction to deal with this menace to society.

"Rule by law" is a Bush administration speciality. It wants other countries to act domestically and internationally without legal cover so long as their actions conform to its neo-conservative aims.

Why has Washington suddenly turned on a longstanding friend? Unlike other countries in Asia and elsewhere, Malaysia has never officially been anti-American.

As friends, Malaysia at times disagrees with US policies without being disagreeable. Moreover, the administration of Prime Minister Datuk Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi has, in fact, returned to a more traditional and measured style of government and foreign policy.

The rulers in Washington do not like straight-talking, honest, warm-hearted and friendly countries. Bush and his neo-conservatives want only "obedient followers" in the form of "deputy sheriffs", "corporals" and "poodles". This is part and parcel of their grand strategy for global domination.

To establish this hegemony, they need to rewrite international law where America can act with impunity with one standard for itself and another for the rest of the world. This is the kind of master-slave relationship in the global order that the US seeks to create.

One is again reminded of Edmund Burke's famous phrase "a great empire and little minds go ill together". This description aptly describes what is really happening today to this hyperpower, once a great nation that led the world in establishing international rule of law through global institutions and international agreements founded on justice, co-operation and peace.

Today, the US finds itself in a quandary of its own making in the pursuit of a flawed global vision.

The Bush administration is beginning to realise that its vision of a unipolar world with American military superiority is fast losing its grip on world affairs. American hegemony is being challenged in all corners of the globe. All this is due to a potent combination of incompetence, arrogance and militarism.

In simple terms, the US administration is indeed behaving like a blinded boxer in a rapidly changing global geo-political environment. Because of this, it is unable to distinguish between friends and foes. Even Malaysia is being hit below the belt by this blindness.

How quickly the American neo-conservatives have forgotten that human trafficking was indeed their creation. The sex trade, including paedophilia, the recruitment of child soldiers, the growing of opium in the Golden Triangle and drug trafficking, to mention but a few, are legacies of their militarism in Southeast Asia.

The TiP 2007 report is thus a politically-motivated document. The description of Malaysia in it could very well apply to a great many countries in this region and elsewhere.

The passage of Malaysia's Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill was in fact communicated to the State Department. Despite having knowledge of this significant legal milestone, the Bush administration deliberately disregarded it.

Washington wants to show the world that those in Tier 3 are not the best of friends with the US. And these countries should now bend backwards to curry its favour and do its bidding.

By its very nature as a transnational crime, TiP eradication requires bilateral, regional, even plurilateral and international co-operation. Indeed, these offer the most effective ways of guiding the international community and protecting the interests of all countries, including those of the United States.

The US can do two sensible things: First, put money where its mouth is and, second, help Malaysia and other countries to implement their laws by encouraging source countries to control the trafficking of such persons.

Malaysia on its part would also have to take clear, sustained and unambiguous steps towards stamping out this scourge. This should include strict enforcement of the provisions of the Act without ifs and buts. In fact, Malaysia should take the high moral ground on this and deal severely with those who engage in the flesh trade and other abuses.

It would appear that there is little the US can do in this regard and, for that matter, in other areas as well, for the simple reason that American power, position and prestige are at an all-time low. The US suffers from international illegitimacy and loss of moral authority.

Unfortunately, Bush still believes that because he is commander-in-chief of the most powerful country in the world, he can place himself above international law and trample on the sovereignty of other nations.

This is what is called American exceptionalism - that the US is different from and better than others and that it alone can do what it wants and get away with it. It even includes a blatant and wanton disregard for major international agreements, including the Geneva Conventions.

Recent examples are Guantanamo Bay, Abu Ghraib and the practice of extraordinary rendition (exporting suspects in secret to undisclosed locations where they may be subject to torture).

The TiP 2007 Report, as previous ones, quite conveniently does not include the US. There is no narrative about the US condoning human trafficking within its borders and in its wider neighbourhood.

Surely, the US needs help, and this help can come from the international community, including Malaysia, if only the US shows more humility and is not blinded by arrogance and power.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

180 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 18, 2007 MondayProvide figures of how many `slaves' were sold*BYLINE: A.M. NoranSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 29LENGTH: 162 words

THE United States is at it again. It has decided to be the moral policeman of the world.

It boggles the mind that they think they still have the right to measure the moral standards of other nations after Guantanamo and Abu Ghraib.

They are so smug in their righteousness.

So Malaysia now is placed at Tier 3 as a human trafficking offender.

Since they are condemning the whole nation for the indiscretion of a few individuals, why don't they provide us with the statistics of how many "slaves" the Human Resources Ministry has sold to date and to which countries.

Don't keep us Malaysians in the dark.

We want to know what our government has been doing all this while.

I have just returned from Vietnam and visited the Cu Chi Tunnels area as well as the War Remnants Museum.

I think Americans should visit that museum and see what their country did in the past against the Vietnamese who were just defending their country and fighting for survival.

A.M. NORAN

Subang Jaya, Selangor

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: LetterPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

181 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 17, 2007 Sunday 7:22 AM GMT

Myanmar denounces US human trafficking report

LENGTH: 255 wordsDATELINE: YANGON, June 17 2007

Military-run Myanmar on Sunday denounced the US annual report on human trafficking, which blacklisted the country as one of the world's worst offenders for the seventh year, state-run media reported.

The US State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" released last week listed Myanmar in Tier 3, meaning it is one of the worst offenders along with 15 other nations including North Korea, Sudan and Uzbekistan.

"Although the stated aim of the US is to eradicate trafficking in persons, internationally, the report lacks objectivity," the New Light of Myanmar newspaper said, quoting a statement from the foreign ministry.

The ministry rejected its status as a Tier 3 nation, insisting it had taken action against about 400 traffickers in 2006.

"Despite these persistent efforts, which the report itself duly noted, the State Department has failed to promote Myanmar's status from Tier 3 again this year," the report quoted the ministry as saying.

The US report said that women and children from Myanmar were trafficked to Thailand, China, Bangladesh, Malaysia, South Korea and Macau "for sexual exploitation, domestic servitude, and forced labour".

It noted some progress against sex trafficking, but said Myanmar continued to take little action against official or military-sanctioned forced labour.

The United States and the European Union have imposed economic sanctions on Myanmar to protest human rights abuses, lack of progress in the return to democracy, and the ongoing detention of opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Agence France Presse
All Rights Reserved

182 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Emirates News Agency

June 17, 2007 Sunday 12:58 PM EST

Human Trafficking Panel reviews UAE status in TIP tier

LENGTH: 225 words

Human Trafficking Panel reviews UAE status in TIP tier

Abu Dhabi, June 17th, 2007 (WAM) -- National Committee on Human Trafficking discussed today in its second meeting a host of issues related to trafficking in persons with emphasis on the 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) report issued by the US State Department..

Presided over by Dr. Anwar Mohammed Gargash, Minister of State for FNC Affairs, the meeting reviewed measures the UAE should take to improve its status in the TIP tier watch list..

The committee also approved a memorandum on coordination of visits to the country by foreign delegations for talks with UAE trafficking concerned authorities..

The UAE Red Crescent gave a presentation on the social aspect dealing with victims of human trafficking crime and its programme for support of those victims..

Dr. Gargash stressed the vital importance of raising the standard of awareness among state entities about the human trafficking through holding of specialized seminars..

"The trafficking in persons crime is a world epidemic and all countries should rally together to combat it," he affirmed..

He noted that the benchmark for success lies in combating the phenomenon rather than its severity..

More focus, he added, is needed in regard to social dimension of the phenomenon especially that deals with trafficker and victim..

WAM/TF 20 17 CCCCQQ

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

JOURNAL-CODE: WAM

Copyright 2007 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved
ARABIA 2000

Copyright 2007 by Emirates News Agency Distributed by UPI

183 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 17, 2007 Sunday 8:29 AM GMT

Myanmar criticizes U.S. human trafficking report

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 185 wordsDATELINE: YANGON June 17

Myanmar has criticized a recent U.S. government report which placed Myanmar on a list of countries failing to control human trafficking, state-run newspapers reported Sunday.

The newspapers quoted a Foreign Ministry statement as saying the Myanmar government "totally rejects" the placement of Myanmar in Tier-3 of the U.S. State Department report as it "lacks objectivity and does not fully reflect Myanmar's concerted efforts against human trafficking."

The State Department released the seventh annual Trafficking in Persons Report on Tuesday, placing Myanmar in the Tier-3 category, a classification reserved for countries with the worst human trafficking records.

The State Department report said the country did not fully comply with the minimum standards required for fighting trafficking and was not making any significant effort to do so.

The Foreign Ministry statement said the Myanmar government has been tackling the menace of trafficking in persons as a national duty and in cooperation with U.N. agencies.

Myanmar police identified more than 400 traffickers in 191 cases last year, the statement added.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

184 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 17, 2007 Sunday 3:45 AM EST

VOA NEWS: BURMA REJECTS U.S. HUMAN TRAFFICKING REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 145 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Voice of America issued the following story:

Burma is rejecting the latest U.S. report on human trafficking, which blacklisted the country as one of the world's worst offenders for a seventh consecutive year.

Burma's state-run New Light of Myanmar newspaper quoted a foreign ministry official as saying the annual report lacks objectivity and does not fully reflect Burma's efforts against human trafficking.

The U.S. State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report" listed Burma in tier three, meaning it is one of the world's worst offenders, along with North Korea and Sudan.

Burma's foreign ministry, however, said that it had taken action against around 400 traffickers in 2006.

The United States and the European Union have imposed economic sanctions on Burma to protests human rights abuses and the lack of democratic progress in the military-run country.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

185 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 17, 2007 Sunday 11:00 PM EST

Myanmar rejects U.S. report on anti-human trafficking

SECTION: WORLD NEWS; Political

LENGTH: 308 words

DATELINE: YANGON

The Myanmar government has rejected a United States report on the country's anti-human trafficking efforts, blaming the U.S for failing to promote Myanmar status from tier-3 again this year.

A Myanmar Foreign Ministry's statement, quoted by Sunday's official newspaper the New Light of Myanmar, said the sixth annual "Trafficking in Persons Report" of the U.S. Department of State released this month lacks objectivity and does not fully reflect the country's concerted efforts against human trafficking.

The U.S. annual report on the issue is a compendium of situation in selected countries.

However, the U.S. report recognized the progress made by Myanmar throughout 2006, admitting that Myanmar police force identified over 400 traffickers in 191 cases during the year and that information sharing with the international organizations had improved with regard to prosecution, the statement said.

Dealing with protection, the U.S. report also admitted that Myanmar provides temporary shelters to repatriated trafficking victims at eight vocational training centers and the victims have a right to file civil suits and seek legal action against the traffickers, the statement noted.

Relating to prevention, the statement blamed the U.S. report for only stating that the Myanmar government has marginally increased its efforts to prevent human trafficking, failing to faithfully reflect the true situation though the government is relentlessly fighting the complex problem.

The statement agreed with the U.S. report that Myanmar conducted about 8,000 educational sessions for women across the country and education through various media.

The statement held that Myanmar is cooperating with UN agencies, international and local non-governmental organizations in tackling the menace of human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Xinhua News Agency

186 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 16, 2007 Saturday

M'SIA TAKES STRINGENT MEASURES TO CURB HUMAN TRAFFICKING

LENGTH: 229 wordsDATELINE: KOTA KINABALU June 16

Malaysia is among countries that take stringent measures to check human trafficking, said Deputy Inspector-General of Police Tan Sri Mohd Najib Abdul Aziz.

In fact, he added, Malaysia had not only taken continuous but more stringent measures against the crime compared to many other countries.

"We have been taking stern action against the offenders as provided by the existing laws and now the government has formulated a law on human trafficking."

Mohd Najib said Malaysia also had close cooperation with other countries in combating the crime.

"So, we do not understand how the United States had placed Malaysia in the (lowest) category," he told reporters after witnessing the passing-out parade of the Series 1/2004 Universiti Malaysia Sabah undergraduates police volunteer corps here today.

On Tuesday, the US State Department in Washington issued its "Trafficking in Persons Report" which states that Malaysia is among 16 countries relegated to Tier-3 status, the lowest, for not doing enough to curb the problem.

However, on Thursday, Prime Minister Datuk Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi refuted the claim, saying that Malaysia had taken the necessary measures, including tabling the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill 2007, to be passed by parliament at its next sitting beginning this Monday.

The Bill, among others, provides for heavy penalties against those convicted of the crime.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

187 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 16, 2007 Saturday

Govt 'baffled' by US human trafficking rating; Ministry surprised by move to downgrade S'pore

BYLINE: Radha Basu

LENGTH: 631 words

A UNITED States government report on how countries deal with human trafficking has downgraded Singapore a notch this year - a move the Government here has termed 'baffling'.

The US Department of State's Trafficking in Persons (Tip) Report ranks 164 countries in three broad tiers based on their records in combating situations where poor, vulnerable people are forced or tricked into labour or sexual slavery overseas.

'The Singapore Government does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however it is making significant efforts to do so,' the report said, while pushing Singapore from Tier 1 to Tier 2.

The report was released in Washington by US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Tuesday.

Tier 1 lists countries that have basic legal safeguards in place to prevent such crimes, Tier 2 lists countries that are making efforts to put laws in place to combat trafficking, while Tier 3 names the worst offenders.

With the exception of South Korea and Hong Kong, most Tier 1 countries are developed Western nations.

Expressing surprise at Singapore's Tier 2 listing, a Ministry of Home Affairs spokesman told The Straits Times that the trafficking situation here had 'remained stable over the past few years'.

'The US report has not satisfactorily explained how it arrived at its conclusion,' the spokesman added.

While the report did not elaborate on exactly what 'minimum standards' the Government did not comply with, The Straits Times understands they could pertain to laws that would criminalise all forms of trafficking.

Referring to current gaps in laws here, the report urged the Singapore Parliament to approve proposed amendments that would criminalise paid sex with anyone below 18, prosecute Singaporeans seeking child sex overseas and make promoting child-sex tours a criminal offence.

Moves to ensure exactly this are already afoot. In March last year, Senior Minister of State for Law and Home Affairs Ho Peng Kee had announced that Singapore would soon change its Penal Code to protect those below 18 from commercial sex.

The announcement may have prompted the US Department of State to swiftly upgrade Singapore from Tier 2 to Tier 1 in last year's report.

The fact that the changes are yet to be enacted could have prompted the US to knock Singapore back down into Tier 2, said civil society groups that combat trafficking.

President of women's rights group Unifem Singapore Saleemah Ismail pointed out that more than a year had lapsed since Associate Professor Ho's announcement, but the changes were yet to be enacted.

'Singapore is known for its efficiency so what's causing the delay?' she said.

'This is a First World country with First World infrastructure. It's about time we have First World laws for everyone as well.'

While acknowledging that such law changes took time to craft, women's rights advocate Braema Mathi too noted that speedy enactment and implementation were especially important when it came to protecting children.

Ms Mathi heads the trafficking of children committee at the Association of Women for Action and Research (Aware).

Referring to proposed laws to crack down on Singaporean child-sex predators who preyed overseas, she said:

'The faster we can get protection and punitive measures, the better it will be for these innocent child victims.'

The MHA says the proposed Penal Code amendments will happen later this year.

The spokesman added: 'We view the problem of human trafficking seriously and we have taken action to deal firmly with trafficking in persons. Singapore is mindful of the fact that, as an open society, it is not insulated from developments in the region and the world, whether these are problems of forced prostitution, sexual abuse of minors, drug trafficking or terrorism.'

radhab@sph.com.sg

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

188 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 16, 2007 Saturday 3:36 AM GMT

Myanmar says US human trafficking report disappointing

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 285 wordsDATELINE: YANGON Myanmar

Myanmar is disappointed that the United States has described the country in a report as a major center for human trafficking, a senior official said, adding that the charge was politically motivated.

"The report is politically motivated, unfair and biased. It is very disappointing as the U.S. has deliberately turned a blind eye to our achievements and our determination in the fight against human trafficking," police Col. Sit Aye, head of the department of transnational crime, told The Associated Press on Friday.

In an annual global report released Wednesday, the U.S. State Department placed Myanmar in Tier 3, the worst category for human trafficking, saying it had not fully complied with the minimum standards for fighting trafficking and was not making significant efforts to do so.

Myanmar adopted a National Plan of Action in 1997 to fight human trafficking and introduced an anti-human trafficking law in September 2005 that imposes a maximum penalty of death, he said. The law also calls for victims of trafficking to be protected and aided.

"The U.S. report is unjust and very unsatisfactory. The report belittled not only our efforts but also undermined the activities of other agencies working with Myanmar to tackle human trafficking," Sit Aye said.

He said that due to cooperation between Myanmar and neighboring countries, 270 people involved in human trafficking had been arrested and prosecuted between September 2005 and April 2007, while 428 trafficking victims, mostly women, had been rescued.

The U.S. has imposed economic and political sanctions against Myanmar's military government because of its poor human rights record and failure to hand over power to a democratically elected government.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

189 of 445 DOCUMENTS

IPS (Latin America)

June 15, 2007 Friday

United States names Malaysia as a human trafficking and bonded labour source; RIGHTS-MALAYSIA: Human Trafficking Charges Stick - Activists

BYLINE: Baradan KuppusamyLENGTH: 1058 words

Predictably, Malaysia reacted with horror at the classification, accusing the U.S. state department of behaving as the uninvited judge, jury and prosecutor; without just cause. 'It's all false, not true. We reject it,' said foreign minister Syed Hamid Albar.

But opposition lawmakers and human rights activists who had long campaigned inside and outside the country against human trafficking said the report's conclusions are true and verifiable. 'It is a damning report, it is a major black mark on Malaysia's already tarnished human record. It tells a lot about our treatment of migrant workers and victims of trafficking,' said Teresa Kok, opposition lawmaker.

'No matter how hard it is to swallow we must accept the report's conclusion and work to clean up our record,' Kok, a campaigner for women's rights and migrant worker issues, told IPS in an interview. 'We have nearly two million migrant workers in the country and many are really trafficked persons. They live and work in virtual servitude. We are at least a decade late in respecting their human rights.'

'Our awareness and response to this heinous crime is shamefully low,' she added.

Parliamentary opposition leader Lim Kit Siang has asked the government to table a ministerial statement in parliament next week explaining its 'abysmal handling' of the rights of migrant workers and trafficked persons.

'But if the government genuinely feels it is wronged by the U.S. report then it should explain in parliament giving all the details how it was wronged and rebut the U.S. State Department's findings,' Lim told IPS.

'It is not enough to brush aside the report. The inclusion of Malaysia as a Tier 3 offender is a serious matter with repercussions. It must not be taken lightly,' Lim said. 'Our lawmakers will want to know how we fell this low.'

The report titled 'Trafficking in Persons Report 2006' put Malaysia and a dozen other countries like Burma, Iran, North Korea and Syria among other countries in the Tier 3 of 'worst offenders'.

The 236-page report launched by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Washington last week charged Malaysia, which has nearly two million migrant workers both documented and undocumented, with doing little to combat human trafficking.

Rice cited 'disturbing evidence' that prosecution of human trafficking cases had levelled off across the globe. In countries with major human trafficking problems, 'only a couple' of traffickers were brought to justice, she was quoted as saying in the media. 'This cannot and must not be tolerated.'

Reflecting conditions in Malaysia and elsewhere Rice said weak law rendered foreign workers vulnerable to abuse in both private homes and work sites. The report noted that Malaysia had tabled in parliament a tough anti-human trafficking law but, despite that, has 'failed to fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so.'

Malaysia has not punished acts of trafficking, provided adequate shelters and social services to victims, and protected migrant workers from involuntary servitude. The government did not establish a government-run shelter for foreign trafficking victims that it had announced publicly in 2004, the report said.

Without procedures for the identification of victims, the government continued to treat some trafficking victims as illegal immigrants, and arrest, incarcerate, and deport them, the report said, adding, that as a regional economic leader approaching developed nation status Malaysia has the resources and government infrastructure to do far more in addressing the issue of trafficking in persons.

The Malaysian government needs to demonstrate stronger political will to tackle Malaysia's significant forced labour and sex trafficking problems, the report said in a damning lengthy section on Malaysia.

Last year, Malaysia was in the 'Tier 2 watch list' with other countries that are making little significant effort to comply with international standards to protect victims of human trafficking.

"It was a warning," said Agile Fernandez, migrant worker programme coordinator with Tenaganita, a prominent rights group.

Perhaps in anticipation of the Tier 3 listing, Malaysia had rushed through in parliament last month a tough new Anti-Human Trafficking bill that metes out up to 20 years in prison for traffickers, provides shelter for trafficked children and women and treat trafficked persons not as illegal immigrants but as victims needing help and support.

The bill protects victims and severely punishes people who trafficked, harboured or profited from the offence.

Most female trafficked victims are from neighbouring countries such as Indonesia, Thailand, Cambodia and the Philippines and many end up as sex slaves or bonded labour. Malaysia is also a transit centre for these women, who are forced into vice in third countries, especially Europe.

NGOs like Tenaganita are hoping the report would spur the government to improve conditions, rectify shortcomings and get out of the denial syndrome. They lay the blame on corruption. Official corruption is at the core of the problem...it's the evil that is fuelling trafficking here, said Fernandez of Tenaganita.

This is why trafficking is rampant and why prosecution of offenders is few and far, she told IPS. Trafficking syndicates regularly bribe officials to close an eye.

Fernandez also said the problem is compounded by low awareness among the public and officials on human rights of migrant workers and trafficked persons. There is apathy and ignorance. There is a use-and-discard mentality and culture, she said. There are no permanent policies, everything is ad hoc and very reactive.

Opposition lawmakers and rights activists have long argued that a comprehensive law on workers covering every aspect that respects their human rights would help reduce trafficking, exploitation and modern day slave conditions.

The government must find the political will to see that the new anti-trafficking bill (now tabled in parliament) is made a law and strictly enforced, Fernandez said. © 2007 NoticiasFinancieras - IPS - All rights reserved

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Wire

190 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 15, 2007 Friday

Work in progress

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 26LENGTH: 434 words

MALAYSIA's relegation to "Tier 3" of the US State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons report stings on two fronts. First, where it is valid. It is not as though this country's government is turning a blind eye to a very real problem, which has steadily worsened over the five decades of Malaysia's independence in tandem with steady economic development. Where once people fled across borders to escape poverty or persecution in struggling neighbouring countries - the "push" factor - now they end up the victims of international human trafficking rings due to the "pull" of prospective prosperity in a relatively thriving economy.

Just as hundreds of foreign citizens may end up sold into domestic or sexual slavery here, so, too, may Malaysian citizens find themselves in the same predicament in other countries, such as the 19 Malaysian women rescued from brothels in Britain a year ago. Perhaps a million people worldwide are the victims of human trafficking every year, caught in a RM40 billion international criminal network affecting practically all countries, not just the 17 now listed as "Tier 3" nations "not doing enough" against the crime.

But the nationwide outrage evoked by cases such as that of Indian national R. Ganesh, abused to wretched death, galvanises public opinion and official concern, serves as a caution to monitors and enforcement authorities, and accelerates the passage into legislation of ever-more stringent measures against such abuse. All the more so when Ganesh's tragic fate, in particular, drove home the point that the plight of such victims here is not due to official neglect but the tyranny of psychotic individuals.

With the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill now passed by parliament, Malaysia had hoped its Tier 2 ("watch-listed") ranking on this odious roster would be relieved. Instead, with the ink hardly dry on the bill, this country has been relegated further. Hence, the second barb of the State Department's assessment: Where it is not valid. Malaysia is hardly sitting on its hands in this matter. In the past year, policies and procedures with respect to trafficked persons have been clarified, revamped and strengthened. Multilateral systems have been installed involving half-a-dozen ministries as well as the enforcement agencies, judicial and legal services and non-governmental organisations. The political will exists to combat human trafficking, firmly buttressed by public opinion. The US State Department should consider itself advised to address not just the weaknesses it perceives but, more pertinently, what's being done to rectify them.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: EditorialPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

191 of 445 DOCUMENTS

New Straits Times (Malaysia)

June 15, 2007 Friday

US report unfair, says Shahrizat

SECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 484 words

KUALA LUMPUR: The classification of Malaysia as a Tier-3 human trafficking offender by the US government is unfair and unreasonable, Women, Family and Community Development Minister Datuk Seri Shahrizat Abdul Jalil said yesterday.

The annual US State Department report had singled out her ministry for not doing enough to help victims of human trafficking.

"We are very disappointed with the report as it is inaccurate and does not reflect Malaysia's continuous effort in combating human trafficking," Shahrizat said in a press statement.

Shahrizat said the government, especially her ministry, had taken steps to address the issue since 2005.

These measures included drafting the anti-trafficking legislation, training enforcement officers and setting up shelters for trafficking victims.

Shahrizat pointed out that the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill 2007 was passed by parliament in May 24 giving enforcement officials new powers to pursue, prosecute and convict offenders.

The new legislation also provides protection and support for victims of trafficking.

Her ministry is also collaborating with the US embassy in Malaysia in conducting training workshops for law enforcement officers in handling trafficking victims.

The report said that the Malaysian government needed to demonstrate stronger political will to tackle forced labour and sex trafficking problems.

The Tier-3 status means Malaysia may be subject to certain sanctions by the US such as withholding non-humanitarian, non-trade-related foreign assistance.

The sanctions could also result in opposition from the US in terms of assistance from international financial institutions such as the International Monetary Fund and World Bank.

Other countries included in the Tier-3 list were Bahrain, Kuwait, Equatorial Guinea, Oman and Qatar.

The Human Rights Commission of Malaysia (Suhakam) also criticised the report, saying Malaysia's Anti-Trafficking in Persons' legislation was evidence of progress from the highest level of the government in combating human trafficking and protecting human rights.

Suhakam commissioner Datuk N. Siva Subramaniam disagreed with the allegation that there was a weakness in enforcement of the laws concerning the issue.

However, he said, some of the laws had to be amended for greater effectiveness.

"Additionally, we need co-operation from non-governmental organisations, government agencies and other instruments in neighbouring countries to curb this organised trans-national crime."

Siva Subramaniam also called for the ratification of the "United Nations protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons", especially women and children.

The plan should incorporate prevention and awareness programmes, a mechanism to identify, protect, care and support victims, and training for enforcement groups.

"The prevention and awareness programmes must involve the public, refugees and immigrants," he added.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 New Straits Times Press (Malaysia) Berhad
All Rights Reserved

192 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 15, 2007 Friday 5:56 AM GMT

Malaysia aims to enforce anti-human trafficking law by year-end

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 340 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR Malaysia

Malaysia will start enforcing a new law to fight human trafficking later this year, Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar said Friday, as he slammed the U.S. for blacklisting the country for allegedly not doing enough about the problem.

Syed Hamid said Malaysia was disappointed when Washington lumped it together with 15 other countries including Cuba, Myanmar, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Syria in a blacklist in its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

He criticized the U.S. for acting as "investigator, prosecutor and judge," saying the report didn't take into account Malaysia's efforts to fight the crime including a new law that is expected to be passed by parliament this month.

He told reporters he expected it to go into effect before end of the year.

"As far as we are concerned, Malaysia is a country that does not encourage trafficking in persons," he said. "We will have the necessary enforcement to prevent the use of Malaysia as a point of transit and trafficking in persons."

The Star newspaper said the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill carries a penalty of up to 20 years' jail and a fine of up to 500,000 ringgit ($142US,857; euro104,286) for human traffickers, while providing protection to victims.

Foreign ministry officials confirmed the details but couldn't comment further.

In its 2006 report, the U.S. State Department on Tuesday downgraded Malaysia from a watch list to a blacklist "for its failure to show satisfactory progress in combating trafficking in persons."

It cited the Malaysian government's failure to prosecute and punish traffickers, to provide adequate shelters and services to victims, and to protect migrant workers from involuntary servitude.

Malaysia and the other countries on the blacklist face possible sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of about 800,000 people across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

About 80 percent of the victims are female and up to half of them children, and most are seeking to escape poverty.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

193 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 15, 2007 Friday 7:19 PM GMT

Myanmar says US human trafficking report disappointing

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 283 wordsDATELINE: YANGON Myanmar

A senior Myanmar law enforcement official said Friday he was disappointed that the United States described his country as a major human trafficking center, saying the charge was politically motivated.

In an annual global report released Wednesday, the U.S. State Department placed Myanmar in Tier 3, the worst category for human trafficking, saying it had not fully complied with the minimum standards for fighting trafficking and was not making significant efforts to do so.

"The report is politically motivated, unfair and biased. It is very disappointing as the U.S. has deliberately turned a blind eye to our achievements and our determination in the fight against human trafficking," police Col. Sit Aye, head of the department of transnational crime, told The Associated Press.

Myanmar adopted a National Plan of Action in 1997 to fight human trafficking and introduced an anti-human trafficking law in September 2005 that imposes a maximum penalty of death, he said. The law also calls for victims of trafficking to be protected and aided.

"The U.S. report is unjust and very unsatisfactory. The report belittled not only our efforts but also undermined the activities of other agencies working with Myanmar to tackle human trafficking," Sit Aye said.

He said that due to cooperation between Myanmar and neighboring countries, 270 people involved in human trafficking had been arrested and prosecuted between September 2005 and April 2007, while 428 trafficking victims, mostly women, had been rescued.

The U.S. imposes economic and political sanctions against Myanmar's military government because of its poor human rights record and failure to hand over power to a democratically elected government.

LOAD-DATE: June 16, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

194 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Africa News

June 14, 2007 Thursday

South Africa; U.S. Lauds Morocco's Efforts Against Human Trafficking

BYLINE: BuaNewsLENGTH: 233 words

The United States' Department of State has commended Morocco's efforts in complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

In its annual report on the subject released on Tuesday, the department placed Morocco in the Tier 1 group among the countries which comply with the standards of the fight against human trafficking.

It cited, as part of Morocco's efforts in the field, the prosecution of people accused of the trafficking of children and the public awareness campaign to educate Moroccans about the rights of child domestic servants.

It also praised the "National Plan of Action for Children for 2006-2015" worked out by the Moroccan government "to protect children from mistreatment, violence, and exploitation by creating child protection units around the country".

The report noted the dismantling of more than 350 trafficking rings and the progress Morocco made to protect victims of trafficking over the last year, as well as the kingdom's co-operation with international agencies to train officials posted in destination or transit countries on trafficking victim identification and victim sensitivity.

As for immigration, the report said: "The government also continued to collaborate with the governments of Spain and Italy, as well as other EU countries, to prevent the illegal migration and trafficking of sub-Saharan Africans, Asians, and Moroccans to Europe."

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newsletter

195 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 14, 2007 Thursday 8:13 PM GMT

Guyana accuses US of worst forms of human trafficking

LENGTH: 300 wordsDATELINE: GEORGETOWN, June 14 2007

Guyana Thursday accused the United States of double standards over human rights, saying Washington was guilty of the worst forms of people trafficking from Central America.

"We can't manufacture prosecutions and charges to satisfy the US government and if the US is being judged on the same standards as we are being judged, they'd be on tier three, the worst tier," President Bharrat Jagdeo said.

He alleged that hundreds of teenaged girls were being trafficked from Central America into "slavery" in the US, adding that the administration of President George W. Bush was peddling "double standards."

In its annual Trafficking In Persons (TIP) report released on Tuesday, the US State Department praised Guyana for efforts to prevent trafficking in persons and its continued public awareness campaigns.

But the State Department kept the country on the Tier 2 watchlist "for its failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to combat trafficking in persons over the past year, particularly in terms of convicting and sentencing human traffickers for their crimes."

It urged Guyana to "aggressively investigate and arrest suspected traffickers, and make every effort to move their cases through the criminal justice system."

Despite passing a law to combat human trafficking last year, Guyana has so far failed to obtain a single anti-trafficking conviction, the report said.

Six criminal cases were opened against alleged traffickers in 2006: two cases were dismissed, and four are pending, representing a modest increase from 2005, when three prosecutions were initiated.

The annual US report analyzes efforts in about 164 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

Sixteen countries are on its top Tier 3 blacklist of the world's worst offenders.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

196 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 14, 2007 Thursday 7:24 AM GMT

Malaysia vows severe punishment for human trafficking

LENGTH: 288 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, June 14 2007

Malaysian Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi Thursday promised severe punishment for human traffickers after the country's inclusion on a US blacklist of countries engaged in smuggling people.

Malaysia has been placed on Washington's "Tier 3" list of worst offenders, joining Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea and Sudan, but Abdullah said Malaysia was already working to stamp out the practice.

"We are against human trafficking. Certainly, human trafficking is a crime and that has to be stopped," Abdullah told reporters.

A landmark anti-trafficking bill is currently working its way through parliament, the prime minister said. The legislation would introduce a 20-year jail sentence for offenders as well as stiff fines.

The new bill would grant greater powers to the police, immigration and other authorities to pursue, prosecute and convict human traffickers, while better protecting victims.

"The penalty, or the punishment will be severe. We do whatever we can, but because it is not enough ... that is why we decided that the bill has become necessary," he said.

Malaysia, a key US trading partner, was added Tuesday to the blacklist included in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

It failed to show "satisfactory progress" in areas such as punishing acts of trafficking, providing adequate shelters and social services to victims, and protecting migrant workers from involuntary servitude, the report said.

Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar Wednesday acknowledged that under existing law in Malaysia, there is no distinction made between trafficked persons and illegal immigrants.

However, he criticised Malaysia's inclusion on the list and refuted claims it was not doing enough to tackle the problem.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

197 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Australian (Australia)

June 14, 2007 Thursday
All-round Country Edition

Minister raps US over visa criticism

BYLINE: Jamie WalkerSECTION: LOCAL; Pg. 4LENGTH: 503 words

FEDERAL Immigration Minister Kevin Andrews publicly rebuked the US State Department yesterday, describing as "ill-informed" its finding that Australia's temporary skilled migrant program could be linked to illegal labour trafficking.

A furious Mr Andrews said the Government rejected absolutely the call for Australia to devote more resources to investigating allegations that its section 457 visas were being used to exploit foreign workers.

The criticism, though veiled, was contained in the department's latest report on the flourishing international trade in sex slaves and underpaid labourers.

Although it found that Australia had contributed significant resources to combating the problem in Southeast Asia, the US singled out allegations that guest workers were being exploited on 457 visas, which are popular with businesses that are short of skilled domestic labour.

"The Australian Government should devote more resources to addressing allegations of labour trafficking, including in connection with its 457 worker visa program," the US report said.

Describing the comments as puzzling, Mr Andrews's office said last night it was the first concern US authorities had expressed over the visas.

"There is no basis for this recommendation whatsoever," Mr Andrews said. "Unfortunately, the US State Department appears to be ill-informed in respect to the purpose of the 457 visa and the obligations placed on employers who use the scheme."

The ALP seized on the finding last night. Opposition immigration spokesman Tony Burke described it as seriously embarrassing to the Government.

"The United States is one of our closest friends and allies," Mr Burke said. "They don't criticise Australian employment conditions lightly."

In May, the federal Government boosted funding by $85.3million for the 457 visa program, which allows skilled workers to enter the country for a limited time to take jobs that can't be filled locally.

Mr Andrews said all allegations of non-compliance by employers were investigated by his department or the Workplace Ombudsman. In addition, the Government had upgraded penalties for employers who breached the terms of the visas. This extended to employers who failed to pay a minimum salary level or who imported workers to fill unskilled job vacancies.

Despite the findings, Australia is still ranked in the State Department's top tier of countries to comply with US benchmarks to eliminate people-trafficking.

Although Australia was a destination for some women from east Asia and eastern Europe who were trafficked for sex, most had travelled here voluntarily to work in brothels.

Malaysia and the US's Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar were added to the blacklist of countries trafficking in people. Algeria and Guinea were also added to the blacklist of the annual Trafficking in Persons Report. They joined Burma, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela in the dreaded "Tier 3" list as the worst offenders of human-trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

Additional reporting: AFP

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

JOURNAL-CODE: AUS

Copyright 2007 Nationwide News Pty Limited
All Rights Reserved

198 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Latin America - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 14, 2007 Thursday

Caribbean countries placed on US trafficking in persons report

LENGTH: 809 words

Text of report by Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website on 14 June Washington: The United States Department of State has placed four Caribbean Community (Caricom) countries in Tier 2 of its latest report on Trafficking in Persons, with Guyana being placed on the Special Watch List.

The report placed Belize, Jamaica and Suriname in Tier 2, which means that they are "making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards".

But, with Guyana on the Tier 2 Special Watch List, it means that the country will receive "special scrutiny," the State Department said.

The department places each country, included in its annual report, on one of three lists.

"This placement is based more on the extent of government action to combat trafficking, rather than the size of the problem, important though that is," it added.

Governments that fully comply are placed in Tier 1. Those making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in Tier 2. Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards, and are not making significant efforts to do so, are placed in Tier 3.

The State Department said the Special Watch List criteria are considered and, when applicable, Tier 2 countries are placed on the Tier 2 Watch List.

In its report, the State Department said Guyana is "principally a source country for men, women, and children trafficked within the country for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour."

It said most trafficking takes place in remote mining camps in the country's interior, stating that Amerindian girls from the interior also are trafficked to coastal areas for sexual exploitation, and young Amerindian men are exploited under forced labour conditions in timber camps.

The report said, in some instances, victims are abducted, and that Guyanese women and girls are trafficked for sexual exploitation to neighbouring countries, such as Suriname, Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago, Venezuela, Brazil, and the United States.

"The Government of Guyana does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," the State Department said. "However, it is making significant efforts to do so."

It urged the government to "aggressively investigate and arrest suspected traffickers, and make every effort to move their cases through the criminal justice system."

In addition, it called on the Bharrat Jagdeo administration to expand training for judges and magistrates who handle trafficking cases, especially in remote areas, where the bulk of trafficking occurs.

The State Department said Belize is a source, transit, and destination country for women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labour and commercial sexual exploitation.

It added that Central American women and children are trafficked to Belize for prostitution.

The State Department called on the Belize government to take more steps in advancing its anti-trafficking goals, urging that it should also consider increasing penalties for sex trafficking, and increase law enforcement efforts to investigate and prosecute traffickers.

Turning to Jamaica, it said the country is "principally a source country for women and children trafficked within the country for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labour."

A majority of victims are Jamaican women and girls, and increasingly boys, who are trafficked from rural to urban and tourist areas for sexual exploitation, it added.

The report said the Government of Jamaica does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking, but noted that it is "making significant efforts to do so."

The State Department says Suriname is "principally a transit and destination country for women and children trafficked trans-nationally for the purpose of commercial sexual exploitation."

It said Suriname is also a "source country" for underage Surinamese girls, and increasingly boys, trafficked internally for sexual exploitation.

It said foreign girls and women are trafficked from Brazil, the Dominican Republic, Guyana, and Colombia to Suriname for "commercial sexual exploitation," noting that some transit Suriname en route to Europe.

The report added that Chinese nationals transiting Suriname risk debt bondage to migrant smugglers; men are exploited in forced labour and women in commercial sexual exploitation.

It said Haitians, migrating illegally through Suriname, are also vulnerable to forced labour exploitation in the country.

"The government investigated and prosecuted some suspected traffickers, and worked on improving victim assistance," the report said, urging the government to "intensify its efforts to identify, convict, and punish traffickers, including any public officials connected to such activity."

Source: Caribbean Media Corporation news agency website, Bridgetown, in English 1650 gmt 14 Jun 07

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

199 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 14, 2007 Thursday 10:48 AM TST

AIT URGES TAIWAN TO DEAL BETTER WITH HUMAN TRAFFICKINGBYLINE: Chris WangLENGTH: 310 words

(repeat)

Taipei June 13 (CNA) Taiwan's efforts to combat human trafficking have been recognized but it must demonstrate greater political will in dealing with the problem, the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) said Wednesday in a statement after the release of the U.S. State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report.

For 2007, Taiwan is classified as a "Tier 2" country and has been removed from a U.S. watch list because of its significant efforts to eliminate trafficking, the AIT said, adding that the most notable achievements are "the development of Taiwan's first comprehensive plan of action that covers all forms of human trafficking, plus the formation of an inter-ministerial committee to implement the plan in coordination with non-governmental organizations."

It pointed out, however, that trafficking victims should be granted formal protection, including access to justice, in order to obtain compensation from those who have exploited them, while victims should also have the right to work while awaiting the outcome of court cases.

It called for the Council of Labor Affairs (CLA) to stop addressing instances of involuntary servitude with administrative penalties. Instead, it should refer such cases for criminal investigation and possible prosecution. It also said the Taiwan authorities should do more to eliminate the ability of labor brokers and employers to deport workers against their will.

Taiwan was placed on the list of "Tier 1" countries in the 2003 and 2004 reports but was downgraded to "Tier 2" in the 2005 report. In 2006, Taiwan was placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

AIT said it will continue to increase public awareness of the suffering caused by trafficking by working with Taiwan officials and non-government organizations.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

200 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Global Insight

June 14, 2007

GCC Countries Placed on U.S. Trafficking List

BYLINE: Anoushka MarashlianSECTION: In BriefLENGTH: 201 words

The U.S. State Department's 2007 annual report on human trafficking assigns Oman, Bahrain, Kuwait and Qatar Tier Three status for failing to stop human trafficking predominantly of those women and minors employed as domestic labourers. The report criticises the sponsorship laws in Gulf Co-operation Council (GCC) countries, which give employers powers over domestic workers, who are often subjected to abuse at the hands of their employers. Saudi Arabia retained its negative Tier Three Status and was criticised for failing to implement the necessary reforms aimed at offering domestic workers greater protection. The United Arab Emirates also has a serious drug-trafficking problem, although U.A.E. officials are thought to be making more concerted efforts to address this problem, which has exposed it to international scrutiny. The United Arab Emirates was placed on a Tier Two watch list.

Significance: Despite being named and shamed in the 2007 annual report on human trafficking, there is concern that U.S. regional allies such as Saudi Arabia and Bahrain will continue to ignore the findings of the report, confident that the United States lacks the appetite to tackle this cause more forcefully.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Web Publication

201 of 445 DOCUMENTS

IPS - Inter Press Service

June 14, 2007 Thursday

HUMAN RIGHTS: U.S. REPORT LISTS MALAYSIA AS 'WORST OFFENDER'

BYLINE: Baradan Kuppusamy

LENGTH: 1088 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR, Malaysia, June 14 2007

Malaysian politicians have reacted with horror at the United States' decision to include the country on a list of "worst offenders" in the realms of human trafficking, bonded labor, child prostitution and the sex trade.

Other countries on the list include Burma, North Korea and Iran.

Malaysian leaders have lashed back, accusing the U.S. state department of behaving as the uninvited "judge, jury and prosecutor" without just cause. "It's all false, not true. We reject it," Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar said.

But opposition lawmakers and human rights activists who have long campaigned inside and outside the country against human trafficking said the report's conclusions are true and verifiable. "It is a damning report -- it is a major black mark on Malaysia's already tarnished human record. It tells a lot about our treatment of migrant workers and victims of trafficking," said Teresa Kok, an opposition lawmaker.

"No matter how hard it is to swallow, we must accept the report's conclusion and work to clean up our record," said Kok, a campaigner for the rights of women and migrant workers. "We have nearly 2 million migrant workers in the country and many are really trafficked persons. They live and work in virtual servitude. We are at least a decade late in respecting their human rights."

"Our awareness and response to this heinous crime is shamefully low," she added.

Parliamentary opposition leader Lim Kit Siang has asked the government to consider issuing a ministerial statement in parliament next week explaining its "abysmal handling" of the rights of migrant workers and trafficked persons.

"But if the government genuinely feels it is wronged by the U.S. report, then it should explain in parliament, giving all the details how it was wronged, and rebut the U.S. State Department's findings," Lim said.

"It is not enough to brush aside the report. The inclusion of Malaysia as a Tier 3 offender is a serious matter with repercussions. It must not be taken lightly," Lim said. "Our lawmakers will want to know how we fell this low."

The report, titled "Trafficking in Persons Report 2006," put Malaysia and a dozen other countries such as Burma, Iran, North Korea and Syria among other countries in the Tier 3 of "worst offenders."

The 236-page report, which was released by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice in Washington last week, accused the Malaysian government of doing little to combat human trafficking. Nearly 2 million migrant workers, both documented and undocumented, are presently in Malaysia.

Rice cited "disturbing evidence" that prosecution of human trafficking cases had leveled off across the globe. In countries with major human trafficking problems, "only a couple" of traffickers were brought to justice," she was quoted as saying in the media. "This cannot and must not be tolerated."

Reflecting on conditions in Malaysia and elsewhere, Rice said weak laws have rendered foreign workers vulnerable to abuse in both private homes and work sites. The report noted that the Malaysian parliament had introduced a tough anti-human trafficking law to its agenda but that it has nevertheless "failed to fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so."

Malaysia has neither punished acts of trafficking, nor provided adequate shelters and social services to victims, according to the report. Furthermore it has allegedly failed to protect migrant workers from involuntary servitude.

"The government did not establish a government-run shelter for foreign trafficking victims that it had announced publicly in 2004," the report said.

"Without procedures for the identification of victims, the government continued to treat some trafficking victims as illegal immigrants, and arrest, incarcerate and deport them," the report said. As a regional economic leader approaching developed-nation status, Malaysia has the resources and government infrastructure to do far more in addressing the issue of trafficking in persons, it said.

"The Malaysian government needs to demonstrate stronger political will to tackle Malaysia's significant forced-labor and sex-trafficking problems," the report said in a damning lengthy section on Malaysia.

Last year, Malaysia was in the 'Tier 2 watch list' with other countries that are making little significant effort to comply with international standards to protect victims of human trafficking.

"It was a warning," said Agile Fernandez, a migrant worker program coordinator with Tenaganita, a prominent rights group.

Perhaps in anticipation of the Tier 3 listing, Malaysia had rushed through in parliament last month a tough new Anti-Human Trafficking bill that metes out up to 20 years in prison for traffickers, provides shelter for trafficked children and women, and treats trafficked persons not as illegal immigrants but as victims needing help and support.

The bill protects victims and severely punishes the people responsible for trafficking them. People who harbor victims or profit from the offence would also be punished under the proposed law.

Most female trafficked victims are from neighboring countries such as Indonesia, Thailand, Cambodia and the Philippines, and many end up as sex slaves or victims of bonded labor. Malaysia is also a transit center for these women, who are forced into vice trades in third countries, especially countries in Europe.

Members of NGOs such as Tenaganita are hoping the report will spur the government to improve conditions, rectify shortcomings and get out of the "denial syndrome." They lay the blame on corruption. "Official corruption is at the core of the problem ... it's the evil that is fueling trafficking here," Fernandez said.

"This is why trafficking is rampant and why prosecution of offenders is few and far," she added. "Trafficking syndicates regularly bribe officials to close an eye."

Fernandez said the problem is compounded by low awareness among the public and officials regarding the human rights of migrant workers and trafficked persons. "There is apathy and ignorance. There is a use-and-discard mentality and culture," she said. "There are no permanent policies: Everything is ad hoc and very reactive."

Opposition lawmakers and rights activists have long argued that a comprehensive law on workers' human rights would help reduce trafficking, exploitation and modern day slave conditions.

"The government must find the political will to see that the new anti-trafficking bill is made a law and strictly enforced," Fernandez said.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

202 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 14, 2007 Thursday 8:24 AM GMT

Malaysia dismisses U.S. report on human trafficking

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 331 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR June 14

Malaysia dismissed Thursday a U.S. State Department report that lumped the country together with North Korea for dismal records in preventing human trafficking.

"We have already sent a bill to Parliament and the bill contains provision including punishments, which are very severe," Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi told reporters. "We do whatever we can."

The Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill that was tabled to the lower house of Parliament in April carries a maximum jail term of 20 years and a fine of up to 500,000 ringgit ($147,059).

Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar slammed the U.S. report as being one-sided, according to the Star daily.

"I don't know how they can come up with the report. We can't react to something that does not take into account what we are doing," he was quoted as saying.

"We are only answerable to our electorate and we protect the sovereignty of the country. This is not even a report compiled by the United Nations. No single country can act as the investigator, prosecutor and judge against another," he said.

In the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report released Tuesday in Washington, Malaysia's ranking fell from Tier 2 to Tier 3, a bottom ranking that lumped it together with a group of 15 other countries including North Korea, Cuba, Myanmar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Syria.

Being in Tier 3 exposes Malaysia to possible U.S. economic sanctions.

According to the report, Malaysia "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking and is not making significant efforts to do so."

Malaysia's booming economy attracts thousands of migrant workers from Indonesia, Thailand, the Philippines, China and Myanmar but according to the report, they often ended up being "subjected to conditions of forced labor as domestic workers or in agricultural, construction or industrial sectors."

Women who were promised jobs as domestic workers are frequently forced into prostitution instead, the report claims.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

203 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Malaysia General News

June 14, 2007 Thursday

SERIOUS MEASURES TAKEN TO CURB HUMAN TRAFFICKING, SAYS PM

LENGTH: 318 wordsDATELINE: PETALING JAYA June 14

Malaysia has taken serious measures to curb human trafficking, Datuk Seri Abdullah Ahmad Badawi said today.

The prime minister said the government had drafted a Bill on human trafficking that would impose severe penalties on the perpetrators of the crime.

He said the Bill had been sent to Parliament and hoped it would be passed in the next sitting of the Dewan Rakyat.

"Human trafficking is a crime that has to be stopped," he told reporters when asked on a US State Department report listing Malaysia as among offenders of human trafficking.

The "Trafficking in Person Report" gave Malaysia and 16 other countries a Tier-3 status, listing the countries as offenders of human trafficking.

The report said the Malaysian government needs to demonstrate stronger political will to tackle Malaysia's significant forced labour and sex trafficking problems.

Visibly upset over the report, Abdullah said: "I am not sure about the report...I do not intend to make any other statement, all I am saying is that we have sent a bill to parliament.

"We will do whatever we can to curb human trafficking and that is why we decided to have that bill," said Abdullah, who is also Internal Security Minister.

Earlier, Abdullah opened the Kuala Lumpur-OIC Health Ministerial Conference 2007.

Foreign Minister Datuk Seri Syed Hamid Albar said yesterday Malaysia had been moving in the right direction in ensuring the security of foreigners.

The minister said there must be a clear distinction between human trafficking and illegal immigrants.

On Malaysia's move to take the lead in efforts to produce halal vaccines for Islamic countries, Abdullah said Malaysia did not intend to be the leader in the field as other OIC member states are also equally capable.

"We are taking the lead now not because we want to be the leader but because we are well-placed to conduct R&D (research and development) and to promote halal vaccines," he added.

LOAD-DATE: June 17, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

204 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 14, 2007 Thursday

NONGOVERNMENTAL GROUPS KEY IN BATTLE AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 555 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

By Eric Green

USINFO Staff Writer

Many nations are working hand-in-hand with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to combat global trafficking in persons, says Mark Lagon, the State Department's new director of anti-trafficking issues.

Speaking June 13, Lagon said governments that are partners with NGOs have shown concrete gains in the global human trafficking fight, as documented in the State Department's new report on the issue. Lagon praised NGOs as the eyes and ears for monitoring trafficking abuses worldwide.

Lagon briefed representatives from about 90 NGOs on the State Department's report, released June 12. He said Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Peru and Taiwan are striking examples of countries committed to the rule of law and pluralism that are working with NGOs, rather than leaving the work of trafficking victim assistance to NGOs. (See related article.)

The seven nations' cooperation with NGOs is reflected in an improved anti-trafficking effort in 2006 as compared to 2005. The department's report advanced those countries from a Tier 2 watch list that signifies a failure to address trafficking problems to a higher Tier 2 category for a significant commitment against trafficking, said Lagon, whose formal title is director of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons.

NGOs at the briefing included the Washington-based Free the Slaves, which has produced three documentaries concerning labor trafficking in the United States and India. U.S. embassies and consulates worldwide are arranging screenings for foreign audiences of those documentaries, along with several other films that vividly display the evils of trafficking in persons, which has been termed the modern-day equivalent of slavery. (See related article.)

Also represented at the briefing was the Ricky Martin Foundation. The State Department named Martin, who founded the NGO, as one of its "heroes acting to end modern-day slavery" in its 2005 Trafficking in Persons report. The department said the famous singer was lending a powerful voice to vulnerable children who are unable to speak for themselves" and "reaching tens of millions of people around the world." (See related article.)

Another group at the briefing was the Polaris Project, whose success in fighting human trafficking demonstrates the effective partnerships that can be built between NGOs and government. (See related article.)

Lagon told the NGOs that the department's 2007 report is dedicated to Ko Maung, who along with 30 other Burmese, died at sea pursuing a dream of earning enough money to return to Burma and build a house for his children. Lagon said Ko Maung died from hard labor and starvation after being forced to remain at sea for years while being denied pay.

The 2007 report reiterated Lagon's praise for the groups worldwide who heard Ko Maung's voice of agony and are working against those who rely on this despicable trade in 'disposable' humans.

For additional information, see 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report.

More information on U.S. policies to combat human trafficking is available on the State Department Web site.

(USINFO is produced by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

205 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 14, 2007

Nongovernmental Groups Key in Battle Against Human Trafficking; State's Lagon praises partnerships between private groups, governments

BYLINE: Eric Green, USINFO Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 538 words

Washington -- Many nations are working "hand-in-hand" with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to combat global trafficking in persons, says Mark Lagon, the State Department's new director of anti-trafficking issues.

Speaking June 13, Lagon said governments that are partners with NGOs have shown concrete gains in the global human trafficking fight, as documented in the State Department's new report on the issue. Lagon praised NGOs as the "eyes and ears" for monitoring trafficking abuses worldwide.

Lagon briefed representatives from about 90 NGOs on the State Department's report, released June 12. He said Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Peru and Taiwan are "striking examples" of countries committed to the "rule of law" and "pluralism" that are working with NGOs, rather "than leaving the work" of trafficking victim assistance to NGOs. (See related article.)

The seven nations' cooperation with NGOs is reflected in an improved anti-trafficking effort in 2006 as compared to 2005. The department's report advanced those countries from a Tier 2 "watch list" that signifies a failure to address trafficking problems to a higher Tier 2 category for a "significant" commitment against trafficking, said Lagon, whose formal title is director of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons.

NGOs at the briefing included the Washington-based Free the Slaves, which has produced three documentaries concerning labor trafficking in the United States and India. U.S. embassies and consulates worldwide are arranging screenings for foreign audiences of those documentaries, along with several other films that vividly display the evils of trafficking in persons, which has been termed the modern-day equivalent of slavery. (See related article.)

Also represented at the briefing was the Ricky Martin Foundation. The State Department named Martin, who founded the NGO, as one of its "heroes acting to end modern-day slavery" in its 2005 Trafficking in Persons report. The department said the famous singer was "lending a powerful voice to vulnerable children who are unable to speak for themselves" and "reaching tens of millions of people around the world." (See related article.)

Another group at the briefing was the Polaris Project, whose success in fighting human trafficking demonstrates the effective partnerships that can be built between NGOs and government. (See related article.)

Lagon told the NGOs that the department's 2007 report is dedicated to Ko Maung, who along with 30 other Burmese, died at sea pursuing a dream of earning enough money to return to Burma and build a house for his children. Lagon said Ko Maung died from hard labor and starvation after being forced to remain at sea for years while being denied pay.

The 2007 report reiterated Lagon's praise for the groups worldwide who heard Ko Maung's "voice of agony" and are working against those who "rely on this despicable trade in 'disposable' humans."

For additional information, see 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report.

More information on U.S. policies to combat human trafficking is available on the State Department Web site.

(USINFO is produced by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

Copyright 2007 Federal Information and News Dispatch, Inc.

206 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Straits Times (Singapore)

June 14, 2007 Thursday

US human trafficking rating misleading, says KL

BYLINE: Chow Kum Hor, Malaysia Correspondent

SECTION: ASIA - MALAYSIA

LENGTH: 455 words

KUALA LUMPUR - THE Malaysian government yesterday described as 'misleading' a US report which ranks the country among the worst in human smuggling offences.

'We cannot react to something that does not take into account what we have done,' Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar was quoted as saying by the online version of The Star newspaper.

He said Kuala Lumpur had taken adequate steps to protect its migrant workers, and added: 'No single country can act as investigator, prosecutor and judge against another.'

But Datuk Seri Syed Hamid also said Malaysia would not lodge a formal protest with Washington.

Human Resources Minister Fong Chan Onn said Malaysia may have a sizeable migrant worker population, but this does not mean that they are all victims of trafficking.

The United States State Department released its report on Trafficking in Persons on Tuesday.

It lumped Malaysia with countries such as Myanmar, Sudan, North Korea and Iran in the lowest 'Tier 3', which means that these countries 'do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so'.

Last year, Malaysia was in the 'Tier 2 watch list', with other countries that are making significant efforts to comply with international standards to protect victims of human trafficking.

This year, there are 15 other countries in 'Tier 3', four more than last year. Singapore, which was in 'Tier 1' last year, is now listed under 'Tier 2' for 'not fully complying with international standards'.

In the report, US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice called human trafficking a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities.

Datuk Fong told The Straits Times that the Malaysian government was making efforts to fight human trafficking.

Last month, Parliament passed the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill, which sets a jail sentence of up to 20 years and fines of up to RM500,000 ($222S,000) for offenders.

A spokesman for Tenaganita, a local support group for women and migrant workers, was surprised by Malaysia's downgrade.

'I had expected Malaysia to stay in the Tier 2 watch list, but obviously, we are among the worst of the lot,' said Ms Aegile Fernandez, Tenaganita's anti-trafficking in persons programme coordinator.

She told The Straits Times that the government needed to stamp out corruption, alleging that some syndicates were getting away scot-free by bribing officials.

She added that the government has to 'summon the political will' to see that the new law is implemented properly.

Most victims of human trafficking in Malaysia are from neighbouring countries such as Indonesia, Thailand, Cambodia and the Philippines.

Malaysia is the transit centre for these women, who are forced into vice in third countries.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Singapore Press Holdings Limited
All Rights Reserved

207 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 14, 2007 Thursday 9:40 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: NONGOVERNMENTAL GROUPS KEY IN BATTLE AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 631 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Eric Green

USINFO Staff Writer

Many nations are working "hand-in-hand" with nongovernmental organizations (NGOs) to combat global trafficking in persons, says Mark Lagon, the State Department's new director of anti-trafficking issues.

Speaking June 13, Lagon said governments that are partners with NGOs have shown concrete gains in the global human trafficking fight, as documented in the State Department's new report on the issue. Lagon praised NGOs as the "eyes and ears" for monitoring trafficking abuses worldwide.

Lagon briefed representatives from about 90 NGOs on the State Department's report, released June 12. He said Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Jamaica, Peru and Taiwan are "striking examples" of countries committed to the "rule of law" and "pluralism" that are working with NGOs, rather "than leaving the work" of trafficking victim assistance to NGOs. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/xarchives/display.html?p=washfile-english&y=2007&m=June&x=20070605161941bcrcleaw0.5122492>.)

The seven nations' cooperation with NGOs is reflected in an improved anti-trafficking effort in 2006 as compared to 2005. The department's report advanced those countries from a Tier 2 "watch list" that signifies a failure to address trafficking problems to a higher Tier 1 category for a "significant" commitment against trafficking, said Lagon, whose formal title is director of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons.

NGOs at the briefing included the Washington-based Free the Slaves, which has produced three documentaries concerning labor trafficking in the United States and India. U.S. embassies and consulates worldwide are arranging screenings for foreign audiences of those documentaries, along with several other films that vividly display the evils of trafficking in persons, which has been termed the modern-day equivalent of slavery. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/xarchives/display.html?p=washfile-english&y=2007&m=June&x=20070608130830X1eneerg0.3753168>.)

Also represented at the briefing was the Ricky Martin Foundation. The State Department named Martin, who founded the NGO, as one of its "heroes acting to end modern-day slavery" in its 2005 Trafficking in Persons report. The department said the famous singer was "lending a powerful voice to vulnerable children who are unable to speak for themselves" and "reaching tens of millions of people around the world." (See related article: http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking/heroes_of_trafficking.html.)

Another group at the briefing was the Polaris Project, whose success in fighting human trafficking demonstrates the effective partnerships that can be built between NGOs and government. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/xarchives/display.html?p=washfile-english&y=2007&m=June&x=20070611180629adynned0.5134394>.)

Lagon told the NGOs that the department's 2007 report is dedicated to Ko Maung, who along with 30 other Burmese, died at sea pursuing a dream of earning enough money to return to Burma and build a house for his children. Lagon said Ko Maung died from hard labor and starvation after being forced to remain at sea for years while being denied pay.

The 2007 report reiterated Lagon's praise for the groups worldwide who heard Ko Maung's "voice of agony" and are working against those who "rely on this despicable trade in 'disposable' humans."

For additional information, see 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report:
http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking/traffick_report.html.

More information on U.S. policies to combat human trafficking is available on the State Department Web site.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

208 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The West Australian (Perth)

June 14, 2007 Thursday
METRO

US links skill visa to sex slaves

BYLINE: RHIANNA KING; CANBERRASECTION: GENERAL; Pg. 6LENGTH: 406 words

Sexual exploitation, debt bondage and slavery of migrants in Australia was a worrying consequence of the 457 skilled worker scheme, the US State Department claimed yesterday in a report into human trafficking.

The claims have been vehemently denied by Immigration Minister Kevin Andrews, who accused the US of being ill informed of the 457s, a temporary visa used by employers to hire skilled migrants and which the Commonwealth purports to have helped alleviate the skills shortage.

In its 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report, the US State Department ranked Australia as a Tier One country - meaning it fully complied with US minimum standards to eliminate trafficking.

But it said Australia was a destination country for some women from Asia and Eastern Europe, who travelled to Australia to work in both legal and illegal brothels and who were "trafficked for the purpose of commercial and sexual exploitation".

"There were several reports of men and women from India, the Peoples Republic of China and South Korea migrating to Australia temporarily for work whose labour conditions amounted to slavery, debt bondage and involuntary servitude," it read.

"The Australian Government should devote more attention and resources to addressing allegations of labour trafficking, including in connection with its 457 visa program."

According to the report, there were six sex trafficking and two labour trafficking cases before the courts.

Shadow immigration minister Tony Burke said the Government was in denial about 457s, which were continually exploited by some employers.

"The worst thing about these sorts of abuses have been that theyve been legal," he said. "It is seriously embarrassing for Australia to be subjected to the report that has come out today from the US State Department. The US is one of our closest friends and allies. They dont criticise Australian employment conditions lightly."

Labor has been a vocal opponent of the Governments handling of the scheme, claiming it left employees open to serious abuse.

Mr Andrews said the US State Department was ill informed.

"The Australian Government is pleased to have been acknowledged as a leading nation in the battle to eliminate people smuggling, however we reject absolutely the ill-informed comments regarding the temporary skilled 457 visa class," he said.

"The (457 visa) assists employers to fill vacancies in their business and helps ensure that Australias economy remains strong."

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 West Australian Newspapers Limited
All Rights Reserved

209 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 14, 2007 Thursday 12:00 PM ESTMalaysia raps U.S. report on human trafficking*SECTION: WORLD NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 234 wordsDATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR

Malaysia Thursday rapped a U. S. report that classified Malaysia as "Tier 3" in human trafficking, saying it was unfair and unreasonable.

Malaysian Women, Family and Community Development Minister Shahrizat Abdul Jalil strongly criticized the U.S. State Department Trafficking in Persons Report in a statement issued here.

"We are very disappointed with the report as it is inaccurate and does not reflect Malaysia's continuous efforts in combating human trafficking," Shahrizat said.

The Malaysian government has undertaken preparatory steps to address the issue since 2005 involving various ministries and agencies, Shahrizat said.

The Malaysian Parliament passed the Anti-Trafficking in Persons Bill 2007 on May 24 this year to provide law enforcement officials with new powers to pursue, prosecute and convict offenders, she said.

"The new legislation also provides protection and support for trafficked victims," she said.

Shahrizat stressed that her ministry is setting up two shelter homes for trafficked women and children, which are expected to be ready by the end of this month to provide services such as crisis counseling and rehabilitation.

She noted that the Malaysian government views human trafficking as one of the most serious threats to human rights and human security and will continue to take comprehensive measures to combat human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

210 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 14, 2007 Thursday 5:06 AM GMT

Reports: Malaysia rejects US human trafficking blacklist

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 354 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR Malaysia

Malaysia has dismissed as one-sided a U.S. report saying the Malaysian government is not doing enough to fight human trafficking, newspapers reported Thursday.

The Star and the New Straits Times quoted Foreign Minister Syed Hamid Albar as saying the U.S. State Department's report failed to consider the country's efforts to protect foreign workers.

"I don't know how they can come up with that report. We can't react to something that does not take into account what we are doing. It is unfortunate that they pass judgment on us," The Star quoted Syed Hamid as saying.

"No single country can act as the investigator, prosecutor and judge against another," Syed Hamid said in the report.

A ministry spokeswoman reached by phone said she could not confirm the comments. Calls to request an interview with Syed Hamid were not immediately answered.

In its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," the U.S. State Department downgraded Malaysia from a watch list to the blacklist "for its failure to show satisfactory progress in combating trafficking in persons."

The report cited the Malaysian government's failure to prosecute and punish traffickers, to provide adequate shelters and services to victims and to protect its migrant workers from involuntary servitude.

Fifteen other countries were included on the blacklist, which makes them subject to sanctions.

Tenaganita, a local nonprofit organization, agreed that Malaysia did not adequately protect foreign migrants and domestic workers, upon which the country relies heavily for menial work.

"In reality we really haven't done very much. We still have a very far way to go," said Aegile Fernandez, coordinator of Tenaganita's program to combat human trafficking.

"We don't have a good, open, transparent foreign workers bill," she said.

Malaysia tabled a bill to fight human trafficking the country's first on the issue in its parliament in April. The legislature's approval of the bill is considered a formality.

The government has said the bill will make it easier for police, immigration departments and other authorities to pursue, prosecute and convict alleged human traffickers.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

All Rights Reserved

211 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 14, 2007 Thursday 9:15 AM GMT

Malaysia vows to fight human trafficking, dismisses US blacklist

BYLINE: By SEAN YOONG, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 453 words

DATELINE: KUALA LUMPUR Malaysia

Malaysia's leader promised on Thursday to do everything possible to fight human trafficking, after the U.S. blacklisted the country for allegedly not doing enough about the problem.

"Certainly human trafficking is a crime, and that has to be stopped. We will do whatever we can" to halt it, Prime Minister Abdullah Ahmad Badawi told reporters.

Abdullah said that the government has drafted a bill on fighting human trafficking, and that Parliament is debating it. Approval of the bill as a law is considered a formality.

Abdullah said the bill contains provisions "including punishments, which are very severe." He said authorities hope it will reduce any human trafficking in Malaysia.

The government has not released details of proposed punishments, but said the new law would make it easier for police, immigration departments and other authorities to pursue, prosecute and convict alleged human traffickers.

In its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," the U.S. State Department on Tuesday downgraded Malaysia from a watch list to a blacklist "for its failure to show satisfactory progress in combating trafficking in persons."

The report cited the Malaysian government's failure to prosecute and punish traffickers, to provide adequate shelters and services to victims, and to protect migrant workers from involuntary servitude.

Malaysia is among 16 countries on the U.S. list, which subjects them to possible sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of about 800,000 people across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

About 80 percent of the victims are female and up to half of them children, and most are seeking to escape poverty.

Malaysia's Women, Family and Community Development Minister Shahrizat Abdul Jalil said in a statement Thursday that putting Malaysia in the blacklist was "unfair and unreasonable."

"We are very disappointed with the report as it is inaccurate and does not reflect Malaysia's continuous efforts in combating human trafficking," Shahrizat said.

Besides pushing for the new legislation, the ministry expects to open two shelters for trafficked women and children by the end of the month, the statement said.

The ministry, together with the U.S. Embassy in Malaysia, has also run a workshop to train law enforcement officers how to deal with victims of trafficking, it said.

Tenaganita, a local nonprofit organization, agreed that Malaysia did not adequately protect foreign migrants and domestic workers, upon which the country relies heavily for menial work.

"In reality we really haven't done very much. We still have a very far way to go," said Aegile Fernandez, coordinator of Tenaganita's program to combat human trafficking.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

212 of 445 DOCUMENTS

AAP Newsfeed

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 2:00 PM AEST

Fed: Andrews rejects US concerns on 457 visas

SECTION: DOMESTIC NEWS

LENGTH: 409 words

DATELINE: CANBERRA June 13

The federal government today flatly rejected US concerns about labour trafficking through the controversial 457 visa program to import workers to fill skill shortages in Australia.

Immigration Minister Kevin Andrews said the US State Department unfortunately appeared to be ill-informed about the purpose of the 457 visa or the obligations placed on employers using the scheme.

"The Australian government rejects outright a recommendation by the US State Department regarding allegations of labour trafficking in connection with the temporary skilled 457 visa," he said in a statement.

He said there was no basis whatsoever for this recommendation, contained in the US State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report.

In its report on global human trafficking released in the US overnight, the State Department placed Australia in the top tier of nations taking firm action against people trafficking.

But it warned Australia it needed to pay more attention to allegations of labour trafficking under the 457 visa scheme.

Mr Andrews said due to a strong economy and unemployment at a 32-year low, some Australian industries were experiencing a temporary shortage of skilled workers.

He said the 457 temporary skilled visa program assisted employers to fill vacancies with workers from abroad.

"If there is any allegation of an employer not complying with the law these claims can and should be reported to the Workplace Ombudsman. This is exactly the same process that applies to all workplaces," he said.

"The Department of Immigration and Citizenship also investigates any allegations made against employers."

Mr Andrews said the government recently announced stronger penalties for employers who failed to pay minimum salaries or used skilled workers in unskilled jobs.

The government also announced that the Department of Immigration and Citizenship would gain stronger powers to enforce employer compliance with the 457 visa program.

He said the government was pleased to have again been ranked as a tier one country, fully complying with US minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking.

He said the State Department report was generally very positive about Australia's stance on trafficking.

"The Australian government remains committed to combating the insidious crime of trafficking in persons - committing a further $38.3 million in the last budget, bringing funding since 2003 to $58 million," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Australian Associated Press Pty. Ltd.

213 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 1:24 AM GMT

US lumps Middle East allies, Malaysia on trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: P. Parameswaran

LENGTH: 663 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 12 2007

US Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as key trading partner Malaysia were added Tuesday to a Washington blacklist of countries trafficking in people.

Algeria and Guinea were the other additions to the blacklist of the US State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," which analyzed efforts in about 164 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The seven countries, all of whom were on a special watch list last year, join Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela in the dreaded "Tier 3" list as the worst offenders of human trafficking.

Being on the blacklist, they could face sanctions, including the withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such foreign assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for participation by government officials in educational and cultural exchange programs.

Launching the 236-page report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cited "disturbing evidence" that prosecution of human trafficking cases had leveled off across the globe.

In countries with major human trafficking problems, "only a couple" of traffickers were brought to justice," she said. "This cannot and must not be tolerated."

US government research shows 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders, about 80 percent of them women and girls and up to half minors, the State Department said.

The majority of transnational victims are females trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, it said.

The wealthy Middle East nations added to the blacklist this year were largely accused of mistreating foreign workers, which they heavily rely on.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East that aren't lacking resources to make significant progress are on Tier 3, for example Saudi Arabia for the third consecutive year," said Mark Lagon, Rice's senior advisor on the human trafficking problem.

He said weak foreign workers' sponsorship laws in these countries made the guests "vulnerable" to abuse in both private homes and work sites. Some victims who reported abuses were instead "held hostage," sometimes for years, in police centers.

Malaysia was cited for "failure to show satisfactory progress" in areas such as punishing acts of trafficking, providing adequate shelters and social services to victims and protecting migrant workers from involuntary servitude, the report said.

"The Malaysian government needs to demonstrate stronger political will to tackle ... significant forced labor and sex trafficking problems," it said.

India, which has the world's worst human trafficking problem and been on a watch list for the fourth consecutive year with Russia and Mexico, received a specific warning that it could be relegated further to the black list if it failed to contain the problem.

"The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking," Lagon said, warning the Indian government that "reassessment is a distinct possibility."

China, Armenia and South Africa were on the watchlist for the third consecutive year.

Singapore, which had been in the Tier 1 list, was relegated to Tier 2 this year. It "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking," the report said.

The Singaporean parliament was urged to approve proposed amendments that would criminalize prostitution involving minors, extend extra-territorial jurisdiction over Singaporean citizens involved in sexual services from minors overseas, and make promoting child sex tours a criminal offense.

Sri Lanka was placed on the watchlist for "its failure to provide evidence of increasing efforts to address trafficking."

Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Taiwan, Peru and Jamaica made "significant efforts" to combat the trafficking problem and have been removed from the watchlist, officials said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

214 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 13, 2007 Wednesday

US report "raises concerns" over trafficking of North Koreans

LENGTH: 619 words

Text of report in English by South Korean news agency Yonhap

[Updated version: rewording headline, adding more detail; "US Report Raises Concerns About NK Workers Hired Abroad" - Yonhap headline]

WASHINGTON, June 12 (Yonhap) - An annual US report on human trafficking released Tuesday again raised concerns that North Koreans sent to work overseas are subject to harsh conditions and deprived of basic freedoms.

On South Korea, the US pressed the government to better regulate marriage brokers who match foreign women with Korean husbands.

The State Department report, "Trafficking in Persons Report 2007," categorizes countries between Tier 1, meaning governments that fully comply with minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, and Tier 3, for governments that refuse to do so.

South Korea was placed in Tier 1, and North Korea in Tier 3.

The report pointed to a "less common form of trafficking" in North Korea, where women and girls are being lured out of the country by the promise of jobs and freedom.

But the victims are forced into prostitution, marriage, or exploitive labour arrangements once they are in China, which shares North Korea's border, it said.

The North Korean government recruits its citizens to work overseas at foreign firms, and while there is no evidence of force or fraud in the recruitment process, reports indicate that some of them are placed in harsh conditions, it said.

Russia, the Czech Republic, Poland, Romania, Libya, Bulgaria, Saudi Arabia, Angola, Mongolia, Kuwait, Yemen, Iraq and China are believed to be hiring North Korean workers under contract with Pyongyang, according to the report.

North Korea does not recognize trafficking victims and makes no protection or assistance efforts, it said, and the government actually contributes to the problem through the operation of labour prison camps where thousands of people live in "slave-like conditions."

South Korea was cited as a primary source country for the trafficking of women internally and to the US, Japan, Hong Kong, Guam, Australia, New Zealand, Canada and Western Europe. Women from Russia, Uzbekistan, Kazakhstan, China, the Philippines, Thailand and other southeastern Asian countries are trafficked to South Korea, said the report.

South Korean men are a "significant source of demand" for child sex tourism in Southeast Asia and the Pacific Islands, the report pointed out, and while there are laws in place allowing their prosecution, there typically are no legal actions taken against them.

Seoul has increased cooperation with Washington against the sex trafficking of South Korean women to the US, but it fell comparatively short in regulating labour trafficking of foreigners, the report said.

"The South Korean government should take steps to ensure that the new employment placement system of labour recruitment offers greater protection to foreign workers by investigating and prosecuting cases of forced labour among migrant workers," it said.

The report carried a photograph of a South Korean roadside billboard advertising an "international marriage specialist" promising Vietnamese brides who will not run away. The ad shows that women from less developed East Asian nations are presented as commodities, a practice also common in Taiwan, Japan and Malaysia, it said.

The number of international marriages tripled in South Korea in the last five years, most of the brides from Southeast Asia and Mongolia, the report said.

"While South Korea has set up a programme of action to assist foreign brides, there have been fewer actions thus far to curtail or better regulate the activities of exploitative South Korean marriage brokers," it said.

Source: Yonhap news agency, Seoul, in English 1825 gmt 12 Jun 07

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2007 British Broadcasting Corporation
All Rights Reserved

215 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 10:24 PM TST

AIT URGES TAIWAN TO DEAL BETTER WITH HUMAN TRAFFICKINGBYLINE: Chris WangLENGTH: 305 wordsDATELINE: Taipei June 13

Taiwan's efforts to combat human trafficking have been recognized but it must demonstrate greater political will in dealing with the problem, the American Institute in Taiwan (AIT) said Wednesday in a statement after the release of the U.S. State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report.

For 2007, Taiwan is classified as a "Tier 2" country and has been removed from a U.S. watch list because of its significant efforts to eliminate trafficking, the AIT said, adding that the most notable achievements are "the development of Taiwan's first comprehensive plan of action that covers all forms of human trafficking, plus the formation of an inter-ministerial committee to implement the plan in coordination with non-governmental organizations."

It pointed out, however, that trafficking victims should be granted formal protection, including access to justice, in order to obtain compensation from those who have exploited them, while victims should also have the right to work while awaiting the outcome of court cases.

It called for the Council of Labor Affairs (CLA) to stop addressing instances of involuntary servitude with administrative penalties. Instead, it should refer such cases for criminal investigation and possible prosecution. It also said the Taiwan authorities should do more to eliminate the ability of labor brokers and employers to deport workers against their will.

Taiwan was placed on the list of "Tier 1" countries in the 2003 and 2004 reports but was downgraded to "Tier 2" in the 2005 report. In 2006, Taiwan was placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

AIT said it will continue to increase public awareness of the suffering caused by trafficking by working with Taiwan officials and non-government organizations.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

216 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 3:27 PM TST

PREMIER PLEDGES TO STEP UP EFFORTS AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: Y.F. Low

LENGTH: 316 words

DATELINE: Taipei, June 13

Premier Chang Chun-hsiung pledged Wednesday that the government will step up its efforts to combat human trafficking, following the country's removal from a U.S. watch list for the trafficking problem.

Making the remarks during a weekly Cabinet meeting, Chang said the fact that the United States has removed Taiwan from the "Tier 2 Watch List" indicates that the United States has noticed the country's hard work in fighting human trafficking over the past year.

However, Taiwan must not be complacent about the achievement, Chang said, adding that it is the Cabinet's goal in the coming year to continue to work to have Taiwan's ranking upgraded to "Tier 1."

In the Trafficking in Persons Report 2007 released by the U.S. Department of State Tuesday, Taiwan has been reinstated on the list of "Tier 2" countries because while the island's trafficking problems remain daunting, Taiwan authorities showed clear progress in addressing trafficking for both sexual and labor exploitation over the past year.

Taiwan was placed on the list of "Tier 1" countries in the 2003 and 2004 reports but was downgraded to "Tier 2" in the 2005 report.

In the 2006 report, Taiwan was placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Chang instructed the Ministry of the Interior (MOI) to meet with concerned authorities to review and improve the government's measures against human trafficking.

Chang said the MOI should cooperate with the Ministry of Justice to work out a law on the prevention of human trafficking.

Also, to prevent the exploitation of foreign workers, the Council of Labor Affairs should review its policy toward foreign workers, such as the method in which foreign workers are imported into the country, the restrictions faced by foreign workers in changing employers and the penalties for law-breaking employers, Chang said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

217 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Central News Agency - Taiwan

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 12:38 PM TST

TAIWAN REMOVED FROM U.S. WATCH LIST FOR HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: Chieh-yu Lin and Y.F. Low

LENGTH: 613 words

DATELINE: Washington, June 12

The United States has removed Taiwan from a watch list for human trafficking in view of the country's "significant efforts" to tackle the problem over the past year, according to an annual report released Tuesday by the U.S. Department of State.

The Trafficking in Persons Report 2007 places Taiwan on a list of "Tier 2" countries, noting that Taiwan is primarily a destination for men, women and children trafficked for the purposes of forced labor and sexual exploitation.

"While the island's trafficking problems remain daunting, Taiwan authorities over the last year showed clear progress in addressing trafficking for both sexual and labor exploitation," the report says.

However, the report continues, much more remains to be done to bring Taiwan into compliance with the minimum standards, with Taiwan authorities needing to demonstrate greater political will in dealing with the trafficking problem.

The report urges Taiwan to grant victims of trafficking formal protection, including access to justice in order to obtain compensation from their traffickers or exploitative employers and the right to work while awaiting court cases.

It suggests that the Council on Labor Affairs stop addressing acts of involuntary servitude with administrative penalties and instead refer these serious crimes to the appropriate law enforcement authorities for criminal investigation and, if warranted, prosecution.

Also, Taiwan authorities should do more to eliminate the ability of labor brokers and employers to deport workers involuntarily, the report says.

The 2007 report rates 141 countries and regions and places them in three lists, based primarily on the extent of government action to combat trafficking.

While governments that fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking are placed in "Tier 1," governments that are making significant efforts to meet the minimum standards are placed in "Tier 2."

Governments that do not fully comply with the minimum standards and are not making significant efforts to do so are placed in "Tier 3" and may be subject to certain sanctions.

Taiwan was ranked among the list of "Tier 1" countries in the 2003 and 2004 reports but was downgraded to "Tier 2" in the 2005 report.

In the 2006 report, Taiwan was placed on the "Tier 2 Watch List" for not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of human trafficking.

Addressing a news conference on the release of the 2007 report Tuesday, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the Department of State has brought global attention to the problem of human trafficking by making an assessment of the problem annually since 2001.

"Millions more people know about human trafficking today than when the first report was issued in 2001, and we hope that this greater awareness translate into greater prevention," Rice said.

Mark P. Lagon, a senior advisor on trafficking in persons at the Department of States, called a raid in Taiwan last week a "real success story" that demonstrated a "welcome new attitude."

In the case, Taiwan worked closely with U.S. law enforcement authorities to break up a cross-border trafficking ring, arresting 12 people suspected of trafficking women to the United States and other countries where they were exploited in the sex and pornography industry.

Lagon said countries that have established credentials in good governance and rule of law, such as Taiwan, are more likely to move quickly in protecting victims of trafficking and bringing exploiters to justice.

In contrast, China, where there is a lack of rule of law, has resisted joining the international community in upholding universal anti-trafficking standards, he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Central News Agency
All Rights Reserved

218 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Indo-Asian News Service

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 4:00 PM EST

US warns India over 'world's largest human trafficking problem'

BYLINE: Indo-Asian News Service

LENGTH: 873 words

DATELINE: Washington

Washington, June 13 -- The US has warned India to act swiftly on what it called the "world's largest human trafficking problem" involving hundreds of thousands of victims of sexual exploitation and millions of bonded labourers or face sanctions.

An annual US State Department report on human trafficking released by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Tuesday placed India for the fourth year in a row on a "Tier 2 watch list" for showing signs of failing to make improvements in tackling this "modern-day slavery".

India was not downgraded to the worst Tier 3, despite the fact that the world's "largest democracy" has the "world's largest problem of human trafficking," said Mark Lagon, director of Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons briefing media on the 236-page report.

The US, he said, needs to "engage in a very serious dialogue with India" on the South Asian nation's trafficking problem, since the countries are "two serious democracies" with a "developing alliance" in areas ranging from counter-terrorism to civilian nuclear cooperation.

The US-India relationship is such, said Lagon, that the "level of communication between our two governments" can "stand some serious, frank talk about a problem like bonded labour or sex trafficking".

"Tier 2 Watch list should be a warning. Unfortunately, too many major countries on Tier 2 Watch List have ignored this warning, year after year," he said naming China, Russia, Mexico, and South Africa among 31 other countries in this category.

"Tier 2 Watch list is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil. We stand ready to cooperate with these nations and support any efforts they make to end this travesty within their borders," he added.

But Lagon suggested that a dialogue could lead to a reassessment of India. "...what's required is that in the context of our overall diplomacy with them, talking about all sorts of serious issues, great power of politics, counter-terrorism, civilian nuclear cooperation and so on, that this has to have high level emphasis as well as a serious problem, but in modesty.

"You know, the United States is not only in a position to point fingers. We need to say we had our legacy of slavery, we had our legacy of segregation, we had our legacy of discrimination," he said explaining why India had not been downgraded despite its poor record.

"Serious democracies have evolved, but we need to ramp up that effort. With a serious sense on the part of the Indian government that, you know, reassessment is a distinct possibility," Lagon added.

While alleging that the Government of India "does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking", the report acknowledged that "it is making significant efforts to do so".

One of the "heroes" highlighted in the report is Kailash Satyarthi of the Indian NGO Bachpan Bachao Andolan (BBA) who prompted the rescue of 92 Bengali children enslaved in goldsmith and jewellery factories in New Delhi.

Sharing what he called an example that typifies the confluence of officials' complicity in trafficking and indifference in the face of heroism to end modern-day slavery, Lagon related how these children were forced to eat, sleep, and labour in workshops, 10 to a room.

"Dangerous chemicals were used for making gold ornaments in the same rooms that they were kept 24 hours a day. Most of the children were under the age of 14. According to the children, many were physically and sexually abused.

"Just days after this rescue, which didn't result in any arrests in India, the factory owners, managers, and their thugs showed up at BBA's shelter with iron rods, sticks, and bricks. They tried to recapture the children. Shelter staff were injured. When police finally responded, no one was arrested.

"The connections and clout of these traffickers were enough, apparently, to thwart justice," he said suggesting there is no national anti-trafficking effort, no recognition of bonded labour on an official level, and poor efforts against sex trafficking in India.

The report also recalled the services of Vipula Kadri, the founder and national director of Save the Children India, an organisation that works towards preventing the abuse and exploitation of children.

It had brought together representatives from government, law enforcement, civil society, Bollywood celebrities, media, and private industry to raise awareness about trafficking of women and girls into commercial sexual exploitation in India.

The report, mandated by the US Congress, places 24 countries in "Tier 1" - those doing the best job of controlling human trafficking, 75 others including Pakistan and Thailand in an intermediate Tier 2 and 16 countries in the bottom Tier 3.

The report also catalogues US' own trafficking problem, including women and girls who migrate to the US and become prostitutes. An unknown number of US citizens and legal residents are also trafficked within the United States, primarily for sexual servitude and forced labour, the report says but does not assign it a tier rating.

Published by HT Syndication with permission from Indo-Asian News Service.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

219 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Jiji Press Ticker Service

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 9:11 AM JSTU.S. Keeps Japan Off Human Trafficking Watch List*LENGTH: 151 wordsDATELINE: Washington, June 12

The United States has kept Japan off its list of countries requiring special watch for human trafficking records, a U.S. Department of State report showed Tuesday.

Japan was placed on Tier 2, the second highest among the four levels of compliance with the minimum standards for efforts to combat human trafficking, the Trafficking in Persons Report for 2007 said.

"The Government of Japan does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so," the report said.

"Japan showed modest progress in advancing its anti-trafficking reforms over the past year," the report said.

Japan remained off the special watch list for Tier 2 countries for the third straight year after being put on the list in the 2004 report.

The lowest level of Tier 3 listed 16 countries including North Korea, Myanmar and Iran. China was on the Tier 2 Watch List.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

220 of 445 DOCUMENTS

MediaNet Press Release Wire

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 1:30 PM AEST

US State Department Report Recommendation on 457 Visas Rejected

LENGTH: 581 words

The Australian Government rejects outright a recommendation by the US State Department (US State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report) regarding 'allegations of labor trafficking' in connection with the temporary skilled 457 visa.

There is no basis for this recommendation whatsoever.

Unfortunately the US State Department appears to be ill informed in respect to the purpose of the 457 visa and the obligations placed on employers who use the scheme.

Due to a strong economy and unemployment at a 32 year low, some Australian industries are experiencing a temporary shortage of skilled workers.

The 457 temporary skilled visa assists employers to fill vacancies in their business and helps ensure that Australia's economy remains strong.

If there is any allegation of an employer not complying with the law these claims can and should be reported to the Workplace Ombudsman, this is exactly the same process that applies to all workplaces.

The Department of Immigration and Citizenship also investigates any allegations made against employers.

In addition to current arrangements to ensure the integrity of our temporary skilled migration programme, the Australian Government recently announced that stronger penalties will apply to any employer who does not comply with the law. These offences will relate to such matters as failure to pay the minimum salary level and using workers in unskilled jobs.

Skill shortages and record low unemployment across Australia is creating a higher demand for skilled workers to come and work in Australian businesses on a 457 visa.

In response to the increased levels of employees in workplaces on these visas the Australian Government recently announced that the Department of Immigration and Citizenship will be given stronger powers to enforce employer compliance with the 457 visa programme and additional powers for the Workplace Ombudsman.

The Australian Government is pleased to have again been ranked as a 'Tier One' country (US State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report), this means that Australia has been assessed as fully complying with US minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking).

The Report is generally very positive about Australia's stance on trafficking.

The report notes that Australia has strengthened its domestic trafficking laws, increased penalties for trafficking in children, increased penalties for employers exploiting workers in conditions for forced sexual servitude or slavery.

The Australian Government has recently announced funding for two additional Senior Migration Officer (Trafficking) positions to be placed in Beijing and Manila.

These positions will augment the existing position in Bangkok which has a keen focus on vetting the visa caseload for fraud leading to trafficking and provides significant resources to support anti-trafficking efforts throughout Southeast Asia, law enforcement training, victim assistance and prevention of trafficking activities.

The Australian Government remains committed to combating the insidious crime of trafficking in persons - committing a further $38.3 million in the last budget, bringing funding since 2003 to $58 million.

The Australian Government is pleased to have been acknowledged as a leading nation in the battle to eliminate people-smuggling, however we reject absolutely the ill informed comments regarding the temporary skilled 457 visa class.

Media enquiries: Kate Walshe 0421 588 794

SOURCE: Minister for Immigration and Citizenship

NNNN

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

221 of 445 DOCUMENTS

NBC News Transcripts

June 13, 2007 Wednesday

SHOW: Today 7:00 AM EST NBC

State Department releases blacklist of countries not doing enough to stop human trafficking*

ANCHORS: ANN CURRY

LENGTH: 55 words

ANN CURRY, anchor:

The State Department has released a new blacklist of countries that it says have not done enough to stop human trafficking, and on this list, allies of the US in the Middle East, including Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, along with Saudi Arabia. Secretary of State Rice calls human trafficking modern-day slavery.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

DOCUMENT-TYPE: Newscast

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

Copyright 2007 National Broadcasting Co. Inc.
All Rights Reserved

222 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Ottawa Citizen

June 13, 2007 Wednesday
Final EditionUnited States. Mideast allies listed as human traffickers*BYLINE: CanWest News ServiceSECTION: NEWS; Pg. A11LENGTH: 100 words

U.S. Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as key trading partner Malaysia were added yesterday to a Washington blacklist of countries trafficking in people. Algeria and Guinea were the other additions to the blacklist of the U.S. State Department's annual Trafficking in Persons Report, which analysed efforts in about 164 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes. The seven countries, all of which were on a watch list last year, join Burma, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHDOCUMENT-TYPE: NewsPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 Ottawa Citizen, a division of CanWest MediaWorks Publication Inc.
All Rights Reserved

223 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Radio Free Europe

June 13, 2007

World: U.S. Report Decries 'Modern-Day Slavery'

SECTION: NEWS STORIES AND DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 981 words

June 13, 2007 (RFE/RL) -- Seventeen-year-old Maryam traveled from Kazakhstan to Russia to work as a shop assistant. A man paid her parents $300 and forged her passport so she could work.

When she arrived in Russia, armed guards kept Maryam locked in a cell with barred windows, where she was forced to work as a prostitute. Mara, a 30-year-old mother with a husband and two children, left Ukraine to work as a housekeeper in Italy, after employment recruiters had promised her a high salary.

When she arrived, Mara was taken to a brothel owned by a man who said he had purchased her for several hundred dollars. She was beaten if she refused a client.

These are two of the individual stories included in the U.S. State Department's "Trafficking In Persons Report 2007." The report was released in Washington on June 12 by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

"We are helping to lead a global movement, not just to confront this crime, but to abolish it," Rice said. "More and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is -- a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

Fighting Human Trafficking

Human trafficking involves the sale of people across international borders for forced prostitution or labor.

Some 80 percent of trafficking victims are female, and up to half are children.

"Every day, all over the world, people are coerced into bonded labor, bought and sold in prostitution, exploited in domestic servitude, enslaved in agricultural work and in factories, and captured to serve unlawfully as child soldiers," said Ambassador Mark Lagon, the director of the U.S. Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons in presenting the report on June 12.

"Estimates of the number vary widely," he added. "According to U.S. government estimates, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year and about 80 percent of them are female. Up to half are minors."

The State Department's report classifies 164 countries into four categories of compliance with the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000.

The worst category, Tier 3, includes nations that are seen as not complying and not making any significant efforts to do so.

A total of 16 states are listed as Tier-3 countries, including Iran, Uzbekistan, and North Korea. Also joining the worst offenders this year are U.S. allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar. "It's especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East that aren't lacking adequate resources to make significant progress are on Tier 3," Lagon said. "For instance, Saudi Arabia is on Tier 3 for the third year. These are countries in that region that rely extensively on foreign migrant laborers."

Lagon said Tier-3 countries can be sanctioned if they do not take "serious antislavery action" in the next 90 days.

Room For Improvement

Tier-2 states do not fully comply but are seen as making significant efforts to do so, which this year include Afghanistan, Albania, Azerbaijan, Bosnia-Herzegovina, Bulgaria, Croatia, Estonia, Kyrgyzstan, Latvia, Macedonia, Montenegro, Pakistan, Romania, Serbia, Slovakia, Tajikistan, and Turkey.

Many women are lured abroad and forced into prostitution (AFP file photo)A "Tier-2 Watch List" of nations deserve special attention, usually because of poor antitrafficking records for numerous consecutive years. This year, these countries include Armenia, Belarus, China, Kazakhstan, Moldova, Russia, and Ukraine.

"Unfortunately, too many major countries on the Tier-2 Watch List have ignored this warning year after year," Lagon said. "India, Mexico, and Russia are on the Tier-2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year. Armenia, China, and South Africa are on Tier-2 Watch List for a third consecutive year."

Tier-1 countries are seen as fully complying with the U.S. Trafficking Victims Protection Act. In the 2007 report, Tier-1 states include the Czech Republic, Hungary, Lithuania, Poland, Slovenia, and, for the first time, Georgia.

"Georgia's performance is particularly notable, considering it's the only Tier-1 country in a region struggling to strengthen rule of law," Lagon told reporters on June 12. "Georgia has shown an admirable political commitment to confronting human trafficking. Its improvement includes efforts to prevent girls and women from being lured into the global sex trade, where exploiters turn women and girls into mere commodities with their bodies for sale."

U.S. Judged As Well

As for the United States itself, Lagon said the State Department estimates some 14,500 to 17,500 people per year are trafficked across the U.S. border.

So where does the State Department place the United States on its list? Lagon said the United States is "not perfect," but has not been assigned a tier rating. While the United States is not included in the individual country analyses, he said, the State Department report does contain a summary of the United States' record.

"It is very important that the United States be seen as a partner and that we have a problem at home. We are not just standing with our arms folded, judging others, because this is a transnational problem," Lagon said.

"There's serious trafficking in persons into the United States from East Asia, from Latin America, from Europe, and there's trafficking within the United States," he continued. "And we're ready to be judged because we offer our hand as a partner to try and solve this problem of modern-day slavery."

The report says Iraq was in "political transition" during the reporting period and was not included.

Turkmenistan also is not listed because it says available information was insufficient to substantiate a significant number of victims in the country.

Copyright (c) 2006. RFE/RL, Inc. Reprinted with the permission of Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty, 1201 Connecticut Ave., N.W. Washington DC 20036. www.rferl.org

LOAD-DATE: December 27, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

224 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 13, 2007 Wednesday

INDONESIA RECEIVES 'TIER 2' RANKING IN NEW U.S. TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 642 words

DATELINE: JAKARTA, Indonesia

The following information was released by the U.S. Embassy in Jakarta:

Indonesia was classified as Tier 2 in the 2007 U.S. Department of State Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, released in Washington, D.C. on June 12, marking an improvement over Indonesia's Tier 2 Watch List in 2006.

"The 2007 TIP Report for Indonesia credits Indonesia for passing a strong anti-trafficking law, for improvement in law enforcement and for continued good efforts to raise public awareness of the issue," said U.S. Embassy Charge d'Affaires John Heffern, adding, "However, the report also notes the great magnitude of the trafficking problem in Indonesia and some difficult issues which still need to be overcome, including trafficking-related complicity by public officials and the need to provide greater protection to migrant workers at risk of trafficking."

"The fact that Indonesia's status has improved from Tier 2 Watchlist to Tier 2 is testimony to the political will by the Indonesian government to fight human trafficking," Heffern explained. "The U.S. Government will continue to support Indonesia by funding programs to help Indonesia to prevent trafficking, rescue victims, and in law enforcement efforts."

The U.S. Government has provided over $20US million dollars over the past four years to assist Indonesia to fight trafficking.

The TIP Report noted, "The Government of Indonesia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. In April 2007, Indonesia's President signed into law a comprehensive anti-trafficking bill that provides law enforcement authorities the power to investigate all forms of trafficking. The new law incorporates all major elements suggested by civil society and the international community, including definitions of debt bondage, labor exploitation, sexual exploitation, and transnational and internal trafficking. Success will depend on the political will of senior law enforcement officials to use the law and on the quick drafting of the law's implementing regulations."

The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), as amended, requires the Secretary of State to submit this TIP Report by June 1 of each year. The goal of this report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery. Countries determined to have a significant number of trafficking victims are assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the TVPA are classified as Tier 1.

The text of the TVPA and amendments can be found on website www.state.gov/g/tip. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3.

The TVPA also requires the Secretary of State to provide a "Special Watch List" to Congress later in the year. Anti-trafficking efforts of the countries on this list are to be evaluated again in an Interim Assessment that the Secretary of State must provide to Congress by February 1 of each year.

In addition to tracking countries that move up in "tier" ratings -- from 3 to 2 or from 2 to 1 -- the Special Watch List also effectively established a new, fourth tier -- Tier Two Watch List. This tier consists of Tier Two countries determined: (1) not to have made "increasing efforts" over the past year; (2) to have avoided Tier 3 status based on commitments of anti-trafficking reforms over the next year, or (3) to have a very significant number of trafficking victims or a significantly increasing victim population.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

225 of 445 DOCUMENTS

UPI

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 7:57 AM EST

U.S. allies may see sanctions over slavery

LENGTH: 177 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 13

The Bush administration has 16 countries, including six Muslim allies, on its latest blacklist for policy on human trafficking and the slave trade.

In a 236-page report issued Tuesday in Washington by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the administration ranked 164 countries on their performance in combating human trafficking but didn't include its own performance in the review.

Allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar for the first time were given the worst ranking, known as Tier 3, along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia. Saudi Arabia appeared on the Tier 3 list for the third straight year.

The other worst offenders were identified as Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

The countries could face sanctions after a three-month grace period when U.S. President George Bush reviews them individually, the State Department said.

Rice said major improvements had been seen in the seventh annual review in countries such as Georgia, Hungary Slovenia, Israel, Taiwan, Indonesia, Brazil, Bolivia, Peru and Jamaica.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved

226 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 7:02 AM EST

INDONESIA RECEIVES 'TIER 2' RANKING IN NEW U.S. TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 642 words

DATELINE: JAKARTA, Indonesia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

Indonesia was classified as Tier 2 in the 2007 U.S. Department of State Trafficking in Persons (TIP) Report, released in Washington, D.C. on June 12, marking an improvement over Indonesia's Tier 2 Watch List in 2006.

"The 2007 TIP Report for Indonesia credits Indonesia for passing a strong anti-trafficking law, for improvement in law enforcement and for continued good efforts to raise public awareness of the issue," said U.S. Embassy ChargÉ d'Affaires John Heffern, adding, "However, the report also notes the great magnitude of the trafficking problem in Indonesia and some difficult issues which still need to be overcome, including trafficking-related complicity by public officials and the need to provide greater protection to migrant workers at risk of trafficking."

"The fact that Indonesia's status has improved from Tier 2 Watchlist to Tier 2 is testimony to the political will by the Indonesian government to fight human trafficking," Heffern explained. "The U.S. Government will continue to support Indonesia by funding programs to help Indonesia to prevent trafficking, rescue victims, and in law enforcement efforts."

The U.S. Government has provided over $20US million dollars over the past four years to assist Indonesia to fight trafficking.

The TIP Report noted, "The Government of Indonesia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so. In April 2007, Indonesia's President signed into law a comprehensive anti-trafficking bill that provides law enforcement authorities the power to investigate all forms of trafficking. The new law incorporates all major elements suggested by civil society and the international community, including definitions of debt bondage, labor exploitation, sexual exploitation, and transnational and internal trafficking. Success will depend on the political will of senior law enforcement officials to use the law and on the quick drafting of the law's implementing regulations."

The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), as amended, requires the Secretary of State to submit this TIP Report by June 1 of each year. The goal of this report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery. Countries determined to have a significant number of trafficking victims are assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the TVPA are classified as Tier 1.

The text of the TVPA and amendments can be found on website www.state.gov/g/tip. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3.

The TVPA also requires the Secretary of State to provide a "Special Watch List" to Congress later in the year. Anti-trafficking efforts of the countries on this list are to be evaluated again in an Interim Assessment that the Secretary of State must provide to Congress by February 1 of each year.

In addition to tracking countries that move up in "tier" ratings - from 3 to 2 or from 2 to 1 - the Special Watch List also effectively established a new, fourth tier - Tier Two Watch List. This tier consists of Tier Two countries determined: (1) not to have made "increasing efforts" over the past year; (2) to have avoided Tier 3 status based on commitments of anti-trafficking reforms over the next year, or (3) to have a very significant number of trafficking victims or a significantly increasing victim population.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

227 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 2:50 AM EST

NEW ZEALAND 'DEMONSTRATES SUSTAINED EFFORTS TO PREVENT TRAFFICKING'

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 471 words

DATELINE: WELLINGTON, New Zealand

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

An U.S. Department of State's Trafficking in Persons Report has given New Zealand a Tier 1 placing and has acknowledged the New Zealand government's sustained efforts to prevent trafficking. (See attached background on tier levels.) "We hope that the report will prove helpful to everyone working to stop the sexual exploitation of women and children-that is what is designed to accomplish. The report uses assessments of individual nations to illustrate the all-pervasive nature of this global problem," said U.S. Ambassador Bill McCormick.

The narrative of this year's report notes that the New Zealand Government is putting in place a national plan of action to combat trafficking in persons in general and any trafficking of women and children that may occur in New Zealand's decriminalized sex trade in particular.

"We are looking forward to the public discourse about this issue as the New Zealand Government's action plan is rolled out. The report recognizes the importance of the plan to building public understanding and support for the investigative, prevention, and enforcement activities of the government," said Ambassador McCormick.

The report also acknowledges the New Zealand Government's substantial support for organizations working with vulnerable populations, including organizations that work with potential trafficking victims.

For example, it welcomes New Zealand's active participation in many regional and international efforts to prevent, monitor, and control trafficking, including funding protection programs in Indonesia, the Philippines, and the UN Inter-Agency Project (UNIAP) on trafficking in the Mekong sub-region.

"This is a global problem and the only way any of us can make progress is by all of us working together- governments, NGOs and the general public all have a valuable role to play," added the Ambassador.

The entire Trafficking in Persons Report will be available on-line at www.state.gov/g/tip shortly after the Secretary Rice's June 12 release.

BACKGROUND:

The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), requires the Secretary of State to submit this Report each year.

Countries evaluated in this Report are assigned to one of three tiers.

Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking, nor making significant efforts to do so, are classified as Tier 3.

Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards are classified as Tier 2.

Countries assessed as meeting the minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking are classified as Tier 1.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

228 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 1:25 AM EST

NIGERIA REMAINS IN TIER TWO RATING BUT CITED ON EFFORTS TO RAISE AWARENESS ABOUT TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 319 words

DATELINE: ABUJA, Nigeria

The U.S. Diplomatic Mission issued the following press release:

The Sixth annual Department of State Trafficking in Persons Report was released on Tuesday, June 12. Nigeria is categorized in the report as Tier 2, the same as in 2006. The report said Nigeria is making significant efforts, but does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. The report also observed that the Nigerian Agency for the Prohibition of Trafficking in Persons (NAPTIP) continued to host quarterly trafficking stakeholder forums for government, NGO, international organization and donor representatives.

The report also disclosed that the Government of Nigeria demonstrated solid efforts to raise awareness about trafficking during the reporting period, but to improve its response to trafficking, Nigeria should: increase convictions of trafficking offenders; provide improved care for trafficking victims; offer expanded legal alternatives to the removal of foreign victims to countries where they face hardship or retribution; and ensure that the rights of foreign victims are respected.

In 2006, Nigeria developed a national action plan against trafficking, which awaits presidential approval. Follow this link for the full report: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007/82806.htm>.

Nigeria's Esohe Aghatise, Founding Director, Iroko Association was mentioned in the U.S. Department of State's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report as among the heroes trying to end modern day slavery. Activist Esohe Aghatise's NGO provides assistance to women and girls trafficked to Italy from Nigeria. The Iroko Association provides transitional housing and child care, counseling; legal advocacy, immigration and economic assistance, vocational training and employment placement for women and girls trafficked and prosecuted in Italy. Read Full story: <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007/82801.htm>.

LOAD-DATE: July 8, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

229 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 13, 2007 Wednesday 12:55 AM GMT

U.S. adds 7 nations, including Mideast allies, to human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 977 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration has put some crucial Middle East allies on its blacklist of countries that have not stopped trafficking in people, what the administration describes as the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

Countries on the list are subject to sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of 800,000 people, 80 percent of them female and up to half children, across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade in the latest listing, published Tuesday, were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined for the first time perennial offenders like Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat trafficking in people, many of whom are seeking to escape poverty in Eastern Europe or South and Southeast Asia and are sold into the commercial sex trade, manual labor or mistreated as domestics.

Despite seven additions this year, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "more and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice and to say that freedom and security are nonnegotiable demands of human dignity, and to say ... 'No one is fit to be a master, and no one deserves to be a slave,'" she told reporters.

Countries with "Tier 3" ranking "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries that had been placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report. "Tier 2" countries are those that do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The recognition is rare U.S. praise for Zimbabwe, long singled out by Washington for harsh criticism on its overall human rights record, a point noted by Rice's specialist on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

"Our relationship with the government is in a very critical state on other grounds, but the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding, Zimbabwe has actually taken some tangible steps," he said.

Still, such lobbying has had far from a universal effect.

The seven newcomers to "Tier 3" were all demoted from "Tier 2 watch list" status, which now includes 32 countries, including India, Mexico and Russia, that have been cited for poor anti-trafficking records for numerous consecutive years.

Some in Congress lamented that some nations on the watch list have not been demoted to "Tier 3."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency a creeping complacency to park offending countries in the watch list rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms," said New Jersey Republican Rep. Chris Smith.

But Lagon denied the charge.

"The 'Tier 2 watch list' is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil," Lagon said, describing India as "the world's largest democracy (with) the world's largest problem."

Most of this year's additions to "Tier 3" are Muslim or predominantly Muslim nations, many of which have the means to enforce foreign workers' rights and anti-trafficking laws.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East ... are on 'Tier 3'," Lagon said.

Bahrain, the Persian Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernible progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, largely from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuse.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforcing existing laws against human trafficking as well as failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted to "Tier 3" for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and for producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries in this year's report: Algeria, Bahrain, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, Myanmar, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela are regularly accused by Washington of failing to protect human rights and are often cited in State Department reports for their lack of respect for press and religious freedoms.

But Malaysia made its first appearance on "Tier 3" for its failure to protect and identify victims of trafficking, many of them Indonesian domestics.

The report noted with approval Vietnam's high-profile arrest, prosecution and conviction last year of British glam rock star Gary Glitter on charges of committing sexual acts with two underage girls.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

230 of 445 DOCUMENTS

AFX International Focus

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 3:28 PM GMT

US puts Middle East allies on human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 331 words

WASHINGTON (Thomson Financial) - The US' Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as Malaysia were added today to a Washington blacklist of countries trafficking in people, the State Department said.

Algeria and Guinea were the other additions to the blacklist of the State Department's annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report,' which analysed efforts in about 150 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The seven countries, all of which were on a special watch list last year, join Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela in the dreaded 'Tier 3' list as the worst offenders in human trafficking.

Being on the blacklist, they could face sanctions, including withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such foreign assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for participation by government officials in educational and cultural exchange programs.

'Defeating human trafficking is a great moral calling of our day,' Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in the 236-page report.

'Together with our allies and friends, we will continue our efforts to bring this cruel practice to an end,' she said.

US government research shows 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders, about 80 pct of them women and girls and up to half of them minors, the State Department said.

The majority of victims are females trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, it said.

Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were removed from the blacklist this year.

Singapore, which had been in the Tier 1 list, was relegated to Tier 2 this year.

tf.TFN-Europe_newsdesk@thomson.com

cmr

COPYRIGHT

Copyright AFX News Limited 2007. All rights reserved.

The copying, republication or redistribution of AFX News Content, including by framing or similar means, is expressly prohibited without the prior written consent of AFX News.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

231 of 445 DOCUMENTS

AFX.COM

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 3:28 PM GMT

US puts Middle East allies on human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 331 words

WASHINGTON (Thomson Financial) - The US' Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as Malaysia were added today to a Washington blacklist of countries trafficking in people, the State Department said.

Algeria and Guinea were the other additions to the blacklist of the State Department's annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report,' which analysed efforts in about 150 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The seven countries, all of which were on a special watch list last year, join Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela in the dreaded 'Tier 3' list as the worst offenders in human trafficking.

Being on the blacklist, they could face sanctions, including withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such foreign assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for participation by government officials in educational and cultural exchange programs.

'Defeating human trafficking is a great moral calling of our day,' Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in the 236-page report.

'Together with our allies and friends, we will continue our efforts to bring this cruel practice to an end,' she said.

US government research shows 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders, about 80 pct of them women and girls and up to half of them minors, the State Department said.

The majority of victims are females trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, it said.

Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were removed from the blacklist this year.

Singapore, which had been in the Tier 1 list, was relegated to Tier 2 this year.

tf.TFN-Europe_newsdesk@thomson.com

cmr

COPYRIGHT

Copyright AFX News Limited 2007. All rights reserved.

The copying, republication or redistribution of AFX News Content, including by framing or similar means, is expressly prohibited without the prior written consent of AFX News.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 AFX News Limited

232 of 445 DOCUMENTS

AFX - Asia

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 3:13 PM GMT

US puts Middle East allies on human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 331 words

WASHINGTON (Thomson Financial) - The US' Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as Malaysia were added today to a Washington blacklist of countries trafficking in people, the State Department said.

Algeria and Guinea were the other additions to the blacklist of the State Department's annual 'Trafficking in Persons Report,' which analysed efforts in about 150 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The seven countries, all of which were on a special watch list last year, join Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela in the dreaded 'Tier 3' list as the worst offenders in human trafficking.

Being on the blacklist, they could face sanctions, including withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such foreign assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for participation by government officials in educational and cultural exchange programs.

'Defeating human trafficking is a great moral calling of our day,' Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in the 236-page report.

'Together with our allies and friends, we will continue our efforts to bring this cruel practice to an end,' she said.

US government research shows 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders, about 80 pct of them women and girls and up to half of them minors, the State Department said.

The majority of victims are females trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, it said.

Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were removed from the blacklist this year.

Singapore, which had been in the Tier 1 list, was relegated to Tier 2 this year.

tf.TFN-Europe_newsdesk@thomson.com

cmr

COPYRIGHT

Copyright AFX News Limited 2007. All rights reserved.

The copying, republication or redistribution of AFX News Content, including by framing or similar means, is expressly prohibited without the prior written consent of AFX News.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 AFX News Limited

233 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 10:29 PM GMT

US lumps Middle East allies on human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: P. Parameswaran

LENGTH: 648 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 12 2007

US Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as Malaysia were added Tuesday to a Washington blacklist of countries trafficking in people, the State Department said.

Algeria and Guinea were the other additions to the blacklist of the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," which analyzed efforts in about 164 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The seven countries, all of whom were on a special watch list last year, join Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela in the dreaded "Tier 3" list as the worst offenders of human trafficking.

Being on the blacklist, they could face sanctions, including the withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such foreign assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for participation by government officials in educational and cultural exchange programs.

Launching the 236-page report, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice cited "disturbing evidence" that prosecution of human trafficking cases had levelled off across the globe.

In countries with major human trafficking problems, "only a couple" of traffickers were brought to justice, she said. "This cannot and must not be tolerated."

"Human traffickers prey on the most vulnerable members of society -- most often innocent women and children, exploiting and abusing them and profiting from their suffering," she said.

US government research shows 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders, about 80 percent of them women and girls and up to half minors, the State Department said.

The majority of transnational victims are females trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, it said.

The wealthy Middle East nations added to the blacklist this year were largely accused of mistreating foreign workers, which they heavily rely on.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East that aren't lacking resources to make significant progress are on Tier 3, for example Saudi Arabia for the third consecutive year," said Mark Lagon, Rice's senior advisor on the human trafficking problem.

He said weak foreign workers' sponsorship laws in these countries made the guests "vulnerable" to abuse in both private homes and worksites. Some of the victims who reported their abuse were instead "held hostage," sometimes for years, in police centers.

A key trend in trafficking cases, especially those linked to labor and sexual exploitation, is illegal debt, investigations show.

It is "increasingly used to keep people in servitude," Lagon said. "This debt is used by traffickers as an instrument of coercion."

He dismissed suggestions that politics played a part in categorizing nations facing trafficking problems, citing Zimbabwe, which has a blemished human rights record, as an example.

"The facts are that through our prodding, Zimbabwe has taken some tangible steps (to contain human trafficking) and moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2," Lagon said.

India, which has the world's worst human trafficking problem and been on a watchlist for the fourth consecutive year with Russia and Mexico, received a specific warning by the State Department that it could be relegated further to the blacklist if it failed to contain the problem.

"The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking," Lagon said, warning the Indian government that "reassessment is a distinct possibility."

China, Armenia and South Africa were on the watchlist for the third consecutive year.

Singapore, which had been in the Tier 1 list, was relegated to Tier 2 this year.

Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Taiwan, Peru and Jamaica made "significant efforts" to combat the trafficking problem and have been removed from the watchlist, officials said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

234 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Agence France Presse -- English

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 2:04 PM GMT

US lumps Middle East allies in human trafficking blacklist

LENGTH: 281 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 12 2007

US Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as Malaysia were added Tuesday to a Washington blacklist of countries trafficking in people, the State Department said.

Algeria and Guinea were the other additions to the blacklist of the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," which analyzed efforts in about 150 countries to combat trafficking for forced labor, prostitution, military service and other purposes.

The seven countries, all of whom were on a special watch list last year, join Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela in the dreaded "Tier 3" list as the worst offenders of human trafficking.

Being in the blacklist, they could face sanctions, including withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Countries that receive no such foreign assistance would be subject to withholding of funding for participation by government officials in educational and cultural exchange programs.

"Defeating human trafficking is a great moral calling of our day," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in the 236-page report.

"Together with our allies and friends, we will continue our efforts to bring this cruel practice to an end," she said.

US government research shows 800,000 people are trafficked across national borders, about 80 percent of them women and girls and up to half minors, the State Department said.

The majority of transnational victims are females trafficked into commercial sexual exploitation, it said.

Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were removed from the blacklist this year.

Singapore, which had been in the Tier 1 list, was relegated to Tier 2 this year.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

235 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 8:08 PM GMT

U.S. adds 7 nations, including Mideast allies, to human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 970 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist for failing to halt what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

Countries on the list are subject to sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of some 800,000 people, 80 percent of them female and up to half of them children, across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined for the first time perennial offenders like Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat trafficking in people, many of whom are seeking to escape poverty in Eastern Europe, South and Southeast Asia and are sold into the commercial sex trade, manual labor or mistreated as domestics.

Despite the additions, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "more and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice and to say that freedom and security are nonnegotiable demands of human dignity, and to say ... 'No one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave,'" she told reporters.

Countries with "Tier 3" ranking "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries that had been placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report. "Tier 2" countries are those that do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The recognition is rare U.S. praise for Zimbabwe, long singled out by Washington for harsh criticism on its overall human rights record, a point noted by Rice's pointman on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

"Our relationship with the government is in a very critical state on other grounds but the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding, Zimbabwe has actually taken some tangible steps," he said.

Still, such lobbying has had far from a universal effect.

The seven newcomers to "Tier 3" were all demoted from "Tier 2 watchlist" status, which now covers 32 countries, including India, Mexico and Russia, that have been cited for poor anti-trafficking records for numerous consecutive years.

Some in Congress lamented that some nations on the watchlist have not been demoted to "Tier 3."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency a creeping complacency to park offending countries in the watchlist rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms," said New Jersey Republican Rep. Chris Smith.

But Lagon denied the charge.

"The 'Tier 2 watchlist' is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil," Lagon said, describing India as "the world's largest democracy (with) the world's largest problem."

Most of this year's additions to "Tier 3" are Muslim or predominantly Muslim nations, many of which have the means to enforce foreign workers' rights and anti-trafficking laws.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East ... are on 'Tier 3'," Lagon said.

Bahrain, the Persian Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernible progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, largely from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuse.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforcing existing laws against human trafficking as well failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted to "Tier 3" for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and for producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries in this year's report: Algeria, Bahrain, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, Myanmar, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela are regularly accused by Washington of failing to protect human rights and are often cited in State Department reports for their lack of respect for press and religious freedoms.

But Malaysia made its first appearance on "Tier 3" for its failure to protect and identify victims of trafficking, many of them Indonesian domestics.

The report noted with approval Vietnam's high-profile arrest, prosecution and conviction last year of British glam rock star Gary Glitter on charges of committing sexual acts with two underage girls.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

236 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The Associated Press

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 10:42 PM GMT

India left off U.S. blacklist despite 'world's largest problem of human trafficking'

SECTION: BUSINESS NEWSLENGTH: 259 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The United States says that India has the world's largest human trafficking problem.

For the fourth consecutive year, India was warned that it could be added to a blacklist of countries deemed not meeting minimum standards in fighting what the U.S. called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

The report put India and 31 other countries on its "Tier 2 watch list" status, warning that without improvements it could be demoted to a "Tier 3," making it subject to sanctions.

The report cited estimates that tens of millions of Indians were subjected to forced labor and said sex trafficking also continues to be common.

"The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking," said the department's specialist on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

The report said India had taken some steps to deal with sex trafficking, but the government failed to take any significant action against bonded labor. Following the release, the State Department came under criticism for failing to blacklist India for persistently landing on the watch list.

"The TIP reports says India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking," said Republican Rep. Chris Smith. "Yet India remains on the watch list instead of being on Tier 3."

Lagon acknowledged that the broader relationship with the U.S. ally was taken into account.

"I would be perpetuating a fraud to say that we don't look at multiple factors in our relationship with countries any time we take a step on a particular issue like human trafficking," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

237 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Financial Wire

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 10:42 PM GMT

India left off U.S. blacklist despite 'world's largest problem of human trafficking'

SECTION: BUSINESS NEWSLENGTH: 259 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The United States says that India has the world's largest human trafficking problem.

For the fourth consecutive year, India was warned that it could be added to a blacklist of countries deemed not meeting minimum standards in fighting what the U.S. called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

The report put India and 31 other countries on its "Tier 2 watch list" status, warning that without improvements it could be demoted to a "Tier 3," making it subject to sanctions.

The report cited estimates that tens of millions of Indians were subjected to forced labor and said sex trafficking also continues to be common.

"The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking," said the department's specialist on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

The report said India had taken some steps to deal with sex trafficking, but the government failed to take any significant action against bonded labor. Following the release, the State Department came under criticism for failing to blacklist India for persistently landing on the watch list.

"The TIP reports says India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking," said Republican Rep. Chris Smith. "Yet India remains on the watch list instead of being on Tier 3."

Lagon acknowledged that the broader relationship with the U.S. ally was taken into account.

"I would be perpetuating a fraud to say that we don't look at multiple factors in our relationship with countries any time we take a step on a particular issue like human trafficking," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

238 of 445 DOCUMENTS

BBC Monitoring Asia Pacific - Political
Supplied by BBC Worldwide Monitoring

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

US State Department report "raises concerns" over North Korean migrant workers

LENGTH: 274 words

Text of report in English by South Korean news agency Yonhap

["US Report Raises Concerns About NK Workers Hired Abroad" - Yonhap headline]

WASHINGTON, June 12 (Yonhap) - An annual US report on human trafficking released Tuesday again raised concerns that North Koreans sent to work overseas are subject to harsh conditions and deprived of basic freedoms.

On South Korea, the US pressed the government to better regulate marriage brokers who match foreign women with Korean husbands.

Entitled "Trafficking in Persons Report 2007," the US State Department-issued report categorizes countries between Tier 1, meaning governments that fully comply with minimum standards for eliminating trafficking, and Tier 3, for governments who refuse to do so.

South Korea was placed in Tier 1, and North Korea in Tier 3.

The report pointed to a "less common form of trafficking" in North Korea, where women and girls are being lured out of the country by the promise of jobs and freedom.

But the victims are forced into prostitution, marriage, or exploitive labour arrangements once they are in China, which shares North Korea's border, it said.

The North Korean government recruits its citizens to work overseas at foreign firms, and while there is no evidence of force or fraud in the recruitment process, reports indicate that some of them are put into harsh conditions, it said.

Russia, the Czech Republic, Poland, Romania, Libya, Bulgaria, Saudi Arabia, Angola, Mongolia, Kuwait, Yemen, Iraq and China are believed to be hiring North Korean workers under contract with Pyongyang, according to the report.

Source: Yonhap news agency, Seoul, in English 1508 gmt 12 Jun 07

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

239 of 445 DOCUMENTS

CQ Federal Department and Agency Documents
REGULATORY INTELLIGENCE DATA

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

RELEASE OF THE SEVENTH ANNUAL TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORTLENGTH: 4981 wordsCONTACT: 202-647-2492

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It's a pleasure to be here. Thank you, Secretary Rice, and good morning. I'd like to offer an overview of what's in the report and then after a few minutes, welcome your questions. It's an honor to succeed Ambassador John Miller as director of an extraordinary office dedicated to ending a deeply dehumanizing form of exploitation. Human trafficking or trafficking in persons is modern-day slavery.

At the heart of U.S. efforts to end human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity. Every day, all over the world, people are coerced into bonded labor, bought and sold in prostitution, exploited in domestic servitude, enslaved in agricultural work and in factories, and captured to serve unlawfully as child soldiers. Estimates of the number vary widely. According to U.S. Government estimates, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year and about 80 percent of them are female. Up to half are minors.

And these figures do not include millions who are trafficked into labor and sexual slavery within national borders. Stomach-wrenching individual stories, however, tell more than the aggregate numbers and these are the people who motivate everyone active in the movement to abolish human trafficking.

Let me tell you about one victim. At age 22, Ko Maung left Burma with his new bride to find work in a neighboring country. He took a job on a fishing boat for two years because he was promised good money, $70 per month. But that boat stayed at sea for three years and the workers were fed only fish and rice. Not getting enough vitamins, they began to starve. They were denied medical care or passage home. The good job turned out to be a floating death camp. One by one, the men began to perish, including Ko Maung. His body was dumped overboard. So were the exhausted, malnourished bodies of 29 other modern-day slaves.

60 fishermen who survived weren't paid at all. Police refused to prosecute the employer since there are no bodies to prove a crime. In a climate of official indifference with forced labor violations typically not criminalized, desperate, migrant laborers are especially vulnerable to forced fraud and coercion, the fundamental markers of human trafficking. This seventh annual Trafficking In Persons report is dedicated to Ko Maung and to his grieving family.

The structure of the report and the purpose are focused largely on drawing the world's attention on the existence of modern-day slavery and the desperate need to eliminate it in the same way that the world ended the African slave trade more than a century ago. Human trafficking plagues every country in one way or another, including the United States. The report covers 164 countries and territories, comprising some 85 percent of the world. It ranks 151 countries and territories where there have been some 100 cases of human trafficking that were documented. It spells out what countries are doing on prosecution, prevention and protection and what more can be done together between the United States and other countries on all three fronts.

The U.S. Government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations. The process of diplomatic engagement bilaterally to mitigate the problems documented in the report goes on throughout the year, not just in this season that I'm talking to you now. Our sources of information for this report include U.S. Embassies, NGOs worldwide, brave activists fighting human trafficking, foreign law enforcement officers and staff visits. Extensive analysis based on criteria laid out by Congress in the law goes into the assignment of countries into Tier 1, Tier 2, Tier 2 Watch List and Tier 3.

A country falls into Tier 3 if its government is not making a significant effort to combat human trafficking. A Tier 3 country can be sanctioned if it doesn't take seriously antislavery action in the next 90 days. Sadly, this year the list of countries on Tier 3 has grown to -- due to a lack of effort by these governments to combat this serious transnational crime. There are a total of 16 countries on Tier 3, seven of which dropped down to Tier 3 this year: Algeria, Bahrain, Equatorial Guinea, Kuwait, Malaysia, Oman and Qatar.

It's especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East that aren't lacking adequate resources to make significant progress are on Tier 3. For instance, Saudi Arabia is on Tier 3 for the third year. These are countries in that region that rely extensively on foreign migrant laborers. Practices such as sponsorship laws create conditions that make guest workers especially vulnerable to trafficking in the region.

Sponsorship laws give employers extensive personal authority over workers, allowing them to control movement and legal status. These -- there are cases of workers escaping abuse in private homes or work sites. They flee to local police. But if their sponsor denies them an exit permit to leave the country, the exploited workers are effectively held hostage in a shelter or a police detention center, sometimes for years. The power given to sponsors over foreign workers should be limited and counterbalanced with rights for workers to seek legal redress and governments in destination countries should be more active in protecting workers.

Now 32 countries are on the Tier 2 Watch List, the same number as last year. The Tier 2 Watch List should be a warning. Unfortunately, too many major countries on the Tier 2 Watch List have ignored this warning year after year. India, Mexico, and Russia are on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year. Armenia, China, and South Africa are on Tier 2 Watch List for a third consecutive year. For all Tier 3 and Tier 2 Watch List countries, the United States outlines a short-term action plan through which to spur bilateral commitment and specific steps to improve the situation. Tier 2 Watch List is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil. We stand ready to cooperate with these nations and support any efforts they make to end this travesty within their borders.

On a positive note, 10 governments ranked on Tier 2 Watch List last September when the President made final determinations on tier status moved up to Tier 2 on this report: Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Taiwan, Peru, Jamaica, they're among these moving up to Tier 2 based on significant new efforts. Belize moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2 in one year. The Government of Brazil renewed its commitment to confronting slave labor in the Amazon with a number of new measures. The Government of Indonesia enacted a sweeping counter-trafficking law providing protection for all victims including migrant laborers who are fraudulently recruited from overseas work, but fall into trafficking as a trap.

Last week, a raid in Taiwan, a real success story, demonstrated a welcome new attitude. Working closely with U.S. law enforcement, Taiwan broke up a cross-border trafficking ring, arresting 12 people suspected of trafficking women to the United States and other countries where they were exploited in prostitution and pornography. Countries that have established credentials in good governments and rule of law are more likely to move quickly in protecting victims of trafficking and handing down justice to exploiters.

For example, while China resisted joining the international community in upholding universal anti-trafficking standards, given a lack of rule of law, Taiwan's vibrant civil society and democratic character have helped it adopt significant reforms over the past year. On Tier 1, three countries appear for the first time this year: Georgia, Hungary, and Slovenia. Georgia's performance is particularly notable, considering it's the only Tier 1 country in a region struggling to strengthen rule of law. Georgia has shown an admirable political commitment to confronting human trafficking. Its improvement includes efforts to prevent girls and women from being lured into the global sex trade, where exploiters turn women and girls into mere commodities with their bodies for sale.

Young girls and unsuspecting women are often lured or kidnapped or sold into an omnivorous sex industry. The length between prostitution and sex trafficking is indisputable. That's why we must move with more creativity and commitment to deal with the demand for victims. Prostitution is not a victimless crime. It ruins lives from Mexico to Malta, from Tel Aviv to Tokyo, from Albany, New York to Abuja, Nigeria. Sexual servitude is particularly grotesque in human trafficking. The report is interspersed with stories of survivors who have been aided by U.S. programs that demonstrate our commitment to rescue and rehabilitate innocent victims.

Let me tell you briefly about some trends that we see highlighted in the 2007 report. Use of debt, first of all, as a tool of coercion and secondly, stalled progress in strengthening rule of law. First, in both labor and sexual exploitation, illegal or illegitimate debt is increasingly used to keep people in servitude. This debt is used by traffickers as an instrument of coercion. How does this work? People are enticed into fraudulent offers of work abroad that require a steep payment up front for the services of a labor agency arranging the job or a payment that goes straight to the future employer.

To pay the fee, workers often borrow money from relatives and friends or they mortgage property. Sometimes, additional debt is added at the place of employment: inflated fees for supposed costs of room and board or equipment. Sometimes, new, unexpected transportation fees are added. The debt becomes exorbitant on purpose, yet workers are trapped into trying to pay it off for years. This debt is as effective as overt force in keeping them in bondage, yet it's invisible and often overlooked by criminal investigators. In trafficking for prostitution, we're increasingly aware of debt being used to coerce and control victims. Daily fees charged by brothel owners for rent, food, drugs, even condoms create an inescapable financial burden that amounts to debt bondage, a form of human trafficking.

A second trend, second theme; the 2007 TIP report reflects our overall sense that progress on the critical front of rule of law appears to have stalled. Democracy and rule of law are crucial to fighting human trafficking. And fighting trafficking conversely is crucial to the future of democracy worldwide, since trafficking is one of the most brutal ways to silence women, half of humankind worldwide. This lack of progress on rule of law can be traced to official corruption and complicity on the one hand and indifference on the other. These passive and active factors perpetuate abuse despite increased public awareness and despite extraordinary bravery on the part of activists and NGOs around the world.

It hurts my heart to share with you this very recent example that typifies the confluence of officials' complicity in trafficking and indifference in the face of heroism to end modern-day slavery. One of the heroes highlighted in this year's report, Kailash Satyarthi of the Indian NGO Bachpan Bachao Andolan or BBA, prompted the rescue of 92 Bengali children enslaved in goldsmith and jewelry factories in India's capital city of New Delhi. The children were forced to eat, sleep, and labor in workshops, 10 to a room. Dangerous chemicals were used for making gold ornaments in the same rooms that they were kept 24 hours a day. Most of the children were under the age of 14. According to the children, many were physically and sexually abused.

Just days after this rescue which didn't result in any arrests in India, the factory owners, managers, and their thugs showed up at BBA's shelter with iron rods, sticks, and bricks. They tried to recapture the children. Shelter staff were injured. When police finally responded, no one was arrested. The connections and clout of these traffickers were enough, apparently, to thwart justice. India has the world's largest labor trafficking problem with hundreds of thousands of sex trafficking victims and millions of bonded laborers including forced child laborers. In India, there is no national anti-trafficking effort, no recognition of bonded labor on an official level, and poor efforts against sex trafficking. The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking.

The goal of this report is not to punish. It's to stimulate government action in concert with the United States to end modern-day slavery and to celebrate the heroism of those who are working to help spare victims from pain. The report identifies anti-trafficking heroes from around the world and commendable practices. Individuals and local initiatives can make a difference in leading path-breaking efforts to protect victims, increase global awareness, and protect and prosecute criminals. On pages 38-41 of the report, you see some of these inspirational examples, and I'd urge you to read that part of the report carefully.

The United States is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities and to fight against trafficking in persons within our own borders as well. We have a problem at home which we're confronting forcefully, and we're working to be a partner to those abroad, including through substantial and frankly compassionate funding. In fiscal year 2006, we contributed more than $74 million abroad, funding 154 international projects in 70 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, the United States Government has funded more than $448 million to fight human trafficking.

This report is not just an assessment and a judgment about nations, but a blueprint about the sorts of things the United States can help other countries do programmatically. Modern slavery has met with a powerful movement, seeking its abolition in the 21st century, assuming the mantles of William Wilberforce and Josephine Butler.

I want to thank you for your support. Thank you for joining us here; taking the time. By broadcasting this tragic but true story of trafficking in persons, you help prevent a widespread crime against human dignity and help give victims hope for escape. I welcome your questions and I'd ask you when you ask a question, to identify yourself and your media organization.

QUESTION: Anne Gearan from the Associated Press. You mentioned repeat offenders, Saudi Arabia and India, also strategic U.S. allies. Do you think those countries regard their positions with the United States as inviolable, and thus they don't have to take you seriously?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: They shouldn't. We make clear in our high-level dialogues with them that this isn't a tertiary or secondary issue. I was just speaking with the Secretary this morning about how we talked to some of these important partners of ours on some fronts and make sure that we engage in them in diplomacy so that there isn't just a burst of activity after this report comes out on my part, but in fact a regular dialogue through the year with those countries.

Of course, in the case of some that you mention, the problem of trafficking in persons is part of a larger problem of rule of law and a pattern of certain ethnic groups and foreign workers being seen as less than human. This is the crux of the human trafficking problem. When someone -- a woman, a child, someone from another ethnic group or cast -- is seen as not worthy of concern -- they're only a foreign worker, they're only a woman -- that's a horrifying situation. And as part of a larger effort with these countries, we're trying to affect change.

Elise.

QUESTION: Elise Labott with CNN. Just to follow-up on the case of India that's been on the Tier 2 Watch List for four years, could you talk about the decision not to put India on the list this year? It's a quite extensive description of the problem, and you yourself just detailed horrible conditions for up to 65 million bonded laborers in India.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Like many countries that are on the Tier 2 Watch List, there is a very severe problem with human trafficking in India. The more time we spend on this report in modesty, the more we learn about problems of labor trafficking, of bonded labor. And in this report we see reflected more and more detail about an endemic problem in India. We need to engage in a very serious dialogue with India, with them having the sense that they will be reassessed about their tier level and how their record is changing, like all Tier 2 Watch List countries. That includes an offer of partnership because two serious democracies who have a developing alliance. The relationship, the level of communication between our two governments is such that it can stand some serious frank talk about a problem like bonded labor or sex trafficking. And we're going to lay out working with them, a kind of action plan for steps forward on this before the reassessment.

QUESTION: If I can just follow up.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Sure.

QUESTION: Haven't you already done that in the case of India? I mean, haven't you already had an action plan for them and --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: We have. And what's required is that in the context of our overall diplomacy with them, talking about all sorts of serious issues, great power of politics, counterterrorism, civilian nuclear cooperation and so on, that this has to have high level emphasis as well as a serious problem, but in modesty. You know, the United States is not only in a position to point fingers. We need to say we had our legacy of slavery, we had our legacy of segregation, we had our legacy of discrimination. Serious democracies have evolved, but we need to ramp up that effort. With a serious sense on the part of the Indian Government that, you know, reassessment is a distinct possibility.

QUESTION: It's not something that was a political determination.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: No. Look, there are many different variables that are taken into account in everything we do at the State Department. I would be perpetuating a fraud to say that we don't look at multiple factors in our relationship with countries any time we take a step on a particular issue like human trafficking. But look at the report -- Zimbabwe, it has a situation on political opposition being repressed and our relationship with the government in a very critical state on other grounds. But the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding Zimbabwe has taken some tangible steps and it's actually moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2. So there are, you know, efforts, very strong efforts to make an objective assessment based on criteria laid out in the law and I played a small part in the passage of the law in the year 2000 and so I know a little bit about those criteria.

QUESTION: Arshad Mohammed with Reuters. You've pointed out that a number of the new countries in Tier 3 are relatively wealthy near eastern countries, significant oil exporters that do not lack for resources. There are also a number of them U.S. allies -- Kuwait, Oman, Bahrain, Qatar, Algeria. What, to your mind, explains the fact that these countries which were not previously in this lowest category of not even meeting the minimal standards should have slid down this year? And secondly, on Saudi Arabia, it is clearly not very sensitive to the kinds of sanctions that could be imposed in terms of the withholding of certain U.S. assistance or withholding of U.S. support in the international financial institutions. And given that it's been in the lowest category for three years in a row, it's not been too sensitive to the shame factor of being exposed through the report.

Do you wish you had -- and I know you've only been at this a little while, but do you wish you had stronger statutory tools to try to influence behavior, one; and two, can you think of anything else you can do to try to get countries that have been serially in the lowest category to do more?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: That's a great question. I'd say on balance that the tools provided by the Trafficking and Victims Protection Act and our friends on Capitol Hill are quite good. This is a unique example of the human rights reports that we have in different areas generally on countries, the ones on religious freedom and so on, because the tier ranking is much more refined. It's associated with producing action plans for the two lowest rungs for steps that need to be taken, potential sanctions, grace periods for nations to take steps so that they might be either boosted up the scale of tiers or find themselves sliding down. So on balance, it's actually one of the more refined tools that's been given to us in terms of sanctions and reports.

In fact, now for the third time the legislation is going to be reauthorized this year, and I think Capitol Hill will think about refinements, you know, of such things, including, you know, how long states can stay on the Tier Two Watch List among other things.

As far as the region, what we found as a general pattern in this report is an endemic problem of the way foreign workers are treated in the Persian Gulf, in Middle Eastern states. There is a recruitment pattern of people, unsuspecting people who are offered jobs as secretaries, as maids; they end up being sex slaves or put into domestic servitude in an involuntary way. That's seen throughout the region and it seems to be an increasingly acute problem.

Sir.

QUESTION: Yes. Charlie Wolfson from CBS. You mentioned the figure of 800,000 worldwide as an estimate. Do you have an estimate of the number of people trafficked across the U.S. border?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Well, an estimate that we work off is approximately 14,500 to 17,500 per year. I'll say something about statistics. We wish we had better statistics. It would be helpful to know how much of a dent in the problem we're making. But I do think that with the resources that we have to fight the traffickers, to help the victims, we want to make sure that we don't spend a great deal of money on the statistical study when some of those resources could be used to build a victims shelter or to train law enforcement officers in other countries or figure out how to prevent officials in other countries from deciding to get their palms greased in corruption and allow trafficking to occur.

QUESTION: Hi. I'm Libby Leist from NBC. I wanted to ask about Iraq and can you talk a little bit about why it's designated a special case? And also how concerned are you about forced labor inside that country, including at facilities run by the U.S. or projects being built by the United States?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: A serious question and one that we're very seized with. I mean, there are a number of cases in the report that are designated as special cases. They tend to be either a case in which the requisite number of cases of trafficking, 100 cases, haven't been easy to document. And so the government in question isn't rated or it's a case of a government that is facing enormous turbulence, like Liberia last year, Haiti at times. And you know, let's speak the truth about Iraq, there is a very turbulent situation with strife among ethnic groups and caused by terrorists.

While we're pleased that democratic elections have taken place and that rule of law is being slowly rooted into place, you know, it's the conclusion of the U.S. Government that it's -- you know, it should be a special case in terms of rating it. We however are very serious about talking about the problem of trafficking in Iraq.

In a situation in which there is a conflict, open-armed conflict, this is a place where people can be vulnerable. And so when you talk about the actual possibility of trafficking in persons, I'd like to say that, you know, my office has a role I think vested in it by Congress of being a kind of conscience in the U.S. Government about trafficking in persons so that we don't look aside when we have strategic purposes and not look at trafficking in persons.

There were media reports in October of 2005 about questionable labor practices by defense subcontractors. There appeared to be cases of foreign workers who had their passports withheld and were not getting the kind of pay that they'd been promised quickly in February of 2006. And the Defense Department did a study on the ground -- inspector general study -- and shortly thereafter in May 2006 rules were put in place so that only licensed recruiting companies could be used by subcontractors, passports couldn't be taken away and that all workers would be given a signed contract in their own native language and in English.

More recently, there have been allegations about a Kuwaiti company involved in the construction site of the U.S. Embassy in Baghdad. Our office received a number of credible reports in late 2006 and we insisted on the State Department launching through its Office of the Inspector General an examination of this. And we didn't -- rightly didn't play a part in the writing of that report since the Inspector General is independent. With the help of Defense Department investigators, they've looked into indicators of trafficking, we will continue at the office I lead to ask questions about that.

QUESTION: Is that OIG report --

AMBASSADOR LAGON: I'm sorry.

QUESTION: Is that OIG report public?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: It is. Yeah, it's on the website.

Sir.

QUESTION: Lambros Papanтониου, Greek correspondent. Ambassador Lagon, what Greece and Cyprus should be done ready to transfer to Watch List number 1 like the United Kingdom, Poland, Czech Republic, Georgia, Canada, Australia and some other countries of your choice?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: I'm sorry. What?

QUESTION: What Greece and Cyprus should be done to transfer from the list, number two to one?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: What needs to be done?

QUESTION: Mm-hmm.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: The -- in the cases of Greece and Cyprus, they're clearly governments that have substantial rule of law and substantial resources, unlike developing countries. And we intend to continue working with both of them on how to move forward.

As far as Greece goes, its anti-trafficking laws are adequate, but it's -- in particular, its identification of victims of trafficking are rather weak. Shelters are underused. So what we need to do is work on going further and helping Greece actually hold traffickers to account and convict them, and to more systematically identify victims because what we found here at home is that having a victim-centered approach -- so that people are not treated like illegal aliens or criminals, but in fact victims with rights -- as essential.

As far as Cyprus goes, again, there's a pretty strong case that there's capacity on the part of the Government of Cyprus. But there is a big problem of Cyprus being a destination for sex trafficking of Eastern European women. There is a tilt in the anti-trafficking law towards -- focused on sex trafficking but not on death bondage. One thing in the sex trafficking area that would be very helpful is if Cyprus abolished the so-called artiste visa where people come, lured into being dancers -- exotic dancers and you know what that ends up being.

QUESTION: In which category you are placing the United States of America since you told us earlier that is included in this process?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: The United States of America is not perfect, and we haven't assigned it a tier rating. But unlike some other human rights reports, it's actually addressed here. You'll find a summary of the U.S. record along the same lines of what it's doing on protecting victims, preventing trafficking through public awareness and prosecution. Also, annually, the Department of Justice puts out a report on everything that's being done by the United States Government on trafficking in persons. And we in our office try and make sure that the world sees that report.

It is very important that the United States be seen as a partner and that we have a problem at home. We are not just standing with our arms folded, judging others, because this is a transnational problem. There's serious trafficking in persons into the United States from East Asia, from Latin America, from Europe, and there's trafficking within the United States. And we're ready to be judged because we offer our hand as a partner to try and solve this problem of modern-day slavery.

MODERATOR: Okay, this will be the last question.

AMBASSADOR LAGON: Okay.

QUESTION: Kirit Radia with ABC News. I had a question about Syria, to follow up on the Iraq question that Libby asked. Your report talks about sexual exploitation of Iraqis in Syria. How many of those does your office believe are refugees?

AMBASSADOR LAGON: I don't know off the top of my head what the number is. I could get back to you on that. We take seriously the problem of Iraqi refugees and the vulnerability that they have. That's one of the reasons why Under Secretary Dobriansky has led an effort and -- Department of State to deal with Iraqi refugees in concert with the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. But it is indeed possible that those who have fled from Iraq are vulnerable, and it's the responsibility of not just the United States but the international community to deal with that in Syria. The problem in Syria though is that you have some of these endemic issues of how foreign workers are treated and mistreated, plus a particularly closed and insensitive government.

After this session, let me say that Mark Taylor, who heads the section of our office that prepares this report, and Eleanor Gaetan, who is our Senior Coordinator for Public Affairs, will be on hand to provide background on the report; the level of detail if you want to go into it further afterward. And I'd welcome hearing from you over the next few days and weeks because I'm here to help promote public awareness, not just engage in diplomacy.

Thank you for taking the time with me.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

AGENCY: U.S. DEPARTMENT OF STATE

SIC-MAJOR-GROUP: 09 - General Classification

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Other

240 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Federal News Service

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

REMARKS BY SECRETARY OF STATE CONDOLEEZZA RICE AT RELEASE OF THE SEVENTH ANNUAL DEPARTMENT OF STATE TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT FOLLOWED BY A BRIEFING WITH MARK P. LAGON, DIRECTOR, STATE DEPARTMENT'S OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS; LOCATION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING ROOM, WASHINGTON, D.C.

SECTION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING

LENGTH: 5573 words

REMARKS BY SECRETARY OF STATE CONDOLEEZZA RICE AT RELEASE OF THE SEVENTH ANNUAL DEPARTMENT OF STATE TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT FOLLOWED BY A BRIEFING WITH MARK P. LAGON, DIRECTOR, STATE DEPARTMENT'S OFFICE TO MONITOR AND COMBAT TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS LOCATION: STATE DEPARTMENT BRIEFING ROOM, WASHINGTON, D.C. TIME: 10:07 A.M. EDT DATE: TUESDAY, JUNE 12, 2007

SEC. RICE: Thank you all for coming. I'd like to thank Ambassador Mark Lagon, who just 12 days ago assumed his duties as director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons. And it's my pleasure to be here today to release that report.

Human traffickers prey on the most vulnerable members of society -- most often innocent women and children -- exploiting and abusing them, and profiting from their suffering. The president's dedication to defending human dignity and advancing human freedom worldwide is at the center of our foreign policy, and as a result, we have made combating human trafficking a prominent and deeply felt commitment for the United States government.

In my travels, I have noticed a greater desire by our partners to fight this crime and protect its victims. And across the globe, the United States is building new partnerships to rescue and shelter the victims. We are helping to lead a global movement not just to confront this crime, but to abolish it. More and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is -- a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world.

Much of the growing desire to fight this crime is due in no small part to our annual Trafficking in Persons Report.

The report's purpose is to raise awareness, to highlight best practices and to inspire governments to take action against trafficking.

I am pleased that this year's report covers more countries than ever before, 164 in total.

When we first began tackling this issue several years ago, the idea of human trafficking was akin to a global family secret. It was known but not often discussed publicly. I am proud that our office, in just a few short years, has brought global attention to this problem. Millions more people know about human trafficking today than when the first report was issued in 2001, and we hope that this greater awareness translates into greater prevention.

Yet despite some successes, there have also been setbacks. You will see disturbing evidence in this report that prosecutions have leveled off everywhere. In some cases, there are countries with major human trafficking problems, but only a couple of traffickers have been brought to justice. This cannot and must not be tolerated.

Despite these serious concerns, much in this year's report should give us hope. For example, Georgia, Hungary, Slovenia and Israel have all made major improvements, as have Taiwan and countries like Indonesia, Brazil, Bolivia, Peru and Jamaica.

Wherever we encounter human trafficking, the United States stands ready to work with our partners around the world to right this wrong. We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice, and to say that freedom and security are non-negotiable demands of human dignity, and to say, as President Bush has, no one is fit to be a master, and no one deserves to be a slave.

Thank you, and now I'll turn the podium over to Mark, our ambassador at large and the director of the Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons. Mark. And congratulations. Welcome aboard.

MR. LAGON: (Off mike.)

SEC. RICE: Great.

MR. LAGON: It's a pleasure to be here. Thank you, Secretary Rice, and good morning. I'd like to offer an overview of what's in the report and then, after a few minutes, welcome your questions.

It's an honor to succeed Ambassador John Miller as director of an extraordinary office dedicated to ending a deeply dehumanizing form of exploitation. Human trafficking or trafficking in persons is modern-day slavery.

At the heart of U.S. efforts to end human trafficking is a commitment to human dignity. Every day all over the world, people are coerced into bonded labor, bought and sold in prostitution, exploited in domestic servitude, enslaved in agricultural work and in factories and captured to serve unlawfully as child soldiers. Estimates of the number vary widely. According to U.S. government estimates, approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and about 80 percent of them are female; up to half are minors. And these figures do not include millions who are trafficked into labor and sexual slavery within national borders.

Stomach-wrenching individual stories, however, tell more than the aggregate numbers, and these are the people who motivate everyone active in the movement to abolish human trafficking.

Let me tell you about one victim. At age 22, Koman (ph) left Burma with his new bride to find work in a neighboring country. He took a job on a fishing boat for two years because he was promised good money -- $70 per month. But that boat stayed at sea for three years, and the workers were fed only fish and rice. Not getting enough vitamins, they began to starve. They were denied medical care or passage home. The good job turned out to be a floating death camp. One by one, the men began to perish, including Koman (ph). His body was dumped overboard; so were the exhausted, malnourished bodies of 29 other modern-day slaves. Sixty fishermen who survived weren't paid at all. Police refused to prosecute the employer since there were no bodies to prove a crime.

In a climate of official indifference, with forced labor violations typically not criminalized, desperate migrant laborers are especially vulnerable to force, fraud and coercion, the fundamental markers of human trafficking. This seventh annual Trafficking in Persons Report is dedicated to Koman (ph) and to his grieving family.

The structure of the report and the purpose are focused largely on drawing the world's attention on the existence of modern-day slavery and the desperate need to eliminate it in the same way that the world ended the African slave trade more than a century ago. Human trafficking plagues every country in one way or another, including the United States.

The report covers 164 countries and territories, comprising some 85 percent of the world. It ranks 151 countries and territories, where there have been some hundred cases of human trafficking that were documented. It spells out what countries are doing on prosecution, prevention and protection, and what more can be done together between the United States and other countries on all three fronts.

The U.S. government is committed to taking action in cooperation with other nations. The process of diplomatic engagement bilaterally, to mitigate the problems documented in the report, goes on throughout the year, not just in this season that I'm talking to you now. Our sources of information for this report include U.S. embassies, NGOs worldwide, brave activists fighting human trafficking, foreign law enforcement officers and staff visits. Extensive analysis based on criteria laid out by Congress in the law goes into the assignment of countries into tier one, tier two, tier two watch list and tier three.

A country falls into tier three if its government is not making a significant effort to combat human trafficking. A tier three country can be sanctioned if it doesn't take seriously anti-slavery action in the next 90 days. Sadly, this year the list of countries on tier three has grown, due to a lack of effort by these governments to combat this serious transnational crime. There are a total of 16 countries on tier three, seven of which drop down to tier three this year -- Algeria, Bahrain, Equatorial Guinea, Kuwait, Malaysia, Oman and Qatar.

It's especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries, in the Near East, that aren't lacking adequate resources to make significant progress, are on tier three. For instance, Saudi Arabia is on tier three for the third year. These are countries in that region that rely extensively on foreign migrant laborers.

Practices such as sponsorship laws create conditions that make guest workers especially vulnerable to trafficking in the region.

Sponsorship laws give employers extensive personal authority over workers, allowing them to control movement and legal status. There are cases of workers escaping abuse in private homes or work sites; they flee to local police, but if their sponsor denies them an exit permit to leave the country, the exploited worker is effectively held hostage in a shelter or a police detention center, sometimes for years. The power given to sponsors over foreign workers should be limited and counterbalanced with rights for workers to seek legal redress. And governments in destination countries should be more active in protecting workers.

Now, 32 countries are on the Tier 2 Watch List -- the same number as last year. The Tier 2 Watch List should be a warning. Unfortunately, too many major countries on the Tier 2 Watch List have ignored this warning year after year. India, Mexico and Russia are on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year. Armenia, China and South Africa are on Tier 2 Watch List for a third consecutive year.

For all Tier 3 and Tier 2 Watch List countries, the United States outlines a short-term action plan through which to spur bilateral commitment and specific steps to improve the situation. Tier 2 Watch List is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil. We stand ready to cooperate with these nations and support any efforts they make to end this travesty within their borders.

On a positive note, 10 governments ranked on Tier 2 Watch List last September, when the president made final determinations on tier status, moved up to Tier 2 on this report: Bolivia, Brazil, Indonesia, Israel, Taiwan, Peru, Jamaica -- they're among these moving up to Tier 2 based on significant new efforts. Belize moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2 in one year. The government of Brazil renewed its commitment confronting slave labor in the Amazon with a number of new measures. The government of Indonesia enacted a sweeping counter- trafficking law providing protection for all victims, including migrant laborers who are fraudulently recruited from overseas work but fall into trafficking as a trap.

Last week, a raid in Taiwan -- a real success story -- demonstrated a welcome new attitude. Working closely with U.S. law enforcement, Taiwan broke up a cross-border trafficking ring, arresting 12 people suspected of trafficking women to the United States and other countries where they were exploited in prostitution and pornography.

Countries that have established credentials in good governments and rule of law are more likely to move quickly in protecting victims of trafficking and handing down justice to exploiters. For example, while China resisted joining the international community in upholding universal anti-trafficking standards given a lack of rule of law, Taiwan's vibrant civil society and democratic character have helped it adopt significant reforms over the past year.

On Tier 1, three countries appear for the first time this year -- Georgia, Hungary and Slovenia. Georgia's performance is particularly notable considering it's the only Tier 1 country in a region struggling to strengthen rule of law. Georgia has shown admirable political commitment confronting human trafficking. Its improvement includes efforts to prevent girls and women from being lured into the global sex trade where exploiters turn women and girls into mere commodities with their bodies for sale.

Young girls and unsuspecting women are often lured or kidnapped or sold into an omnivorous sex industry. The link between prostitution and sex trafficking is indisputable. That's why we must move with more creativity and commitment to deal with the demand for victims.

Prostitution is not a victimless crime. It ruins lives from Mexico to Malta, from Tel Aviv to Tokyo, from Albany, New York to Abuja, Nigeria. Sexual servitude is particularly grotesque in human trafficking. The report is interspersed with stories of survivors who've been aided by U.S. programs to demonstrate our commitment to rescue and rehabilitate innocent victims.

Let me tell you briefly about some trends that we see highlighted in the 2007 report. Use of debt, first of all, as a tool of coercion and secondly, stalled progress in strengthening rule of law.

First, in both labor and sexual exploitation, illegal or illegitimate debt is increasingly used to keep people in servitude. This debt is used by traffickers as an instrument of coercion. How does this work? People are enticed into fraudulent offers of work abroad that require a steep payment up front for the services of a labor agency arranging the job or a payment that goes straight to the future employer. To pay the fee, workers often borrow money from relatives and friends or they mortgage property.

Sometimes additional debt is added at the place of employment -- inflated fees, supposed costs of room and board or equipment. Sometimes new unexpected transportation fees are added. The debt becomes exorbitant on purpose; yet workers are trapped into trying to pay it off for years. This debt is as effective as overt force in keeping them in bondage; yet it's invisible and often overlooked by criminal investigators.

In trafficking for prostitution, we're increasingly aware of debt being used to coerce and control victims. Daily fees charged by brothel owners for rent, food, drugs, even condoms, create an inescapable financial burden that amounts to debt bondage, a form of human trafficking.

Second trend, second theme: The 2007 TIP Report reflects our overall sense that progress on the critical front of rule of law appears to have stalled. Democracy and rule of law are crucial to fighting human trafficking, and fighting trafficking, conversely, is crucial to the future of democracy worldwide.

Since trafficking is one of the most brutal ways to silence women, half of humankind, worldwide, this lack of progress on rule of law can be traced to official corruption and complicity, on the one hand, and indifference, on the other. These passive and active factors perpetuate abuse, despite increased public awareness and despite extraordinary bravery on the part of activists and NGOs around the world.

It hurts my heart to share with you this very recent example that typifies the confluence of officials' complicity in trafficking and indifference in the face of heroism to end modern-day slavery. One of the heroes highlighted in this year's report, Kailash Satyarthi of the Indian NGO Bachpan Bachao Andolan, or BBA, prompted the rescue of 92 Bengali children enslaved in goldsmith and jewelry factories in India's capital city of New Delhi. The children were forced to eat, sleep and labor in workshops, 10 to a room. Dangerous chemicals were used for making gold ornaments in the same rooms that they were kept 24 hours a day. Most of the children were under the age of 14. According to the children, many were physically and sexually abused.

Just days after this rescue, which didn't result in any arrests in India, the factory owners, managers and their thugs showed up at BBA's shelters with iron rods, sticks and bricks. They tried to recapture the children. Shelter staff were injured. When police finally responded, no one was arrested. The connections and clout of these traffickers were enough, apparently, to thwart justice.

India has the world's largest labor trafficking problem, with hundreds of thousands of sex trafficking victims and millions of bonded laborers, including forced child laborers.

In India there's no national anti-trafficking effort, no recognition of bonded labor on an official level, and poor efforts against sex trafficking. The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking.

The goal of this report is not to punish. It's to stimulate government action, in concert with the United States, to end modern-day slavery and to celebrate the heroism of those who are working to help spare victims from pain. The report identifies anti-trafficking heroes from around the world and commendable practices. Individuals and local initiatives can make a difference in leading path-breaking efforts to protect victims, increase global awareness and protect -- and prosecute criminals.

On pages 38 through 41 of the report, you see some of these inspirational examples. And I'd urge you to read that part of the report carefully.

The United States is deeply committed to fulfilling its responsibilities in the fight against trafficking in persons within our own borders as well. We have a problem at home, which we're confronting forcefully, and we're working to be a partner to those abroad, including through substantial and, frankly, compassionate funding. In fiscal year 2006, we contributed more than $74 million abroad funding 154 international projects in 70 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, the United States government has funded more than $448 million to fight human trafficking. This report is not just an assessment and a judgment about nations, but a blueprint about the sorts of things the United States can help other countries do programmatically.

Modern slavery has met with a powerful movement seeking its abolition in the 21st century, assuming the mantles of William Wilberforce and Josephine Butler. I want to thank you for your support. Thank you for joining us here, taking the time. By broadcasting this tragic but true story of trafficking in persons, you help prevent a widespread crime against human dignity and help give victims hope for escape.

I welcome your questions, and I'd ask you, when you ask a question, to identify yourself and your media organization.

Q I'm Anne Gearan from the Associated Press. You mentioned repeat offenders Saudi Arabia and India, also strategic U.S. allies. Do you think those countries regard their positions with the United States as inviolable and thus they don't have to take you seriously?

MR. LAGON: They shouldn't. We make clear in our high-level dialogues with them that this isn't a tertiary or a secondary issue. I was just speaking with the secretary this morning about how we talk to some of these important partners of ours on some fronts and make sure that we engage in them and diplomacy so that there isn't just a burst of activity after this report comes out on my part, but in fact a regular dialogue through the year with those countries.

Of course, in the case of some that you mention, the problem of trafficking in persons is part of a larger problem of rule of law and a pattern of certain ethnic groups and foreign workers being seen as less than human.

This is the crux of the human trafficking problem, when someone, a woman, a child, someone from another ethnic group or cast is seen as not worthy of concern; they're only a foreign worker, they're only a woman. That's a horrifying situation, and as part of a larger effort with these countries, we're trying to effect change.

Elise.

Q Elise Labott with CNN. Just to follow up on the case of India, it's been on the Tier 2 Watch List for four years. Could you talk about the decision not to put India on the list this year? It's a quite extensive description of the problem, and you yourself just detailed horrible conditions for up to 65 million bonded laborers in India.

MR. LAGON: Like many countries that are on the Tier 2 Watch List, there is a very severe problem with human trafficking in India. The more time we spend on this report in modesty, the more we learn about problems of labor trafficking, of bonded labor. And in this report, we see reflected more and more detail about an endemic problem in India.

We need to engage in a very serious dialogue with India, with them having the sense that they will be reassessed about their tier level and how their record is changing, like all Tier 2 Watch List countries. That includes an offer of partnership as two serious democracies who have a developing alliance. The relationship, the level of communication between our two governments is such that it can stand some serious, frank talk about a problem like bonded labor or sex trafficking, and we're going to lay out, working with them, a kind of action plan for steps forward on this before the reassessment.

Q If I can just follow up.

MR. LAGON: Sure.

Q Haven't you already done that in the case of India? I mean, haven't you already had an action plan for them and --

MR. LAGON: We have. And what's required is that in the context of our overall diplomacy with them, talking about all sorts of serious issues -- Great Power Politics, counterterrorism, civilian nuclear cooperation and so on -- that this has to have high-level emphasis as well as a serious problem, but in modesty. You know, the United States is not only in a position to point fingers. We need to say we had our legacy of slavery, we had our legacy of segregation, we had our legacy of discrimination.

Serious democracies evolve. But we need to ramp up that effort.

With a serious sense on the part of the Indian government, you know, reassessment is a distinct possibility.

Q You're not saying it was a political determination?

MR. LAGON: No. Look, there are many different variables that are taken into account in everything we do at the State Department. I would be perpetuating a fraud to say that we don't look at multiple factors in our relationship with countries anytime we take a step on a particular issue like human trafficking.

But look at the report. Zimbabwe -- it has a situation on political opposition being repressed and our relationship with the government in a very critical state on other grounds. But the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding, Zimbabwe has taken some tangible steps, and it's actually moved up from Tier 3 to Tier 2.

So there are efforts, very strong efforts, to make an objective assessment based on criteria laid out in the law. And I played a small part in the passage of the law in the year 2000, so I know a little bit about those criteria.

Q Arshad Mohammed with Reuters. You pointed out that a number of the new countries in Tier 3 are relatively wealthy Near Eastern countries, significant oil exporters that do not lack for resources. They're also, a number of them, U.S. allies -- Kuwait, Oman, Bahrain, Qatar, Algeria. What, to your mind, explains the fact that these countries, which were not previously in this lowest category of not even meeting the minimal standards, should have slid down this year?

And secondly, on Saudi Arabia, it is clearly not very sensitive to the kinds of sanctions that could be imposed in terms of the withholding of certain U.S. assistance or withholding of U.S. support in the international financial institutions. And given that it's been in the lowest category for three years in a row, it's not been too sensitive to the shame factor of being exposed through the report. Do you wish you had -- I know you've only been at this a little while, but do you wish you had stronger statutory tools to try to influence behavior, one. And two, can you think of anything else you can do to try to get countries that have been serially in the lowest category to do more?

MR. LAGON: That's a great question. I'd say on balance that the tools provided by the trafficking victims protection act by our friends on Capitol Hill are quite good. This is a unique example of the human reports that we have in different areas generally on countries, the ones on religious freedom and so on.

Because the tier ranking is much more refined, it's associated with producing action plans for the two lowest rungs, for steps that need to be taken, potential sanctions, grace periods for nations to take steps, so that they might be either boosted up the scale of tiers or find themselves sliding down.

So on balance it's actually one of the more refined tools that's been given to us in terms of sanctions and reports. In fact, now for the third time, the legislation is going to be reauthorized this year. And I think Capitol Hill will think about refinements, you know, of such things, including, you know, how long states can stay on the tier two watch list, among other things.

As far as the region, what we found as a general pattern in this report is an endemic problem of a way foreign workers are treated in the Persian Gulf, in Middle Eastern states. There's a recruitment pattern of people, unsuspecting people who are offered jobs as secretaries, as maids. They end up being sex slaves or put into domestic servitude in an involuntary way. That's seen throughout the region, and it seems to be an increasingly acute problem.

Q Yes, Charlie Wolfson from CBS.

You mentioned the figure of 800,000 worldwide as an estimate. Do you have an estimate of the number of people trafficked across the U.S. border?

MR. LAGON: Well, an estimate that we work off is approximately 14,500 to 17,500 per year.

I'll say something about statistics. We wish we had better statistics. It would be helpful to know how much of a dent in the problem we're making. But I do think that with the resources that we have to fight the traffickers, to help the victims, we ought to make sure that we don't spend a great deal of money on the statistical study when some of those resources could be used to build a victims shelter or to train law enforcement officers in other countries or figure out how to prevent officials in other countries from deciding to get their palms greased in corruption and allow trafficking to occur.

Q Hi, Libby Leist from NBC.

I wanted to ask about Iraq. And can you talk a little bit about why it's designated a special case? And also, how concerned are you about forced labor inside that country, including at facilities run by the U.S. or projects being built by the United States?

MR. LAGON: A serious question, and one that we're very seized with. I mean, there are a number of cases in the report that are designated as special cases. They tend to be either a case in which the requisite number of cases of trafficking, 100 cases, haven't been easy to document and so the government in question isn't rated, or it's a case of a government that is facing enormous turbulence, like Liberia last year, Haiti at times.

And, you know, let's speak the truth about Iraq. There is a very turbulent situation with strife among ethnic groups and caused by terrorists. While we're pleased that democratic elections have taken place and that rule of law is being slowly rooted into place, it's the conclusion of the U.S. government that it should be a special case in terms of rating it.

We, however, are very serious about talking about the problem of trafficking in Iraq. In a situation in which there is a conflict, open, armed conflict, this is a place where people can be vulnerable. And so when you talk about the actual possibility of trafficking in persons, I'd like to say that my office has a role, I think, vested in it by Congress of being a kind of conscience in the U.S. government about trafficking in persons, so that we don't look aside when we have strategic purposes and not look at trafficking in persons.

There were media reports in October of 2005 about questionable labor practices by defense subcontractors. There appeared to be cases of foreign workers who had their passports withheld and were not getting the kind of pay that they'd been promised. Quickly, in February of 2006, the Defense Department did a study on the ground, an inspector general study, and shortly thereafter, in May 2006, rules were put in place so that only licensed recruiting companies could be used by subcontractors, passports couldn't be taken away, and that all workers would be given a signed contract in their own native language and in English.

More recently there have been allegations about a Kuwaiti company involved in the construction site of the U.S. embassy in Baghdad. Our office received a number of credible reports in late 2006, and we insisted on the State Department launching, through its Office of the Inspector General, an examination of this. And we didn't -- rightly didn't play a part in the writing of that report, since the inspector general is independent. With the help of Defense Department investigators, they've looked into indicators of trafficking. We will continue at the office I lead to ask questions about that.

Q Is that report public?

MR. LAGOS: What's that?

Q Is that OIG report public?

MR. LAGOS: It is, yeah. It's on the website.

Sir?

Q Lambros Papantoniou, Greek correspondent. Ambassador Lagon, what Greece and Cyprus should be done in order to transfer to watch list number one, like the United Kingdom, Poland, Czech Republic, Georgia, Canada, Australia and some other countries of your choice?

MR. LAGON: I'm sorry. What --

Q What -- Greece and Cyprus -- should be done to transfer them from the list number two to one?

MR. LAGON: What needs to be done?

Q Mm-hmm. (Affirmative.)

MR. LAGON: The --

Q (Off mike.)

MR. LAGON: In the case of Greece and Cyprus, they're clearly governments that have substantial rule of law and substantial resources, unlike developing countries, and we intend to continue working with both of them on how to move forward.

As far as Greece goes, its anti-trafficking laws are adequate, but its -- in particular its identification of victims of trafficking are rather weak. Shelters are underused. So what we need to do is work on going further in helping Greece actually hold traffickers to account and convict them and to more systematically identify victims, because what we've found here at home is that having a victim-centered approach, so that people are not treated like illegal aliens or criminals but in fact victims with rights, is essential.

As far as Cyprus goes, again, there's a pretty strong case that there's capacity on the part of the government of Cyprus, but there is a big problem of Cyprus being a destination for sex trafficking of Eastern European women. There is a tilt in the anti-trafficking law towards focus on sex trafficking but not on death bondage.

One thing in the sex trafficking area that would be very helpful is if Cyprus abolished the so-called "artiste" visa, where people come, are lured into being dancers, exotic dancers, and you know what that ends up being.

Q In which category you are placing the United States of America, since you told us earlier that it is included in this process?

MR. LAGON: The United States of America is not perfect, and we haven't assigned it a tier rating. But unlike some other human rights reports, it's actually addressed here. You'll find a summary of the U.S. record along the same lines of what it's doing on protecting victims, preventing trafficking through public awareness and prosecution.

Also, annually the Department of Justice puts out a report on everything that's being done by the United States government on trafficking in persons, and we in our office try and make sure that the world sees that report. It is very important that the United States be seen as a partner and that we have a problem at home; we are not just standing with our arms folded judging others, because this is a transnational problem. There's serious trafficking in persons into the United States from East Asia, from Latin America, from Europe, and there's trafficking within the United States.

And we're ready to be judged, because we offer our hand as a partner to try and solve this problem of modern-day slavery.

MR. : This will be the last question.

MR. LAGON: Okay.

Q Kirit Radia with ABC News. I had a question about Syria, to follow up on the Iraq question that Libby asked. Your report talks about sexual exploitation of Iraqis in Syria. How many of those does your office believe are refugees?

MR. LAGON: I don't know off the top of my head what the number is. I could get back to you on that.

We take seriously the problem of Iraqi refugees and the vulnerability that they have. That's one of the reasons why Undersecretary Dobriansky has led an effort in the Department of State to deal with Iraqi refugees, in concert with the U.N. high commissioner for Refugees. But it is indeed possible that those who have fled from Iraq are vulnerable, and that the responsibility is not just the United States but the international community to deal with that in Syria. The problem in Syria, though, is that you have some of these endemic issues of how foreign workers are treated and mistreated, plus a particularly closed and insensitive government.

After this session, let me say that Mark Taylor, who heads the section of our office that prepares this report, and Eleanor Gaetan, who is our senior coordinator for Public Affairs, will be on hand to provide background on the report, a level of detail, if you want to go into it further afterwards. And I'd welcome hearing from you over the next few days and weeks. Because I'm here to help promote public awareness, not just engage in diplomacy. Thank you for taking the time with me.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Transcript

241 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Japan Economic Newswire

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 7:47 PM GMT

U.S. raps N. Korea, China in human trafficking report

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 375 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON June 12

The United States again criticized North Korea and China for their inaction in the face of human trafficking within and across their borders in an annual report released Tuesday.

Washington also added Malaysia to the Tier 3 category of the State Department's seventh annual Trafficking in Persons Report, a classification reserved for countries with the worst human trafficking records.

"More and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is -- a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice told reporters upon the release of the report, which covers about 150 nations.

In its third year as a Tier 2 country, Japan also received criticism for its ongoing trafficking of men, women and children for commercial sexual exploitation. Despite Tokyo's continued efforts to tackle anti-trafficking, the report said "progress appeared to slow" over the past year.

North Korea made no strides out of its Tier 3 category. The report criticized Pyongyang for providing labor overseas, under which North Korean workers are placed "in harsh conditions," and for not acknowledging that trafficking exists.

China remained on the Tier 2 Watch List, the second worst classification. Criticism of the country in the report also stemmed in part from the treatment of North Korean refugees who have crossed over into China.

Domestic trafficking remains the most significant problem in China, with an estimated minimum of 10,000 to 20,000 people trafficked within China each year, of whom 90 percent are women and children, according to the report.

Malaysia joined for the first time regularly blacklisted nations like North Korea along with Cuba, Iran, Myanmar and Syria for failing to protect and identify victims of trafficking, many of whom are Indonesian domestics.

"The Malaysian government needs to demonstrate stronger political will to tackle Malaysia's significant forced labor and sex trafficking problems," the report said.

The Tier 3 classification, in which North Korea finds itself, covers countries that make no attempt to address human trafficking and are subject to U.S. sanctions. Tier 2 Watch List nations such as China are considered very close to Tier 3 states.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

242 of 445 DOCUMENTS

PR Newswire US

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 4:49 PM GMT

Smith Warns of Creeping Complacency in Response to the 2007 Trafficking Report; India in Focus

LENGTH: 574 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON June 12

WASHINGTON, June 12 /PRNewswire-USNewswire/ -- Congressman Chris Smith (R- NJ), the author of the nation's historic Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and two subsequent expansions of the law, today warned that the US State Department's annual report on human trafficking reveals a "creeping complacency that must be nipped in the bud since the thugs who traffic in human beings never grow tired of exploiting women and children for profit, they have to be hunted down and prosecuted."

Smith said, "The annual Trafficking in Persons Report is a tool created by my law to allow us to quantify and assess what countries are doing when it comes to combating the trafficking of women and children." He went on, "When the facts show a country is failing to fight human trafficking the law requires us to take action, pressure friend and foe alike to protect it's women and children and throw the traffickers in jail."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency -- a creeping complacency -- to park offending countries in the Watch List rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms."

"When used appropriately, the Watch List, can send a clear warning and enable negligent countries to make specific reforms within a reasonable period of time. It is not intended to be an anteroom where countries can hide and never take sufficient action to address human trafficking."

"There are 32 countries on the Watch List, some for the third or fourth year in a row," Smith said. "This report indicates a failure to realize the real purpose and benefit of the Watch List."

Smith specifically cited India as an example of an egregious offending country that has been retained on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year even though the report lists numerous areas where there has been a "lack of any significant federal action."

"Whatever India has said or done to idle itself on the Watch List, its overall record is overwhelmed by a trifecta of abuse," Smith said.

"The report states that India serves as a source, destination and transit country for victims trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation," Smith said. "The report concedes that India's trafficking problem is estimated in the millions, with 90 percent of India's sex trafficking being internal -- many underage girls forced into legal prostitution."

"Bottom-line," Smith said, "The TIP reports says India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking. It says there is a lack of any significant federal government action to address bonded labor and that efforts to combat child labor are uneven. And the TIP report points out that India failed to take significant measures to prosecute or punish government official involved in trafficking-related corruption."

"Yet India remains on the Watch List instead of being on Tier 3," Smith said.

"After six months of vacancy, we now have a new Ambassador at the US Trafficking in Persons Office, Ambassador Mark Lagon. I look forward to working with Ambassador Lagon and am confident that like his predecessor, John Miller, he will use the tools provided in the law to most effectively combat trafficking and provide assistance and protection to the victims."

CONTACT: Patrick J. Creamer of the Office of U.S. Rep. Chris Smith,
+1-202-225-3765

SOURCE Office of U.S. Rep. Chris Smith

URL: <http://www.prnewswire.com>

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 PR Newswire Association LLC.
All Rights Reserved.

243 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

PUBLIC AWARENESS OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING INCREASING, RICE SAYS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 839 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the U.S. Department of State:

U.S. efforts to raise awareness of trafficking in persons are paying off, and now millions more people know about the global problem, says Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

In introducing the State Department's seventh annual Trafficking in Persons Report on June 12, Rice said human trafficking until recently was akin to a global family secret. It was known but not often discussed publicly.

Rice said that in her travels around the world, she has noticed a greater desire by our partners to fight this crime and protect its victims. The United States, she said, is helping to lead a global movement not just to confront this crime, but to abolish it. More and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is -- a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world.

Mark Lagon, the new director of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons, said in detailing the 236-page report that Georgia merited special praise in its trafficking efforts. That nation, he said, has shown admirable political commitment to confront the problem. Georgia's improvement, Lagon said, includes efforts to prevent girls and women from being lured into the global sex trade, where employers turn them into mere commodities, with their bodies for sale.

The report, mandated by the U.S. Congress, grouped Georgia for the first time with what is called the Tier 1 countries -- those doing the best job of controlling human trafficking, prosecuting those involved, and supporting and assisting trafficking victims. Hungary, Slovenia and the Czech Republic are also newcomers to the Tier 1 group.

The report lists 75 countries in an intermediate Tier 2 group -- those that are demonstrating a significant commitment to address their trafficking problems but have not yet achieved international standards -- while 32 countries are on a Tier 2 watch list for having shown signs of failing to make improvements. The report places 16 countries in the bottom Tier 3 -- those governments that have shown no commitment to meeting international standards.

Lagon said that the list of countries in the Tier 3 group has grown to 16, compared to 12 from the previous year, due to a lack of effort by these nations to combat trafficking. Countries new to the Tier 3 group are Algeria, Bahrain, Equatorial Guinea, Kuwait, Malaysia, Oman and Qatar.

Lagon said India stayed on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth straight year and was not downgraded to Tier 3, despite the fact that the world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking. The United States, he said, needs to engage in a very serious dialogue with India on the South Asian nation's trafficking problem, since the countries are two serious democracies with a developing alliance.

The U.S.-India relationship is such, said Lagon, that the level of communication between our two governments can stand some serious, frank talk about a problem like bonded labor or sex trafficking.

One country that fell off the Tier 1 list was Ireland, placed instead in a group called Special Cases. The report said the presence of foreign women in prostitution and a growing migrant labor population raise concerns about a potential trafficking problem in Ireland. Other special cases are the Bahamas, Barbados, Brunei, Haiti, Iraq, Kiribati, Lesotho, the Solomon Islands, Somalia, Swaziland, Tunisia and Turkmenistan.

The report does not exempt the United States from a cataloguing of its own trafficking problem, including women and girls who migrate to America and become prostitutes. An unknown number of U.S. citizens and legal residents are also trafficked within the United States, primarily for sexual servitude and forced labor, the report says.

While the United States is not assigned a tier rating, Lagon said America stands ready to be judged on the problem. He stressed that the United States should be seen as an ally against trafficking.

In fiscal year 2006, the United States contributed more than $74 million abroad to fund 154 international anti-trafficking projects in 70 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, Lagon said, the U.S. government has funded more than $448 million to fight a problem in which an estimated 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. Some 80 percent of that total is female, and up to half are minors. (See related article.)

The United States is not just standing with our arms folded, judging others, because trafficking is a transnational problem, Lagon said. We offer our hand as a partner to try and solve this problem of modern-day slavery.

For additional information, see 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Rice's remarks, Lagon's remarks and more information about human trafficking are on the State Department Web site.

(USINFO is produced by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State. Web site: <http://usinfo.state.gov>)

By Eric Green

USINFO Staff Writer

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

244 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

SMITH WARNS OF CREEPING COMPLACENCY IN RESPONSE TO 2007 TRAFFICKING REPORT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 556 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of Missouri Rep. Chris Smith:

U.S. Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), the author of the nation's historic Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and two subsequent expansions of the law, today warned that the US State Department's annual report on human trafficking reveals a "creeping complacency that must be nipped in the bud since the thugs who traffic in human beings never grow tired of exploiting women and children for profit, they have to be hunted down and prosecuted."

Smith said, "The annual Trafficking in Persons Report is a tool created by my law to allow us to quantify and assess what countries are doing when it comes to combating the trafficking of women and children." He went on, "When the facts show a country is failing to fight human trafficking the law requires us to take action, pressure friend and foe alike to protect it's women and children and throw the traffickers in jail."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency a creeping complacency to park offending countries in the Watch List rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms."

"When used appropriately, the Watch List, can send a clear warning and enable negligent countries to make specific reforms within a reasonable period of time. It is not intended to be an anteroom where countries can hide and never take sufficient action to address human trafficking."

"There are 32 countries on the Watch List, some for the third or fourth year in a row," Smith said. "This report indicates a failure to realize the real purpose and benefit of the Watch List."

Smith specifically cited India as an example of an egregious offending country that has been retained on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year even though the report lists numerous areas where there has been a "lack of any significant federal action."

"Whatever India has said or done to idle itself on the Watch List, its overall record is overwhelmed by a trifecta of abuse," Smith said.

"The report states that India serves as a source, destination and transit country for victims trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation," Smith said. "The report concedes that India's trafficking problem is estimated in the millions, with 90 percent of India's sex trafficking being internal many underage girls forced into legal prostitution."

"Bottom-line," Smith said, "The TIP reports says India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking. It says there is a lack of any significant federal government action to address bonded labor and that efforts to combat child labor are uneven. And the TIP report points out that India failed to take significant measures to prosecute or punish government official involved in trafficking-related corruption."

"Yet India remains on the Watch List instead of being on Tier 3," Smith said.

"After six months of vacancy, we now have new Ambassador at the US Trafficking in Persons Office, Ambassador Mark Lagon. I look forward to working with Ambassador Lagon and am confident that like his predecessor, John Miller, he will use the tools provided in the law to most effectively combat trafficking and provide assistance and protection to the victims."

###

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

245 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

2007 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT RELEASED, UKRAINE ON WATCH LIST

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 470 words

DATELINE: KIEV, Ukraine

The following information was released by the U.S. Embassy in Kiev:

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report at the State Department in Washington Tuesday, June 12. As directed by the U.S. Congress, the State Department prepares reports for all countries in the world. The goal of these reports is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery.

As in previous years, this report lists Ukraine as a country that has a significant number of trafficking victims and as a country that has not met the standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking.

The report determines that Ukraine is taking significant efforts to comply with the standards for the elimination of trafficking, especially in the area of prevention. For example, in 2006, the Border Guards closed nine channels of trafficking, prevented 43 women from being trafficked, and detained 29 traffickers.

However, the report cautions that Ukraine has failed to provide evidence that it is increasing efforts to meet anti-trafficking standards, especially in the areas of victim protection and punishment of convicted traffickers. For example, of the 86 traffickers that were convicted and sentenced in 2006, a majority, 47, received only probation.

As a result, Ukraine has been placed on a watch list of countries that are making insufficient progress in combating trafficking in persons. Once Ukraine's efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons have increased, Ukraine will be moved up from the watch list. If Ukraine does not increase its anti-trafficking efforts, according to U.S. law, USG assistance to Ukraine could be negatively affected.

The Embassy currently works with the government of Ukraine to combat trafficking in persons. We are committed to helping Ukraine increase its efforts to meet anti-trafficking standards.

U.S. Government programs to help Ukraine improve its anti-trafficking efforts include: USAID support to anti-trafficking NGOs that provide counseling, job-skills training, employment referral, and awareness campaigns to inform the public about trafficking. USAID assistance has helped approximately 2,000 victims of trafficking reintegrate into Ukraine. The Embassy is also helping the Ministry of Interior strengthen investigation and information technology capabilities of their anti-trafficking department. The U.S. Embassy also actively participates in the working group on visa and document fraud in human trafficking that has been recently established by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

The complete text of the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report can be found in English at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007>. The chapter on Ukraine can be found in Ukrainian at http://kyiv.usembassy.gov/polit_ukr.html#tip.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

246 of 445 DOCUMENTS

States News Service

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

REP. MALONEY: STATE DEPT HUMAN TRAFFICKING REPORT SHOWS SOME PROGRESS BEING MADE, MORE NEEDS TO BE DONEBYLINE: States News ServiceLENGTH: 428 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New York Rep. Carolyn Maloney:

Following the U.S. State Department's release of its 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report (<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007/index.htm>) today, Congresswoman Carolyn B. Maloney (D-NY) expressed concern that too many countries still are not doing enough to combat human trafficking. Maloney is a co-chair of the congressional Human Trafficking Caucus.

Last year's report indicated that in 2005, foreign governments reported 4,766 trafficking convictions. This year's report shows that for 2006, that number dropped to 3,160. The report also states that the number of prosecutions dropped from 6,618 in 2005 to 5,808 in 2006. Additionally, 21 countries implemented some form of anti-trafficking policies in 2006.

The report rates countries on a three tier scale, with those in the bottom tier becoming subject to sanctions. Maloney is highly concerned that Russia, Mexico and India for the fourth consecutive year remain on the Tier 2 watch list, meaning they are in danger of sinking to the level at which sanctions would be imposed.

"While I am pleased that the TIP report notes positive efforts being made in some countries and singles out heroes around the world who are fighting to end human trafficking, the report once again shows us how far we have to go," said Maloney. "I am troubled that the number of reported prosecutions and convictions decreased in 2006. It is important that we protect the victims who have been trafficked, and punish the predators who exploit them."

Along with Representative Deborah Pryce, Congresswoman Maloney helped author the "End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act," which targets the demand side of trafficking, and was incorporated into the "Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005."

Background

Under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, the State Department is required to produce an annual report that reviews recent trends in human trafficking and places countries on a four tier scale based on their commitment to anti-trafficking policies.

The State Department estimates that approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and millions more are trafficked within their own countries. Most of the victims are women and children. Each year an estimated 14,500 people enter the United States through trafficking rings. Experts say human trafficking is a $10 billion dollar worldwide industry and sex trafficking is the third largest and fastest growing crime ring in history.

###

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 States News Service

247 of 445 DOCUMENTS

State Department Documents and Publications

June 12, 2007

Public Awareness of Human Trafficking Increasing, Rice Says; New Trafficking in Persons Report gives Georgia special praise

BYLINE: Eric Green, USINFO Staff Writer

SECTION: NEWS FROM THE WASHINGTON FILE

LENGTH: 826 words

Washington -- U.S. efforts to raise awareness of trafficking in persons are paying off, and now millions more people know about the global problem, says Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

In introducing the State Department's seventh annual Trafficking in Persons Report on June 12, Rice said human trafficking until recently was "akin to a global family secret. It was known but not often discussed publicly."

Rice said that in her travels around the world, she has noticed "a greater desire by our partners to fight this crime and protect its victims." The United States, she said, is helping to lead a global movement "not just to confront this crime, but to abolish it. More and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is -- a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

Mark Lagon, the new director of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons, said in detailing the 236-page report that Georgia merited special praise in its trafficking efforts. That nation, he said, has shown "admirable political commitment" to confront the problem. Georgia's improvement, Lagon said, includes efforts to prevent girls and women from being lured into the global sex trade, where employers turn them into "mere commodities, with their bodies for sale."

The report, mandated by the U.S. Congress, grouped Georgia for the first time with what is called the "Tier 1" countries -- those doing the best job of controlling human trafficking, prosecuting those involved, and supporting and assisting trafficking victims. Hungary, Slovenia and the Czech Republic are also newcomers to the Tier 1 group.

The report lists 75 countries in an intermediate Tier 2 group -- those that are demonstrating a "significant" commitment to address their trafficking problems but have not yet achieved international standards -- while 32 countries are on a Tier 2 "watch list" for having shown signs of failing to make improvements. The report places 16 countries in the bottom Tier 3 -- those governments that have shown no commitment to meeting international standards.

Lagon said that the list of countries in the Tier 3 group has grown to 16, compared to 12 from the previous year, "due to a lack of effort" by these nations to combat trafficking. Countries new to the Tier 3 group are Algeria, Bahrain, Equatorial Guinea, Kuwait, Malaysia, Oman and Qatar.

Lagon said India stayed on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth straight year and was not downgraded to Tier 3, despite the fact that the world's "largest democracy" has the "world's largest problem of human trafficking." The United States, he said, needs to "engage in a very serious dialogue with India" on the South Asian nation's trafficking problem, since the countries are "two serious democracies" with a "developing alliance."

The U.S.-India relationship is such, said Lagon, that the "level of communication between our two governments" can "stand some serious, frank talk about a problem like bonded labor or sex trafficking."

One country that fell off the Tier 1 list was Ireland, placed instead in a group called "Special Cases." The report said the presence of "foreign women in prostitution and a growing migrant labor population raise concerns about a potential trafficking problem" in Ireland. Other special cases are the Bahamas, Barbados, Brunei, Haiti, Iraq, Kiribati, Lesotho, the Solomon Islands, Somalia, Swaziland, Tunisia and Turkmenistan.

The report does not exempt the United States from a cataloguing of its own trafficking problem, including women and girls who migrate to America and become prostitutes. An unknown number of U.S. citizens and legal residents are also trafficked within the United States, primarily for sexual servitude and forced labor, the report says.

While the United States is not assigned a tier rating, Lagon said America stands "ready to be judged" on the problem. He stressed that the United States should be seen as an ally against trafficking.

In fiscal year 2006, the United States contributed more than $74 million abroad to fund 154 international anti-trafficking projects in 70 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, Lagon said, the U.S. government has funded more than $448 million to fight a problem in which an estimated 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. Some 80 percent of that total is female, and up to half are minors. (See related article.)

The United States is "not just standing with our arms folded, judging others," because trafficking is a "transnational problem," Lagon said. "We offer our hand as a partner to try and solve this problem of modern-day slavery."

For additional information, see 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report.

Rice's remarks, Lagon's remarks and more information about human trafficking are on the State Department Web site.

(USINFO is produced by the Bureau of International Information Programs, U.S. Department of State.)

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Report

248 of 445 DOCUMENTS

St. Paul Pioneer Press (Minnesota)

June 12, 2007 Tuesday

Kurds open to peace talks

BYLINE: Pioneer Press

SECTION: NATIONAL

LENGTH: 885 words

ANKARA, Turkey - Kurdish separatist rebels Tuesday declared a "unilateral cease-fire" in attacks against Turkey and said they were ready for peace negotiations, but the group maintained the right to defend itself. The statement came as the Turkish military has been building up its forces along the border with Iraq, threatening to stage a major incursion to pursue Kurdish rebels at their bases. Such an operation could ignite a wider conflict involving Iraqi Kurds, and draw in the United States. The Turkish government had no immediate response to the statement by the separatist Kurdistan Workers' Party, known as the PKK. The guerrillas have been fighting for autonomy in Turkey for more than two decades. Pakistan coach's death not foul play

KINGSTON, Jamaica - In an embarrassing reversal, Jamaican police said Tuesday that Pakistan's cricket coach died of natural causes and was not strangled following his team's surprise World Cup loss this spring. Officials closed the homicide investigation into the death of Bob Woolmer after getting opinions from three independent pathologists from Britain, South Africa and Canada and reviewing a toxicology report, Police Commissioner Lucius Thomas told a news conference. Thomas did not reveal what they believe caused the death of the 58-year-old coach, saying that would be up to Jamaica's coroner. Woolmer was found unconscious March 18 in his hotel room in Kingston a day after his heavily favored team was eliminated from the World Cup in a humiliating loss to Ireland. Human trafficking list gets new nations

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist for failing to halt what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery." Countries on the list are subject to sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of some 800,000 people, 80 percent of them female and up to half of them children, across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor. Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined for the first time perennial offenders like Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria. China defends its food exports

BEIJING - China played down international concerns about tainted food exports on Tuesday, saying the problems were not as bad as reported and displaying seized counterfeit products to show authorities were enforcing safety protections. To make its case, the government organized a rare visit by more than 100 foreign and domestic reporters to a food safety lab and storehouse where bogus goods from chewing gum to soy sauce were stacked on shelves and arrayed in rows. Adults tie up boy in hot car, police say

CHATTANOOGA, Tenn. - Investigators found a crying 6-year-old boy tied up in a sweltering car at a suburban restaurant after employees reported seeing a man take the child outside and return without him to finish eating. Police believe the boy, whose name was not released, was tied up for about 30 minutes while the outside temperature was in the 80s Saturday in Ringgold, Ga., about 13 miles southeast of Chattanooga, Sgt. John Gass said Tuesday. The boy's mother, Rachel Gilchrist, 35, and her companion, Raymond Minchew, 61, both of Sandy Springs, Ga., were arrested Saturday and charged with cruelty to children and concealing a weapon. Police found a handgun in the car, parked outside a Cracker Barrel restaurant. The boy was placed in state protective custody. Medical worker admits molestations

SAN DIEGO - A former respiratory therapist pleaded guilty Tuesday to molesting young, brain-damaged patients at the hospital where he worked for 25 years. Wayne Albert Bleyle, 55, admitted to eight counts of forcible lewd acts upon a child and four counts of exhibiting a minor in pornography. Under a plea agreement, Bleyle would serve 45 years and eight months in prison. Bleye worked at Rady Children's Hospital. A judge denied bail and set sentencing for July 25. Iran to decide on charging Americans

TEHRAN, Iran - Iran's judiciary said Tuesday it will decide within days whether to indict or free four Iranian-Americans charged with endangering national security in a case that has heightened bitterness between the rival nations. The announcement came as Iran's foreign minister, Manouchehr Mottaki, warned that the United States would "regret" its detention of five Iranian officials by U.S. forces in Iraq, which has angered Tehran for months. In Washington, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack repeated U.S. calls for the Americans to be released and again rejected any link between them and the five Iranian detainees. Detainee's May death investigated

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico - The U.S. military is investigating how guards failed to prevent the death last month of a Guantanamo Bay detainee, an apparent suicide in one of the most closely monitored detention camps for suspected al-Qaida and Taliban members, the top commander said Tuesday. Abdul Rahman Maadha al-Amry, a Saudi who had insisted he was only a Taliban foot soldier, died at the U.S. military base in southeastern Cuba on May 30. The military has refused to describe how he died.

- Associated Press

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newspaper

Copyright 2007 St. Paul Pioneer Press
All Rights Reserved

249 of 445 DOCUMENTS

UPI

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 3:21 PM EST

U.S. blasts Mideast on human trafficking

LENGTH: 217 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 12

Human trafficking remains a grave problem worldwide, particularly in the Middle East, according to the United States.

In its latest annual report released Tuesday on what the U.S. State Department has called "modern-day slavery," the United States said that countries like Saudi Arabia that rely heavily on foreign migrant workers have laws that make laborers particularly vulnerable to trafficking. Other countries on the worst-offenders list include Oman, Bahrain, Kuwait and Qatar, as well as Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia.

State reported that there are about 800,000 people trafficked across borders each year, with about 80 percent of them being female, while half of them are minors.

"It's especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East that aren't lacking adequate resources to make significant progress are on Tier 3," said Mark Lagon, senior adviser on trafficking in persons at State. Tier 3 consists of nations that are the worst-ranked among the 164 countries surveyed, of which a total of 16 countries made the list this year. "A country falls into Tier 3 if its government is not making a significant effort to combat human trafficking. A Tier 3 country can be sanctioned if it doesn't take seriously antislavery action in the next 90 days," Lagon said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 U.P.I.
All Rights Reserved

250 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 11:09 PM EST

CAMBODIA REMAINS ON TIER 2 WATCH LIST IN 2007 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 707 wordsDATELINE: PHNOM PENH, Cambodia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On Tuesday, 12 June 2007, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the State Department's 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report. For the second consecutive year, Cambodia is placed on Tier 2 Watch List. While the Cambodian Government took nascent steps to address trafficking-related corruption, the government must expand these efforts to prosecute and convict officials who profit from or are involved in trafficking. Although some senior level government officials are committed to anti-trafficking efforts, reports of public officials' complicity in trafficking limited the government's success in combating trafficking. The government also failed to pass a much-needed comprehensive anti-trafficking law that has been in the drafting process for the past seven years.

Cambodia is a source, transit, and destination country for men, women, and children trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation and forced labor. Cambodian women and children are trafficked to Thailand and Malaysia for sexual exploitation and forced labor in factories or as domestic servants, while Cambodian men are trafficked for forced labor in the agriculture, fishing, and construction sectors in these countries. Cambodian children are trafficked to Vietnam and Thailand for forced begging. Cambodia is a transit and destination country for the trafficking of Vietnamese and Chinese women and children for sexual exploitation. Sex trafficking of women and children occurs within Cambodia's borders, from rural areas to cities such as Phnom Penh, Siem Reap, and Sihanoukville. The Government of Cambodia does not fully comply with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking; however, it is making significant efforts to do so.

To improve its Tier ranking, Cambodia should pass and enact comprehensive anti-trafficking legislation and expand efforts to prosecute and convict officials who profit from or are involved in trafficking.

The U.S. Congress, through its passage of the 2000 Trafficking Victims Protection Act (TVPA), as amended, requires the Secretary of State to submit this report each year. The 164-country report is the most comprehensive worldwide report on the efforts of governments to combat trafficking in persons. The goal of the report is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery. Countries determined to have a significant number of trafficking victims are assigned to one of three tiers. Countries assessed as meeting the "minimum standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking" set forth in the TVPA are classified as Tier 1. Countries assessed as not fully complying with the minimum standards, but making significant efforts to meet those minimum standards, are classified as Tier 2. Countries assessed as neither complying with the minimum standards nor making significant efforts to do so are classified as Tier 3.

The TVPA also requires the Secretary of State to provide a "Special Watch List" of countries to be evaluated again in an Interim Assessment that the Secretary must provide to Congress by February 1 of each year. In addition to tracking countries that move up in "tier" ratings - from 3 to 2 or from 2 to 1 - the Special Watch List also effectively established a new, fourth tier - Tier Two Watch List. This tier consists of Tier Two countries determined: (1) not to have made "increasing efforts" over the past year; (2) to have avoided Tier 3 status based on commitments of anti-trafficking reforms over the next year, or (3) to have a very significant number of trafficking victims or a significantly increasing victim population.

The Royal Government of Cambodia made significant efforts in 2006 to move from a Tier Three rating to the Tier Two Watch List. While this rating is maintained for 2007, the U.S. Embassy looks forward to working further with the Cambodian government in the upcoming year to achieve the necessary legislative and judicial steps to see Cambodia move solidly into Tier Two, and eventually Tier One, status.

The entire TIP Report as well as the text of the TVPA and amendments are available on-line at www.state.gov/g/tip.

LOAD-DATE: June 18, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

251 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 9:48 PM EST

STATE DEPT.: SECRETARY RICE SAYS PUBLIC AWARENESS OF HUMAN TRAFFICKING INCREASING

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 867 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. Department of State's International Information Programs issued the following press release:

By Eric Green

USINFO Staff Writer

U.S. efforts to raise awareness of trafficking in persons are paying off, and now millions more people know about the global problem, says Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

In introducing the State Department's seventh annual Trafficking in Persons Report on June 12, Rice said human trafficking until recently was "akin to a global family secret. It was known but not often discussed publicly."

Rice said that in her travels around the world, she has noticed "a greater desire by our partners to fight this crime and protect its victims." The United States, she said, is helping to lead a global movement "not just to confront this crime, but to abolish it. More and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is - a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

Mark Lagon, the new director of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Human Trafficking in Persons, said in detailing the 236-page report that Georgia merited special praise in its trafficking efforts. That nation, he said, has shown "admirable political commitment" to confront the problem. Georgia's improvement, Lagon said, includes efforts to prevent girls and women from being lured into the global sex trade, where employers turn them into "mere commodities, with their bodies for sale."

The report, mandated by the U.S. Congress, grouped Georgia for the first time with what is called the "Tier 1" countries - those doing the best job of controlling human trafficking, prosecuting those involved, and supporting and assisting trafficking victims. Hungary, Slovenia and the Czech Republic are also newcomers to the Tier 1 group.

The report lists 75 countries in an intermediate Tier 2 group - those that are demonstrating a "significant" commitment to address their trafficking problems but have not yet achieved international standards - while 32 countries are on a Tier 2 "watch list" for having shown signs of failing to make improvements. The report places 16 countries in the bottom Tier 3 - those governments that have shown no commitment to meeting international standards.

Lagon said that the list of countries in the Tier 3 group has grown to 16, compared to 12 from the previous year, "due to a lack of effort" by these nations to combat trafficking. Countries new to the Tier 3 group are Algeria, Bahrain, Equatorial Guinea, Kuwait, Malaysia, Oman and Qatar.

Lagon said India stayed on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth straight year and was not downgraded to Tier 3, despite the fact that the world's "largest democracy" has the "world's largest problem of human trafficking." The United States, he said, needs to "engage in a very serious dialogue with India" on the South Asian nation's trafficking problem, since the countries are "two serious democracies" with a "developing alliance."

The U.S.-India relationship is such, said Lagon, that the "level of communication between our two governments" can "stand some serious, frank talk about a problem like bonded labor or sex trafficking."

One country that fell off the Tier I list was Ireland, placed instead in a group called "Special Cases." The report said the presence of "foreign women in prostitution and a growing migrant labor population raise concerns about a potential trafficking problem" in Ireland. Other special cases are the Bahamas, Barbados, Brunei, Haiti, Iraq, Kiribati, Lesotho, the Solomon Islands, Somalia, Swaziland, Tunisia and Turkmenistan.

The report does not exempt the United States from a cataloguing of its own trafficking problem, including women and girls who migrate to America and become prostitutes. An unknown number of U.S. citizens and legal residents are also trafficked within the United States, primarily for sexual servitude and forced labor, the report says.

While the United States is not assigned a tier rating, Lagon said America stands "ready to be judged" on the problem. He stressed that the United States should be seen as an ally against trafficking.

In fiscal year 2006, the United States contributed more than $74 million abroad to fund 154 international anti-trafficking projects in 70 countries. Since fiscal year 2001, Lagon said, the U.S. government has funded more than $448 million to fight a problem in which an estimated 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year. Some 80 percent of that total is female, and up to half are minors. (See related article: <http://usinfo.state.gov/xarchives/display.html?p=washfile-english&y=2007&m=June&x=20070608130830X1eneerg0.3753168.>)

The United States is "not just standing with our arms folded, judging others," because trafficking is a "transnational problem," Lagon said. "We offer our hand as a partner to try and solve this problem of modern-day slavery."

For additional information, see 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report: http://usinfo.state.gov/gi/global_issues/human_trafficking/traffick_report.html.

Rice's remarks, Lagon's remarks and more information about human trafficking are on the State Department Web site.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

252 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 9:37 PM EST

2007 TRAFFICKING IN PERSONS REPORT RELEASED, UKRAINE ON WATCH LIST

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 470 words

DATELINE: KIEV, Ukraine

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice released the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report at the State Department in Washington Tuesday, June 12. As directed by the U.S. Congress, the State Department prepares reports for all countries in the world. The goal of these reports is to stimulate action and create partnerships around the world in the fight against modern-day slavery.

As in previous years, this report lists Ukraine as a country that has a significant number of trafficking victims and as a country that has not met the standards for the elimination of severe forms of trafficking.

The report determines that Ukraine is taking significant efforts to comply with the standards for the elimination of trafficking, especially in the area of prevention. For example, in 2006, the Border Guards closed nine channels of trafficking, prevented 43 women from being trafficked, and detained 29 traffickers.

However, the report cautions that Ukraine has failed to provide evidence that it is increasing efforts to meet anti-trafficking standards, especially in the areas of victim protection and punishment of convicted traffickers. For example, of the 86 traffickers that were convicted and sentenced in 2006, a majority, 47, received only probation.

As a result, Ukraine has been placed on a watch list of countries that are making insufficient progress in combating trafficking in persons. Once Ukraine's efforts to eliminate trafficking in persons have increased, Ukraine will be moved up from the watch list. If Ukraine does not increase its anti-trafficking efforts, according to U.S. law, USG assistance to Ukraine could be negatively affected.

The Embassy currently works with the government of Ukraine to combat trafficking in persons. We are committed to helping Ukraine increase its efforts to meet anti-trafficking standards.

U.S. Government programs to help Ukraine improve its anti-trafficking efforts include: USAID support to anti-trafficking NGOs that provide counseling, job-skills training, employment referral, and awareness campaigns to inform the public about trafficking. USAID assistance has helped approximately 2,000 victims of trafficking reintegrate into Ukraine. The Embassy is also helping the Ministry of Interior strengthen investigation and information technology capabilities of their anti-trafficking department. The U.S. Embassy also actively participates in the working group on visa and document fraud in human trafficking that has been recently established by the Ministry for Foreign Affairs.

The complete text of the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report can be found in English at <http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007>. The chapter on Ukraine can be found in Ukrainian at http://kyiv.usembassy.gov/polit_ukr.html#tip.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

253 of 445 DOCUMENTS

PR Newswire
Public Interest Services
Delivering the most policy, issue & advocacy news
U.S. Newswire

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 12:49 PM EST

Smith Warns of Creeping Complacency in Response to the 2007 Trafficking Report

SECTION: POLITICAL EDITORS

LENGTH: 565 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, June 12

Congressman Chris Smith (R- NJ), the author of the nation's historic Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and two subsequent expansions of the law, today warned that the US State Department's annual report on human trafficking reveals a "creeping complacency that must be nipped in the bud since the thugs who traffic in human beings never grow tired of exploiting women and children for profit, they have to be hunted down and prosecuted."

Smith said, "The annual Trafficking in Persons Report is a tool created by my law to allow us to quantify and assess what countries are doing when it comes to combating the trafficking of women and children." He went on, "When the facts show a country is failing to fight human trafficking the law requires us to take action, pressure friend and foe alike to protect it's women and children and throw the traffickers in jail."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency -- a creeping complacency -- to park offending countries in the Watch List rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms."

"When used appropriately, the Watch List, can send a clear warning and enable negligent countries to make specific reforms within a reasonable period of time. It is not intended to be an anteroom where countries can hide and never take sufficient action to address human trafficking."

"There are 32 countries on the Watch List, some for the third or fourth year in a row," Smith said. "This report indicates a failure to realize the real purpose and benefit of the Watch List."

Smith specifically cited India as an example of an egregious offending country that has been retained on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year even though the report lists numerous areas where there has been a "lack of any significant federal action."

"Whatever India has said or done to idle itself on the Watch List, its overall record is overwhelmed by a trifecta of abuse," Smith said.

"The report states that India serves as a source, destination and transit country for victims trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation," Smith said. "The report concedes that India's trafficking problem is estimated in the millions, with 90 percent of India's sex trafficking being internal -- many underage girls forced into legal prostitution."

"Bottom-line," Smith said, "The TIP reports says India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking. It says there is a lack of any significant federal government action to address bonded labor and that efforts to combat child labor are uneven. And the TIP report points out that India failed to take significant measures to prosecute or punish government official involved in trafficking-related corruption."

"Yet India remains on the Watch List instead of being on Tier 3," Smith said.

"After six months of vacancy, we now have a new Ambassador at the US Trafficking in Persons Office, Ambassador Mark Lagon. I look forward to working with Ambassador Lagon and am confident that like his predecessor, John Miller, he will use the tools provided in the law to most effectively combat trafficking and provide assistance and protection to the victims."

SOURCE Office of U.S. Rep. Chris Smith

Contact: Patrick J. Creamer of the Office of U.S. Rep. Chris Smith, +1-202-225-3765

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 PR Newswire Association LLC
All Rights Reserved

254 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 5:59 AM EST

GEORGIA OBTAINS TIER 1 STATUS THANKS TO STRONG EFFORT IN FIGHTING HUMAN TRAFFICKINGBYLINE: US Fed NewsLENGTH: 267 wordsDATELINE: TBILISI, Georgia

The U.S. Embassy issued the following press release:

On Tuesday, June 12, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Ambassador Mark Lagon, Director of the Department of State's Office to Monitor and Combat Trafficking in Persons, released the 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report. In her opening remarks, Secretary Rice said "Despite serious challenges, this year's report should give us hope. For example, Georgia, Hungary, Slovenia and Israel have all made major improvements, as have Taiwan and countries like Indonesia, Brazil, Bolivia, Peru and Jamaica."

The Department of State is required by law to submit a report each year to the U.S. Congress on foreign governments' efforts to eliminate severe forms of trafficking in persons. The report also raises awareness, highlights best practices and inspires governments to take action against trafficking. The 2007 report covers 164 countries.

An excerpt from Georgia's country report reads: "The Government of Georgia fully complies with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Over the past year, the government made considerable progress in the prosecution and punishment of traffickers, protection and assistance for victims, and prevention of trafficking. Georgia developed and implemented a victim-centered national referral mechanism, provided a building for the country's first trafficking victims' shelter, dedicated on-going funding for victim assistance, passed comprehensive trafficking legislation, aggressively prosecuted and toughened penalties for traffickers, and initiated multiple proactive prevention programs."

LOAD-DATE: June 25, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

255 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 4:59 AM EST

REP. MALONEY: STATE DEPT HUMAN TRAFFICKING REPORT SHOWS SOME PROGRESS BEING MADE, MORE NEEDS TO BE DONE

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 435 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney, D-N.Y. (14th CD), issued the following news release:

Following the U.S. State Department's release of its 2007 Trafficking in Persons Report (<http://www.state.gov/g/tip/rls/tiprpt/2007/index.htm>) today, Rep. Carolyn B. Maloney (D-NY) expressed concern that too many countries still are not doing enough to combat human trafficking. Maloney is a co-chair of the congressional Human Trafficking Caucus.

Last year's report indicated that in 2005, foreign governments reported 4,766 trafficking convictions. This year's report shows that for 2006, that number dropped to 3,160. The report also states that the number of prosecutions dropped from 6,618 in 2005 to 5,808 in 2006. Additionally, 21 countries implemented some form of anti-trafficking policies in 2006.

The report rates countries on a three tier scale, with those in the bottom tier becoming subject to sanctions. Maloney is highly concerned that Russia, Mexico and India for the fourth consecutive year remain on the Tier 2 watch list, meaning they are in danger of sinking to the level at which sanctions would be imposed.

"While I am pleased that the TIP report notes positive efforts being made in some countries and singles out heroes around the world who are fighting to end human trafficking, the report once again shows us how far we have to go," said Maloney. "I am troubled that the number of reported prosecutions and convictions decreased in 2006. It is important that we protect the victims who have been trafficked, and punish the predators who exploit them."

Along with Representative Deborah Pryce, Congresswoman Maloney helped author the "End Demand for Sex Trafficking Act," which targets the demand side of trafficking, and was incorporated into the "Trafficking Victims Protection Reauthorization Act of 2005."

Background

Under the Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000, the State Department is required to produce an annual report that reviews recent trends in human trafficking and places countries on a four tier scale based on their commitment to anti-trafficking policies.

The State Department estimates that approximately 800,000 people are trafficked across international borders each year, and millions more are trafficked within their own countries. Most of the victims are women and children. Each year an estimated 14,500 people enter the United States through trafficking rings. Experts say human trafficking is a $10 billion dollar worldwide industry and sex trafficking is the third largest and fastest growing crime ring in history.

Contact: Meghan O'Shaughnessy, 202/225-7944.

LOAD-DATE: June 15, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

256 of 445 DOCUMENTS

US Fed News

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 4:28 AM EST

REP. SMITH WARNS OF CREEPING COMPLACENCY IN RESPONSE TO 2007 TRAFFICKING REPORT

BYLINE: US Fed News

LENGTH: 564 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Chris Smith, R-N.J. (4th CD), issued the following news release:

Rep. Chris Smith (R-NJ), the author of the nation's historic Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000 and two subsequent expansions of the law, today warned that the US State Department's annual report on human trafficking reveals a "creeping complacency that must be nipped in the bud since the thugs who traffic in human beings never grow tired of exploiting women and children for profit, they have to be hunted down and prosecuted."

Smith said, "The annual Trafficking in Persons Report is a tool created by my law to allow us to quantify and assess what countries are doing when it comes to combating the trafficking of women and children." He went on, "When the facts show a country is failing to fight human trafficking the law requires us to take action, pressure friend and foe alike to protect it's women and children and throw the traffickers in jail."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency-a creeping complacency-to park offending countries in the Watch List rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms."

"When used appropriately, the Watch List, can send a clear warning and enable negligent countries to make specific reforms within a reasonable period of time. It is not intended to be an anteroom where countries can hide and never take sufficient action to address human trafficking."

"There are 32 countries on the Watch List, some for the third or fourth year in a row," Smith said. "This report indicates a failure to realize the real purpose and benefit of the Watch List."

Smith specifically cited India as an example of an egregious offending country that has been retained on the Tier 2 Watch List for the fourth consecutive year even though the report lists numerous areas where there has been a "lack of any significant federal action."

"Whatever India has said or done to idle itself on the Watch List, its overall record is overwhelmed by a trifecta of abuse," Smith said.

"The report states that India serves as a source, destination and transit country for victims trafficked for the purpose of forced labor and commercial sexual exploitation," Smith said. "The report concedes that India's trafficking problem is estimated in the millions, with 90 percent of India's sex trafficking being internal-many underage girls forced into legal prostitution."

"Bottom-line," Smith said, "The TIP reports says India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking. It says there is a lack of any significant federal government action to address bonded labor and that efforts to combat child labor are uneven. And the TIP report points out that India failed to take significant measures to prosecute or punish government official involved in trafficking-related corruption."

"Yet India remains on the Watch List instead of being on Tier 3," Smith said.

"After six months of vacancy, we now have new Ambassador at the US Trafficking in Persons Office, Ambassador Mark Lagon. I look forward to working with Ambassador Lagon and am confident that like his predecessor, John Miller, he will use the tools provided in the law to most effectively combat trafficking and provide assistance and protection to the victims."

Contact: Patrick Creamer, 202/225-3765.

LOAD-DATE: June 14, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 HT Media Ltd.
All Rights Reserved

257 of 445 DOCUMENTS

The White House Bulletin

June 12, 2007 TuesdayState Department Adds Seven Countries To Human-Trafficking Blacklist*SECTION: IN THE WHITE HOUSE AND AROUND TOWNLENGTH: 143 words

The State Department announced today that seven countries have been added to its human trafficking blacklist. In its annual "Trafficking In Persons Report," State added Algeria, Equatorial Guinea, Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman, Qatar, and Malaysia to the list of countries subject to possible sanctions for not doing enough to stem the flow of women and children sex slaves as well as other forced laborers. Sixteen countries in all were listed as "Tier 3" nations, meaning they "do not fully comply with the minimum standards [to fight trafficking] and are not making significant efforts to do so." The others are: Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela. There were four more Tier 3 countries than a year ago, as three countries were moved from Tier 3 to Tier 2 for improving their records: Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

258 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Xinhua General News Service

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 12:30 PM EST

U.S. blacklists more countries for human traffickingSECTION: WORLD NEWS; PoliticalLENGTH: 135 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The U.S. State Department issued Tuesday its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," adding seven countries to its blacklist of countries allegedly involving human trafficking.

The latest blacklisted countries include U.S. Middle East allies Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, as well as Malaysia, Algeria and Equatorial Guinea.

Prior to the announcement, the State Department has put Myanmar, Cuba, Iran, the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela on its human trafficking blacklist.

Under American laws, the blacklist countries could face sanctions, including withholding by the United States of non-humanitarian, non-trade related foreign aid.

Of all the blacklisted countries, many have time and again rejected the U.S. charges.

LOAD-DATE: June 12, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Xinhua News Agency

259 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 11:33 PM GMT

India left off U.S. blacklist despite 'world's largest problem of human trafficking'

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 270 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The United States says that India has the world's largest human trafficking problem.

For the fourth consecutive year, India was warned in the U.S. State Department's "Trafficking in Persons Report" that it could be added to a blacklist of countries deemed not meeting minimum standards in fighting what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

The report put India and 31 other countries on its "Tier 2 watch list" status, warning them that without improvements they could be demoted to a "Tier 3," making them subject to sanctions.

The report cited estimates that tens of millions of Indians were subjected to forced labor and said sex trafficking also continues to be common.

"The world's largest democracy has the world's largest problem of human trafficking," said the department's specialist on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

The report said India had taken some steps to deal with sex trafficking, but the government failed to take any significant action against bonded labor. Following the release, the State Department came under criticism for failing to blacklist India for persistently landing on the watch list.

"The TIP reports says India does not fully comply with the minimum standards for elimination of trafficking," said Republican Rep. Chris Smith. "Yet India remains on the watch list instead of being on Tier 3."

Lagon acknowledged that the broader relationship with the U.S. ally was taken into account.

"I would be perpetuating a fraud to say that we don't look at multiple factors in our relationship with countries any time we take a step on a particular issue like human trafficking," he said.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

260 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 2:14 PM GMT

U.S. adds seven nations, including Mideast allies, to human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 440 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist, making them subject to possible sanctions for not doing enough to halt the flow of woman and child sex slaves as well as laborers and domestic workers.

Among the new countries getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia, join perennial offenders like Burma (Myanmar), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat the scourge of human trafficking that covers sex workers, forced child labor, child soldiers, involuntary and bonded servitude.

The ranking means they "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report.

Bahrain, the Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernable progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, many from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuses.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforce existing laws against human trafficking as well failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted from "Tier 2" to "Tier 3" this year for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries identified in this year's report is: Algeria, Bahrain, Burma (Myanmar), Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

261 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 8:09 PM GMT

U.S. adds 7 nations, including Mideast allies, to human trafficking blacklist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 976 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist for failing to halt what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

Countries on the list are subject to possible sanctions for not doing enough to stop the yearly flow of some 800,000 people, 80 percent of them female and up to half of them children, across international borders for the sex trade and other forms of forced and indentured labor.

Among U.S. friends getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia joined for the first time perennial offenders like Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat trafficking in people, many of whom are seeking to escape poverty in Eastern Europe, South and Southeast Asia and are sold into the commercial sex trade, manual labor or mistreated as domestics.

Despite the additions, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "more and more countries are coming to see human trafficking for what it is a modern-day form of slavery that devastates families and communities around the world."

"We hope this report encourages responsible nations across the globe to stand together, to speak with one voice and to say that freedom and security are nonnegotiable demands of human dignity, and to say ... 'No one is fit to be a master and no one deserves to be a slave,'" she told reporters.

Countries with "Tier 3" ranking "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries that had been placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report. "Tier 2" countries are those that do not fully comply with minimum standards but are making significant efforts to do so.

The recognition is rare U.S. praise for Zimbabwe, long singled out by Washington for harsh criticism on its overall human rights record, a point noted by Rice's pointman on the trafficking issue, Mark Lagon.

"Our relationship with the government is in a very critical state on other grounds but the facts are that through our leveraging and through our prodding, Zimbabwe has actually taken some tangible steps," he said.

Still, such lobbying has had far from a universal effect.

The seven newcomers to "Tier 3" were all demoted from "Tier 2 watchlist" status, which now covers 32 countries, including India, Mexico and Russia, that have been cited for poor anti-trafficking records for numerous consecutive years.

Some in Congress lamented that some nations on the watchlist have not been demoted to "Tier 3."

"What jumps off the pages of this report is that there is a growing tendency a creeping complacency to park offending countries in the watchlist rather than identify them as egregious Tier 3 offenders in need of immediate and massive reforms," said Republican Rep. Chris Smith.

But Lagon denied the charge.

"The 'Tier 2 watchlist' is not supposed to become a parking lot for governments lacking the will or interest to stop exploitation and enslavement on their soil," Lagon said, describing India as "the world's largest democracy (with) the world's largest problem."

Most of this year's additions to "Tier 3" are Muslim or predominantly Muslim nations, many of which have the means to enforce foreign workers' rights and anti-trafficking laws.

"It is especially disappointing that so many wealthy countries in the Near East ... are on 'Tier 3'," Lagon said.

Bahrain, the Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernible progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, largely from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuse.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforcing existing laws against human trafficking as well failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted to "Tier 3" for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and for producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries in this year's report is: Algeria, Bahrain, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, Myanmar, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

Cuba, Iran, Myanmar, North Korea, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela are regularly accused by Washington of failing to protect human rights and are often cited in State Department reports for their lack of respect for press and religious freedoms.

But Malaysia made its first appearance on "Tier 3" for its failure to protect and identify victims of trafficking, many of them Indonesian domestics.

In a small bright spot in Southeast Asia, the report noted with approval Vietnam's high-profile arrest, prosecution and conviction last year of British glam rock star Gary Glitter on charges of committing sexual acts with two underage girls.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

262 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Worldstream

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 11:31 PM GMT

Malaysia added to US human trafficking blacklistSECTION: INTERNATIONAL NEWSLENGTH: 130 wordsDATELINE: WASHINGTON

The United States has blacklisted Malaysia as among the countries with the worst human trafficking problems.

In its annual "Trafficking in Persons Report," the U.S. State Department downgraded Malaysia to the blacklist from a watch list, citing its failure to tackle the problem.

"Malaysia is placed on Tier 2 for its failure to show satisfactory progress in combating trafficking in persons," the report said, referring to the departments designation for the blacklist. Blacklisted countries are subject to sanctions. The report cited the Malaysian governments failure to prosecute and punish traffickers, to provide adequate shelters and services to victims, and to protect its migrant workers from involuntary servitude. Fifteen other countries were included on the blacklist.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007LANGUAGE: ENGLISHPUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

263 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 2:12 PM GMT

Seven Nations Go on Trafficking Blacklist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 447 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist.

Countries going on this list are subject to possible sanctions for not doing enough to halt the flow of women and child sex slaves as well as laborers and domestic workers.

Among the new countries getting a failing grade were Bahrain, Kuwait, Oman and Qatar, which along with Algeria, Equatorial Guinea and Malaysia, join perennial offenders like Myanmar (Burma), Cuba, Iran, North Korea and Syria in the State Department's annual "Trafficking in Persons Report."

Sixteen states in all four more than in 2006 were given so-called "Tier 3" status in the 236-page survey of global efforts to combat the scourge of human trafficking that covers sex workers, forced child labor, child soldiers, involuntary and bonded servitude.

The ranking means they "do not fully comply with the minimum standards (to fight trafficking) and are not making significant efforts to do so," which makes them eligible for U.S. economic sanctions.

Three countries that had been placed on "Tier 3" in 2006 Belize, Laos and Zimbabwe were promoted to "Tier 2" this year for improving their records, according to the report.

Bahrain, the Persian Gulf home to the U.S. Fifth Fleet, was cited for failing to crack down on human traffickers who are bringing in men, women and children for forced labor or commercial sex work, the report says.

"Bahrain made no discernible progress in preventing trafficking this year," it said, noting that laws aimed at protecting foreign workers, many from South and Southeast Asia, are not enforced and that authorities are not seriously investigating alleged widespread abuses.

Oil-rich Kuwait "made modest progress in preventing trafficking in persons this year," the report said, but added that "Kuwaiti efforts to improve its protection of victims of human trafficking had little effect."

Oman was cited for not applying and enforcing existing laws against human trafficking as well failing to distribute pamphlets aimed at educating foreign workers about their rights, it said.

Qatar, long accused by the United States of ignoring the plight of child camel jockeys, was demoted from "Tier 2" to "Tier 3" this year for not enacting legislation to outlaw all forms of human trafficking and for producing only two convictions among numerous cases of alleged abuse of domestic servants, according to the report.

The complete list of "Tier 3" countries identified in this year's report is: Algeria, Bahrain, Myanmar, Cuba, Equatorial Guinea, Iran, Kuwait, Malaysia, North Korea, Oman, Qatar, Saudi Arabia, Sudan, Syria, Uzbekistan and Venezuela.

LOAD-DATE: June 13, 2007

LANGUAGE: ENGLISH

PUBLICATION-TYPE: Newswire

Copyright 2007 Associated Press
All Rights Reserved

264 of 445 DOCUMENTS

Associated Press Online

June 12, 2007 Tuesday 3:41 PM GMT

Seven Nations Added to Trafficking Klist

BYLINE: By MATTHEW LEE, Associated Press Writer

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE

LENGTH: 899 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Bush administration on Tuesday added seven nations, including several key U.S. allies in the Middle East, to its human trafficking blacklist for failing to halt what it called the scourge of "modern-day slavery."

